Gen. Lee once said: "The general who never made mistakes never fought any battles." The same truth may readily be applied to historians and critics. Lord Wolseley has written an appreciative article on Gen. Lee, which gives an idea of his personal character that is in no way exaggerated, and an estimate of his military capacity very high, it is true, but not higher than that entertained by Lee's own countrymen, by many foreign critics, and, we believe, by not a few of those who fought against him. Lord Wolseley has no doubt made mistakes, but these, like Gen. Walker's errors in his admirable 'History of the Second Army Corps,' are not material enough to affect either the value or the charm of the work. W. ALLAN.

CONVENTUAL PASTIMES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the Nation of March 24 a correspondent suggests, apropos of the memoirs of the Princesse de Ligne, that the pranks which she describes as perpetrated within the walls of the Abbaye-aux-Bois may be "the natural result of the ennui of convent life." Of course, I cannot answer for the Princesse de Ligne or the Duchesse de Mazarin and the convent life of their day, but I think I can safely say that nowhere in the world is the spirit of ennui so weak an agent as at the convent school of modern times. Every hour, every minute is provided with its occupation or its recreation, varied and interchanged with admirable judgment, while there is abundant outlet for animal spirits in active out-of-door exercise and indoor games, where every healthy and legitimate form of amusement is freely encouraged. I think if any one had come in upon us children during recreation time at the French convent where I spent the happiest hours of my school life, they might have thought they had struck Bedlam, but they would not have found anything suggestive of ennui. On a rainy day, when there is no prospect of "I spy" or "prisoner's base" or "hare and hounds" in the garden, and between one and two hundred healthy and hard-worked girls are turned loose in the schoolrooms and recreation halls to enjoy themselves to their hearts' content, the result is something that eye hath not seen nor ear heard elsewhere. Shouting, singing, romping, screaming, one band dancing a quadrille to the music of their own voices in one corner, an exciting "tug of war" going on in another, a large party "going to Jerusalem" pell-mell through the halls, a wild scene of confusion in the schoolrooms, girls scrambling over desks and crawling under benches in a frantic game of "hide and seek," besides various small side shows in the way of "jump-rope," "grace-sticks," and "class-ball," with perhaps an impromptu charade being acted in some retired spot—all noise that is the mere ebullition of youthful spirits, all honest and genuine fun, is permitted to the full. It is only when an element of roughness or trickery or irreverence begins to show itself that the hand of the law is laid upon us gently but firmly. The nuns themselves often take part in our quieter recreations in their simple, cheery, gracious way.

Outside of recreation time the discipline is exceedingly strict, but most loving, while heart and soul are thrown into the work of making study attractive to us by a most thorough and interesting system of oral instruction. What girl who leads a regular life, with abundance of simple food and active exercise, with early hours, rising at six and going to bed at half-past eight winter and summer, with eight or nine hours daily of study and instruction, diversified with classes in music, painting, dancing, and calisthenics, and three times a day a safety-valve to her spirits in the shape of such recreations as I have described—what healthy-minded girl could find time for ennui? Her inner nature is attracted and sustained by the beauty of the daily devotions—the same, yet ever varying—of the most soul-satisfying of earth's religions. She is surrounded by teachers whose devoted lives and silent example of self-sacrifice, whose kind, indulgent charity and tender motherly care of and interest in herself cannot fail to rouse her warmest admiration and affection. What girl is so constituted that, under these conditions, she could be driven by sheer ennui to the committal of such unmaidenly and irreverent, not to say sacrilegious tricks as were, we will hope, piously invented rather than faithfully described by the pupils of another generation?

My own personal experience of conventual life in France has been in the schools of the Sacré-Cœur and the Assomption, but at one time I had an intimate friendship with a young French girl who was a pupil at the same Abbaye-aux-Bois which the Princesse de Ligne has touched up in so lively a manner. We compared notes over our school experiences, which we found to be much the same. My friend was full of enthusiasm for the nuns of the Abbaye-aux-Bois. She described the austerity of their lives as something appalling to human nature, yet they were cheerful, happy, and affectionate to the highest degree. Perhaps I ought to have said therefore rather than yet, for all who are familiar with monastic life know well that cheerfulness, happiness, and loving kindness are the sure fruit of that same austerity. My friend was then, in 1879, a vigorous, blooming girl of seventeen, an heiress and a beauty, intelligent, frank, and truthful, full of fun and spirits, yet always graceful and courteous towards her elders and fervent in the practice of her religion. She was certainly a good advertisement for the Abbaye-aux-Bois of to-day. She confided in me her eager desire to become a nun. "In the Abbaye-aux-Bois?" I asked. "Oh, no," she replied, laughing, "I haven't the grace for anything so terribly austere, but I never should be happy in a worldly life, and the idea of marriage makes me shudder; so I think I shall be a Sister of Charity." I asked if her family would approve of such a step. "They approve of the religious life in itself," she answered, "but they don't approve of it for me. That is quite another thing! They will oppose any such idea bitterly, and Heaven only knows if I shall have courage to carry it out." I heard of her a great deal in Paris society the next winter, where she was greatly admired for her beauty and accomplishments, but pronounced "cold and reserved" by those who did not know where her heart was. Three years later the courage she feared would fail her, and the grace she had thought wanting, both came to her, and, clad in bridal robes and veil, surrounded by her family, her friends, and the loving instructors of her youth, she consecrated herself to God for ever in this same "terribly austere" Abbaye-aux-Bois.

A DISREPUTABLE REVIEW.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I desire to protest, through your columns, against the unrestrained blackguardism of which the North American Review has of late been the vehicle. The "Letters to Prominent Persons," by Arthur Richmond, have all been marked by a noticeable lack of ordinary courtesy, and by personal spite, but the letter in the April number addressed to James Russell Lowell certainly deserves much more severe criticism. It is, without contradiction, one of the most disgraceful and bitter personal attacks ever made upon a political opponent, and it is difficult to realize that a periodical like the North American Review can lend its pages to such stuff. The decadence of the North American during the past few years has indeed been obvious and sad enough; but what must be the feeling of intelligent and courteous men when they see this once famous review employed as the organ of bitter personal attacks, which would do credit to the lowest partisan sheet? In the interests of decency and our reputation in other countries, let public sentiment frown severely upon such prostitution of high literary position.—Yours respectfully,

S. B. Platner.

Cleveland, O., April 5, 1887.

WHY NOT FORGET BLAINE?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Paul Janet, I believe, somewhere quotes another professor as saying, in the midst of some religious controversy, "Il ne faut pas lutter contre la religion; il faut l'oublier." Is it not about time for the Nation to adopt some such maxim in regard to Mr. Blaine's alleged Presidential aspirations? The frequent mention of that painful subject in the Nation is something of a surprise to me. Supposing the Republicans should commit the stupendous folly of nominating Blaine in 1888; why should the friends of Cleveland be sad? Does not the Nation confidently expect that Cleveland will be the nominee of the Democratic party? Can the Nation have the least anxiety as to the issue of another contest between these antagonists? Why not encourage the Republicans in every possible way to renominate Blaine, and thus make Cleveland's calling and election doubly sure? Or, if that is not the proper thing to do, may we not hope to see Mr. Blaine's name disappear from the columns of the Nation, at least until, by accepting the Republican nomination, he becomes once more a public character? Edward Olson.

Chicago, April 2, 1887.

[Our correspondent seems to forget that our objections to Mr. Blaine's nomination have all along been largely based on his character as a man. Consequently, we consider it a discredit to the country that any party or large body of persons should in any manner express their belief in his fitness for a great public office. We oppose his nomination not simply because we wish to keep him out of the White House, but because we think he ought not, with his record, to be in public life at all.—Ed. Nation.]

THE NEW JERSEY CHANCELLORSHIP.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The comment of the Nation last week voices, though in more temperate terms than most of us would use, the indignation felt in all parts of our State at Gov. Green's refusal to reappoint Chancellor Runyon, and the amazement, on such refusal, that he should pass by our many able, deeply-versed equity lawyers to hunt up one for Chancellor comparatively unknown, whose chief practice has been in the criminal courts as prosecutor and judge.

Because Chancellor Runyon refused to prostitute his great office to partisan ends, the blighting influence of Abbettism struck him down. The loss is the State's, not his. He can readily earn at the bar a larger income than he received as Chancellor, and with less labor.

This action of Gov. Green is but another nail in the coffin of an appointive judiciary. No party convention would have dared to refuse a renomination to such a judge as Chancellor Runyon. When the appointment of judges is used as patronage parcelled out in advance of nomination by the candidate for Governor, all that is claimed for an appointive judiciary is gone; but when, as in this case, it is used simply as a weapon in a factional fight, the viciousness of the method is so startlingly shown as but to hasten its doom. In an election by the people the weight of a proper public sentiment can be brought to bear on nominating conventions, and if it fail in one, it is not likely to in the other. The voter has at least the choice of one of two candidates. In an appointment by the Governor, the case of Chancellor Runyon shows that the wish, though almost universally expressed, of all most interested is powerless even to retain an upright, able, and popular judge. ARCHÆOLOGY AT ATHENS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Greek Archæological Society is making thorough work of the excavations on the Acropolis. The soil has been carefully removed down to the natural rock over the entire northern half of the hill, and, after every stone and potsherd has been examined, the débris is thrown over the wall. The area between the Erechtheum and the Parthenon now shows the naked foundation walls of Dörpfeld's pre-Persic temple. The east wall of the Parthenon crepidoma is exposed to the light to the depth of thirty feet, where the Acropolis rock falls away to the south at an angle of forty-five degrees. The lower courses of this substructure are entirely free from curvature.

Three important discoveries have been made this month at the angle of the north wall close by the Erechtheum: (1) under a large stone ten feet below the surface of the ground an archaic statue, surpassed by only one other in the Acropolis Museum in size and antiquity; (2) a peculiar flat bronze statuette with both sides finished, and bearing the attributes of Athene, of beautiful workmanship; (3) a fragment of an inscription belonging to the early part of the fourth century B. C., with the name of Æschylus as author, Xenocles as choregus, and [Philo]cles as archon—confirming the Scholiast's accuracy in dating the production of the "Agamemnon." The uncovering of the back of the drums which are built into the north wall reveals unmistakable signs of haste in the construction of the wall at this part.

The Greek Society has also done valuable work the past autumn in laying bare the Amphiareion and theatre at Oropus. The proscenium of the theatre, rising from the clay floor of the orchestra, consists of engaged Doric columns, the intercolumniations of which were filled with stone slabs. It was pierced by a single door in the centre, and finished by an entablature supported by projecting brackets. The architectural evidence all goes to show that the drama was here performed both by actors and chorus on the floor of the orchestra, between which and the upper scene structure no external means of passage were provided.

The explorations on the Acropolis of Mycenæ have resulted in the discovery of a series of walls similar in plan and construction to those of Tiryns.

At Volo, the beehive tomb has been recently excavated, the construction and contents of which are found to be similar to those of the tomb at Menidi. At Pagasæ and Demetrias Hellenistic walls have also been lately found.

Besides continuing work in these places during the summer, the Greek Archæological Society plan to resume operations at Eleusis and Epidaurus.

The French School has utilized the presence of a man-of-war in the Peiræus harbor by employing its crew in the excavations at Eetioneia, the object of which is the discovery of the temple of Aphrodite. The work of the French at Delphi cannot begin until the legal difficulties of expropriation have been settled, involving many months' delay.

The German School has lately sunk some trenches in the public land about the Theseum, seeking for evidences of the location of the Agora in that region. The work was unavailing, however, except as it showed the great depth of soil which has accumulated on the ancient level between the Pnyx and the Areopagus.

The English School has been examining the foundations of the Olympieum. There are evidences that the front colonnade consisted of eight columns instead of ten, a discovery which throws light on Vitruvius's allusion, "Athenis octastylon templo Olympio." About seven feet below the floor of the temple of Zeus erected by Antiochus the pavement of the Peisistratus structure has been discovered this month.

The American School is about to begin the work of excavating at the theatre of Sikyon. The corner-stone of the school was laid March 12 in the presence of many American, Greek, English, and German scholars, residing or visiting in Athens, and members of their families. Prof. Martin L. D'Ooge, the present Director, after describing the history and purpcses of the school, introduced Drs. Petersen and Leaf, who spoke for the German and British schools respectively. The ceremony was performed by our Minister to Greece, Servia, and Rumania, Mr. Walker Fearn, to whose hearty interest in the enterprise, as well as his personal relations with the Greek Government, the acquisition of the land and extensive municipal improvements in its vicinity are largely due. Mr. Fearn's speech of acknowledgment, addressed to the King of Greece and his ministers, was responded to by Mr. Dra gou mis, Secretary of State, who dwelt on the cordial friendship existing between the two countries, the flags of which were floating side by side above his head. TRANSFORMATION OF NAMES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Another instance of singular transformation of names is given in the Historical Magazine (ii, 181) for June, 1858. It is as follows:

"A village was commenced some years ago on land belonging to Mr. Shepherd, near the Governor's then residence, and, in compliment to the proprietor, called Shepherd-ville. This was literally translated by the French into 'Bergerville.' The English next seized on this latter name, and converted it into Beggarville, which again is now turned back into French and called Village des Quêteurs! A vile calumny, adds M. Ferland, which it will be difficult to explain in a century hence."—Notes sur les Registres de Quebec, p. 54.

SAMUEL A. GREEN.

MASSACHUSETTS HISTORICAL SOCIETY, BOSTON, April 9, 1887.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: For those of your readers who understand German a few striking instances of transformation of our German family names may be of some interest. A well-known German name is Rollfuss, the final syllable of which seems to be equivalent to Fuss (foot); but this name is derived from Rolf (Rudolf); for in the times when German names used either to be translated into Latin or, at least, to take a Latin ending, Rolf became Rolfus. Later on, when the origin was forgotten, this was changed to Rollfuss. Likewise Parvus, translated from the German name Klein (Little) became Barfuss (Barefoot). In certain parts of Germany I have heard the ugly name Kuhstoss (Cow-kick), which seems to me to be a disfigurement of the Latin Custos. The forefathers of Mr. Kuhstoss very probably had the name of Wächter (Watchman). But still more amusing is the history of the name Pflaumbaum (Plum-tree). The bearer of that name, a gentleman dwelling in a well-known commercial town of North Germany, some time ago applied for leave to change his name to Blei (Lead). He referred to the chronicle of his family, which proved that one of his ancestors, named Blei, chose to have the Latin translation of his name Plumbum. To his descendants, who had no knowledge of the Latin language, Plumbum sounded like the low German Plumbôm, which in high German is Pflaumbaum.—Yours respectfully, RUDOLF TOMBO, Ph. D.

Notes.

A POSTHUMOUS insurance for great men against incompetent or disreputable biographers would cheer many a deathbed. Every admirer of Edwin M. Stanton, for example, must regret that his life is to be written by George C. Gorham, formerly Secretary of the United States Senate. We are bound to add, though we do so with regret, that Mr. Stanton's family have selected or given authority to Mr. Gorham. This is not the case with the Life of Beecher in preparation by Joseph Howard, jr. Mr. Beecher's wife, son, and son-in-law have undertaken the only biography which will have the sanction of the family. It will be published by Charles L. Webster & Co.

'Mosby's War Reminiscences, and Stuart's Cavalry Campaigns,' by John S. Mosby, is announced by Geo. A. Jones & Co., Boston.

D. Lothrop & Co. have in press a translation of De Vogüé's 'Russian Novelists'; and 'Life among the Germans,' by an American girl student.

'Woodland Tales,' by the author of the 'Buchholz Family'; and 'Reminiscences of a Grandfather; or, the Recent Past Viewed from a Southern Standpoint,' by Richard Hooker Wilmer, Bishop of Alabama (whose dedication is to Jefferson Davis), will shortly be issued by Thomas Whittaker.

Ticknor & Co. announce for publication on April 16 'Ancient Legends, Mystic Charms, and Superstitions of Ireland,' by Lady Wilde ("Speranza"), with a chapter on the ancient races of Ireland, by the late Sir William Wilde, in two volumes.

Charles Scribner's Sons have in press 'Word-Studies in the New Testament,' by Dr. Marvin R. Vincent; and 'In Ole Virginia,' by Thomas Nelson Page. The American edition of the 'Life and Writings of Anne Gilchrist,' by her son, will bear the imprint of Scribner & Welford.

'A Romance of Providence; being the History of the Church of the Strangers,' by its pastor, the Rev. Chas. F. Deems, will be published by Wilbur B. Ketcham.

If the stale anecdotes out of books, the weak satire of the medical profession, the overdone invalidism, and the catalogue of a model library à la the best hundred books, had been left out of 'A Club of One' (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), there would have remained some few pages of commonplace observation on trivial matters. The "Club" consisted, it seems, of One; it was an excellent limit. We find nothing else in the volume that calls for special commendation.

'Notes on the New York Law of Life Insurance,' by Charles B. Alexander (Baker, Voorhis & Co.), is the modest and accurate title of a thin volume, of a little over a hundred pages of text, which will be useful to any one who wishes to know the main points of the law of New York on the subject named. It does not pretend to be a formal treatise upon the subject.

Mr. J. C. Summers's 'Who Won?' is a handy official record of the yachting season of 1886. It contains much other pertinent information in regard to this form of sport, like the "Chronology," which goes back to 1844, when the New York Yacht Club was formed; or like the tide-tables, or the signal code, or the weather-service's mnemonic rhymes, etc. There is an "indotype" of the Mayflower, and colored flags in great variety. The little volume is prettily printed.

We observe no other changes in the new edition of Loomis's 'Index Guide to Travel and Art Study in Europe' (Scribners) than the admission of advertisements—not puffs—at the end, and the replacing of two small maps of London and Paris by larger folding ones. To the excellence of this illustrated work we have frequently called attention during the past five years.

'Professor Johnny,' by "Jak" (Crowell & Co.) is one of that excellent class of stories for boys which do not depend upon exciting incidents for their interest. The greater part of the book is taken up with the description of the doings of children at the seashore, in the course of which the author manages to introduce considerable information about the elements of chemistry.

Indexes multiply, and indeed there cannot well be too many of them—"'scusin'" (as they say down South) the triple index to (the old) Scribner's and the Century (1870-85), where one alphabet should have unlocked the thirty volumes. The Leonard Scott Publication Co., Philadelphia, began with January a Quarterly Index to their reprints of the Contemporary, Nineteenth Century, Fortnightly, Blackwood, Edinburgh, Scottish, Quarterly, and Westminster, and also to their own publication, Shakespeariana. This is a real service, and we cannot doubt that it will be supported. The entries are by subject, with classifications, as, Art, Biography, Books Reviewed, Irish Question, etc. The authors' names are given where they can be, with the month, volume, and page of the periodical in parallel columns.

Mr. J. H. Hickcox's 'Catalogue of Government Publications' (Washington, 906 M St.) has, for want of adequate support, not been issued monthly of late. The thick No. 7–12 of vol. ii is before us, with index and supplement—the latter giving the titles of all the public acts passed at the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress. Mr. Hickcox states that 34,486,926 copies of all publications were printed during the fiscal year 1885–86, at an average cost (engraving and binding included) of 3 cents per copy. In this department of Congressional activity, as in Nature, enough cannot be had without too much; but Mr. Hickcox justly remarks that the wasteful excess of Government printing is partly the result of ignorance of the probable demand. The law permits advance orders for public documents at a fixed price, but makes no provision for informing the public as to the documents about to be issued. Mr. Hickcox purposes to make such announcement a new feature of his Catalogue, and feels justified at the same time in enlarging his subscription price to $5. We sincerely hope he will obtain the requisite support.

In the April number of the Book Buyer Mr. Laurence Hutton begins a series of papers on "extra-illustrating"—Grangerizing, as it is technically termed, after the author of the 'Bibliographical History.' These pleasant essays will be amply illustrated.

In the April New Englander a general account is given of the late Wilhelm Scherer's library, which has been purchased by Adelbert College of Western Reserve University, at Cleveland, O. It is very diversified, but is particularly strong in comparative and Germanic philology; phonetics; German and French literature; Goethe literature; history, and philosophy.

In the Overland Monthly for April one may read a long and appreciative notice of the late Prof. E. R. Sill, a frequent contributor to this magazine, as he was an occasional writer for the Nation. His Pacific Coast friendships appear to have been very strong and enduring. Many examples of his verse are cited in the paper in question.

A very fair inquiry into the ownership of a second folio of Shakspere owned by Mr. C. F. Gunther, Chicago, and having pasted on a fly-leaf a seeming autograph of the dramatist, is made in Shakespeariana for April, by Mr. E. P. Vining. The genuineness of the autograph is left undecided.

The Revue Internationale for February 25 contains the fourth instalment of the extracts it is publishing from the 'Journal intime' of Benjamin Constant. This number is doubly interesting—first, for what it reveals concerning his novel of 'Adolphe,' and secondly for the continuation of the story of his relations with Mme. de Staël, constantly becoming more and more tempestuous. It is the story told over again of Voltaire and the Marquise du Châtelet, of Alfred de Musset and George Sand, of Liszt and the Comtesse d'Agoult; but told at the moment by one of the two actors, with all the fire and passion of a very present irritation. Quite as vivid and dramatic as these volcanic ruptures and appeasements are the passages concerning Mme. Dutertre, becoming more frequent and more ardent throughout the number, and finally culminating in a secret marriage, May 9, 1807. This is the date now given in a foot-note, but it was formerly given, apparently by Constant himself, as June 5, 1808. The question of dates, however, and even of the authenticity of certain previously published memoranda of Benjamin Constant for the years immediately following the close of the present extracts, is a very complicated one, and will add greatly to the interest of that part of the journal in which Mme. Récamier is about to appear.

A new review is announced which will interest Romance philologists. It will be called the Revue des Patois Gallo-Romans, and will be under the direction of M. J. Gilleron and the Abbé Rousselot. It promises also to appeal to the Folklorists by publishing popular tales, songs, and proverbs collected within the limits of ancient Gaul and of the past and present French colonies where there may be traces of French dialects or traditions. This last is a comparatively unexplored field.

The last number of Petermann's Mitteilungen contains an account by Dr. Plagemann of the mountain basin of the river Cachapoal in Chili, and an interesting description of a recent journey to the district of Fayum in Egypt, by R. Buchta. On the northern shore of the lake Birket el Kerun, regarded by most geographers as the ancient Moeris, he visited the extensive ruins of a Roman city. In an immense mound of fragments of pottery, there were numerous pieces of vases with a superb turquoise blue glaze, and very white glass richly enamelled. In a supplementary number is given an account of a journey in the mountains of Daghestan, by Dr. Radde of Tiflis. It has very full details as to the flora and ornithology of this little-known province, as well as entertaining descriptions of the village life of the hardy and unruly Lesghians.

Sir Francis de Winton, Administrator-General of the Congo Free State from 1884 to 1886, describes, in the Scottish Geographical Magazine for March, a curious religious and social revolution among the Balubas, a tribe living on one of the southern tributaries of the Congo. They have given up their fetish worship, and, in order to put a stop to the excessive drinking of palm-juice wine which accompanied their religious rites, they have cut down all their palm trees. Drunkenness and theft have been made capital crimes, and "the sole punishment" of the country is "the smoking of hemp, the culprits under the sentence of death being compelled to smoke it until they dropped."

There has just been published in Stockholm the first part of a work entitled 'Three Years on the Congo,' descriptive of the part taken by the Swedes in the founding of the new State, thirty-three having been officers of the various stations in addition to missionaries and travellers. Of the three authors, one, Mr. Gleerup, has just returned to Europe after crossing the continent from west to east in seven months. So great an interest has been awakened in Sweden in African colonization that an expedition has been organized to acquire territory in some yet unappropriated part of the country south of the desert of Sahara. The expedition, which will start from the Cameroons, is expected to be absent about a year, and will include several scientific men.

Phonetische Studien is the title of Wilhelm Vietor's new journal of scientific and practical phonetics, with contributions in English, German, and French (Marburg; New York: Westermann).

We have received from Rand, McNally & Co., Chicago, a "new official railroad map" of the United States and Canada, folded in covers; and a new edition of their Commercial Map of the same countries, likewise folded, but on a larger scale, viz., fifty-five miles to the inch. The latter exhibits counties and railroad stations as well as most of the principal towns to a remarkable degree of fulness.

Somewhat more than a year ago we spoke of the several series of Indici e Cataloghi begun to be issued by the Italian Ministry of Public Instruction, the fourth being the Palatine Codices of the Royal National Central Library of Florence, of which Dr. D. Chilovi is prefect. This has been edited upon the list already published by Palermo in his 'I Manoscritti Palatini di Firenze ordinati ed esposti' (1853–1868), by Prof. Adolfo Bartoli, who has had occasion to repair the omissions and errors of his predecessor in describing these manuscripts anew. They number 488 in all, and five instalments only bring us to No. 252. It is no mean pleasure merely to glance at the abstracts, in which an abrupt line launches the mind upon a sea of speculation as to what may follow in the text, or what go before. Thus, the legend of St. Apollonius (Palat. 38) begins: "Uno Santo padre, il quale si chiamò appollonio e stava in thebaida"; and a homily of St. John Chrysostom's (22) ends: "Giammai non potranno nuocere a colui el quale da se medesimo non è offeso." Especially is the imagination free in the case of the sonnets and other verse signalized by their first lines, like the "Ongni barbuto non è degli Armini," of Bindo Bonichi. There are numerous copies of the rhymes of Petrarch and of Dante, of Lorenzo de' Medici, etc. The sixth series is complete in a single fascicolo; it is a list of the political journals of the peninsula which the press law compels to be deposited in the National Library—"raccolta importantissima di fonti non ispregevoli per la storia generale e particolare." In the seventh series is begun a catalogue of the valuable Codici Panciatichiani, never before undertaken. It starts off with Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio.

M. Alcide Darras, docteur en droit, has just published a bulky work, 'Du Droit des Auteurs et des Artistes dans les rapports internationaux' (Paris: Arthur Rousseau; New York: F. W. Christern). This is a complete statement of the present condition of international copyright throughout the civilized world. A glance through its pages will suffice to show that in the recognition of authors' rights the United States lags far behind nations which we are wont to look down on as stagnant and effete. Perhaps the most profitable passage of M. Darras's book just now for us Americans is the account of the copyright relations of France and Belgium. For a long time Belgium was to France much as the United States is now to Great Britain—with the important exception that Belgium had very few authors of her own, and had therefore to rely on France for her literature. In spite of trade protests, Belgium at last signed a treaty with France in 1852; and the evidence is now abundant that the Belgian trade has not suffered in any way by the recognition of the French author's rights and by the abolition of pirating, but that it has, on the contrary, prospered under the new state of affairs.

W. R. Jenkins, New York, has added 'La Belle-Nivernaise,' by Alphonse Daudet, to his very pretty collection of "Contes choisis." It will interest the young as being the story of an old boat and its crew, the crew being one man with a wooden leg. It may interest the old as having something of Daudet's manner, mitigated for the occasion. When it is considered that 'La Belle-Nivernaise' was published just before Christmas in Paris for ten francs, and that it is now offered for 25 cents, the American public may be said to be promptly and cheaply served.

In the Nation of March 24 we noticed the first volume of the new edition of Pascal's complete works, to be edited by Prosper Faugère. This veteran of Pascal literature has just died at the age of seventy-six. He made his début in letters in 1835, with an essay on the life of La Rochefoucauld-Liancourt, and later obtained the highest academic honors by papers on L'Hôpital, Gerson, and Pascal. In 1844 he published what may be considered as the editio princeps of the 'Pensées,' thanks to his judicious and honest use of the original manuscript. He also published the letters of Pascal's two sisters and those of his niece, besides an edition of the memoirs of Madame Roland, and the letters of La Mère Agnès (Arnauld) of Port-Royal. He was also the author of various occasional pamphlets of a semi-political character, and a contributor to the Temps and the Correspondant.

Nadson, who died on the 29th of January, was the most sympathetic and gifted of the young Russian poets. He began writing at the age of nine. His poems, when first published in the newspapers, became very popular among the mass of readers, after having been joyfully welcomed by a small private circle, and on their appearance in book form he became a great favorite. His mother was descended from some legendary Tatar khan; he suspected his grandfather or great-grandfather (as he says in an autobiography, prepared a couple of years ago) to have been a Jew. Ill health forced him to leave the army in 1884, and seek the shores of the Mediterranean and the Crimea, after having vainly tried to fill the post of teacher in a village school and secretary to a journal. He was suspected of feigning ill health and melancholy for the sake of art, and the attacks upon him were numerous and savage, the last having appeared only three days before his death. He was born in 1862, and had just passed his twenty-fourth birthday at the time of his death.

The publication of Turgeneff's letters to P. V. Annenkoff, while it does not materially supplement the volume issued in 1885 by the Society for Aiding Needy Authors, sets him in a somewhat different light. His judgments of literary productions are almost invariably unfavorable, which is not the case in the volume referred to. He is almost always in need of money, and a great part of his correspondence seems to have been devoted to this subject. Of his own work he speaks occasionally, though not at length. Of 'Fathers and Sons' he writes in 1862: "I can only say that I stand in utter amazement at its effect. It is not that I rejoice—there is nothing in particular to rejoice at—but for the first time I am seriously pleased with my work, although I have a feeling that I stand on one side, and that some one else, who had to do it, and into whose hands I and my romance fell, dashed it off." "Trebly dyed nonsense" is the term which he applies to Victor Hugo's 'Travailleurs de la Mer.' When reading Count Tolstoi's 'War and Peace,' his comment is: "Impossible, impossible, impossible!" (as nearly as the word can be rendered). His meaning is explained in another letter. He objects to "the monotonous harping on the same identical sensations, such as, 'Am I, or am I not, a coward?' and the psychology in general, while admitting that the history—the focus—is admirable, and that all the military and social descriptions are of the first order. "Such another master as Tolstoi does not exist among us," he says.

—The two issues of the 'American Catalogue are, it is well known, to be continued at five-yearly intervals from 1884. Meantime the book trade has naturally desired something more convenient than the bound volumes of the Publishers' Weekly, or than the collection of catalogues known as the 'Publishers' Trade-List Annual.' An experiment has therefore been made which is interesting, first of all, on the mechanical side. The scheme of 'The Annual American Catalogue, 1886,' involved an alphabetical arrangement by authors of all the book entries in the Publishers' Weekly during the year in question, with full titles and descriptive notes (sometimes extracts from critical notices). To reset these would have cost more than could be recovered by sales, and the ingenious device was resorted to of deftly pasting the entries together in their new order, in double columns corresponding to a page of the Weekly, and obtaining a plate from these by means of photography. We should add that a further economy was attained by printing direct from the hardened gelatine plate, thus dispensing with metal. The result is of course inferior to the ordinary press work, but much less so than might have been expected; and while continuous reading would not be agreeable to the eye, for reference the print is distinct enough. So much for the first half of the Catalogue. Mr. Bowker was not content to stop there, but has added an index by author, title, and subject, thus meeting every want of the bookseller. This portion had to be set anew. The publishers themselves contribute lists of their issues for 1886. Whether the 'American Annual Catalogue' for 1887 will ever appear, depends on the reception given to this forerunner. The trade can hardly be so indifferent to its own advantage, or to the disinterestedness of the compilers and publishers, as to make this first volume unremunerative.

—Mr. Edward Atkinson continues his popular economical papers in the April Century by putting and answering the question, How much more would the laborers get if they should take all the profits? He estimates that they now obtain nine parts in ten of the entire product of the country, while of this last tenth a considerable portion also eventually goes to them. He charges a very large part of the present discontent to a misuse of the figures of the census of 1880, and himself passes some noticeable criticisms upon these figures as they stand, independently of any ignorant handling of them. At the end of his analysis he makes the points that the money value of what the laborers are straining for is much smaller than is supposed by them, and that the prospective usefulness of this sum by its application to production is greater, when left in the hands of the capitalists, than would be the case if it were dispersed among the laborers. The effectiveness of capital under the present rules of distribution brings about that increase of production which is the real gain and underlies the advance of the working classes. The position is stated with much force, but with too little clearness for the ordinary reader; the large class of those who are interested, but only slightly familiar with the general subject, are the writer's proper audience. He expresses his views of the present prosperity of the country in broad terms; never has there been, he says, so large a product at so low a cost relative to the investment, so low a rate of profit on capital maintaining activity, so high a rate of wages in proportion to the hours, a dollar that would buy so much; and, finally, never has the workman received so large a share of the total product. In view of all this, he concludes that "the disturbers of labor have about exhausted their temporary power of mischief," and that the "organizations" are "now assuming their true and beneficent function, to wit: that of schools of inquiry." This last, certainly, must be set down as optimistic.

— The English Illustrated Magazine for April (Macmillan) contains some original Sheridan papers, which were saved at the time of the Drury Lane fire in 1809, and, after remaining for sixty years unknown, are now first published. The new matter, which is a selection from the whole mass, consists of letters written to Sheridan by his wife, from the time of their secret marriage in France in 1772 to her death in 1792. Many of them are love letters, and one reads the story of the romantic attachment of the young lovers, and of their hard-hearted parents' persecution and intrigue to prevent their union, as if it were a sentimental novel of that time. It is a delightful exhibition of natural feeling, in a style that has become to us as artificial as the opera, and revives the dead past most dramatically. The letters written in the latter portion of their wedded life are more important for Sheridan's memory, as their general mood of confidence and affection puts an end to the statement that he had alienated her heart and made her miserable by his irregularities. The correspondence will light up future biographies. A memorandum of Sheridan's, also given, clears up somewhat the mystery of his purchase of Drury Lane of Garrick and Lacy. It has to do only with the affair with Lacy, but it seems that Garrick was the holder of the large mortgage on his partner's moiety and let it remain, and that the sale was practically forced and the price exorbitant. The share of Garrick as friend and adviser in this transaction lends more color to the old report, discredited by Moore, that he stood behind Sheridan in the first instance and made the terms easy to be met. The account of the second purchase is minutely rendered, with some comments by Sheridan. The whole article is an admirable piece of biography, and shows its hero in an attractive light, without making either a caricature or an idol of him.

—The Overland Monthly for March has a timely and interesting memorial of Virgil Williams, one of the pioneers of art in California. It is by a deaf and dumb pupil of Williams, and is mainly a collection of the notes of instruction, written in order that the deaf mute might read. Mr. Williams's life was passed in what is in the main an excellent milieu for an artist who has acquired a system and mastered the indispensable technique, but a bad one for a beginner, viz., Rome. In the old days much more than now, the Eternal City attracted more than any other locality the artists of all countries. One did not have much opportunity to learn what was most important to learn, viz., sound technical methods, but the city was most picturesque in its ensemble, surrounded with material which seemed to have grown up by the rules of art on purpose to make pictures, and the galleries were full of works by the old masters which were considered the types that all young artists must follow. But Rome was especially attractive to the speculative painters, men who dreamed much and thought much about art in the abstract, and occasionally one met men who, never having painted a tolerable picture, had their heads full of the philosophy of art. This intercourse made a kind of education of which the Caffè Greco was the university, and there in the winter evenings general assembly was held for the benefit of who would participate. Like many American artists of that day, Williams passed those years of his life when, if ever, a man is learning a method, in Rome, where no method could be learned; and, like most American artists of his day, he had a good theoretical idea of art without ever attaining a high position as a painter. His ideas, as recorded by his deaf-mute pupil, have now and then the stamp of his school in incisive clearness. There is a note on Fortuny which was prophetic. "When I said that Mr. Moore was most enthusiastic about Fortuny, saying that he was the greatest painter of all ages, Mr. Williams wrote out: 'I am aware of that, but I think the school of Fortuny is a fashion.'" This is so true that today even in Rome, where Fortuny reigned supreme, his influence has entirely gone—he is out of fashion. Many of Williams's sayings will be recognized by all who are to the manner born as sound maxims of art: "No one with an artistic temperament but experiences periods of great dejection and corresponding elation—we must take the bitter with the sweet. If the ecstasy of drunkenness were not followed by reaction and pain, the whole world [the whole world that has the artistic temperament] would be continually and gloriously drunk." "That book ['Ruskin on Painting'] is very pleasant reading for young ladies, but you will get no practical benefit from it. The author is a charming descriptive writer, but a conceited and prejudiced old ass—he is in art what Carlyle was in literature—both of them captious, arrogant, prejudiced, egotistical, and clever men." "You (I was three months working at Venus of Milo [sic]) have one thing to congratulate yourself on, that you have learned to love this Venus. It is only the artist who really appreciates her beauties. It is a custom among dilettanti to gush over her, but they only follow the lead of artists." But, as if to enjoin due caution in regard to the judgments of a man whose intellectual value was mainly that acquired from his association, he couples with just recommendation of the 'Thoughts on Art' of Hamerton, Jarves's 'Lectures on Grecian Art'—books which, so far as first-hand and secure opinion on art are concerned, are the antipodes of art literature.

—Les Lettres et les Arts (Paris: Boussod, Valadon et Cie.; New York: Charles Scribner's Sons) offers a new aspect to its readers with every fresh issue. This time it is more novel than usual. The one serious article of the number for March is as fantastic, at least in its suggestions, as a very serious writer could well make a very serious subject. It is "Le Philosophe Érasme," by M. Jules Zeller of the Institute, the historian and critic, and it continues to a certain extent another article by him which appeared in the revue for April, 1886, "La Renaissance en Allemagne." The illustrations are all after original engravings by Hans Holbein, even the ornamental letters at the beginning of paragraphs being from the alphabet of his "Dance of Death." Some pages of music, "Pantomime," by Victorin Joncières, and a sonnet and landscape, both by Lansyer the artist, precede and follow this article, separating it from the rest of the contents of the number, which is entirely fiction, contrary to the custom of the revue. Of this, by far the best contribution is the first part of a story by M. Paul Perret, "Mademoiselle de Bardelys," one of the very few returns to the historical romance of the first half of the century that have been made in recent years, and a very successful attempt to combine the interest of the heroic adventures of the past school with the depth of sentiment of the present. The style is that of a few writers among the impressionistes, but not carried to any offensive excess; and the illustrations, of which there are many, are impressionist also in the extreme, but they are certainly effective. They give the idea of a richness and vividness of coloring, and an intensity and depth of expression, which are surprising when the really dim colors and vague outlines are carefully observed. Very unlike these, but in another way quite as fantastic, is the frontispiece, a portrait in water-colors, by Boutet de Monvel, of Mlle. Hélène de Rothschild, a little girl four or five years old, in which this artist's curious combination of excessive realism with excessive conventionality is conspicuous. Nothing more unreal as a work of art could be produced, and yet the little childish face in the midst of it all has an almost startling effect of life and reality.

—The 'Antiquities of the Minusinsk Museum: Relics of the Age of Metals,' by D. Klementz (Tomsk, 1884), and an Atlas of the same (1886), both published by Ivan Kuznetzoff, are books of interest to archæologists. The Minusinsk Museum has only been in existence for about ten years, although the district of Western Siberia in which it is situated has long been an object of curiosity to scientific men, archæologists, and naturalists, on account of its natural features and the interesting remains of antiquity found there. A brief account of the founding of the Museum is given by Mr. Martyanoff. At first, as the funds were inadequate, there was no thought of collecting local antiquities, but during the Museum's first year of existence a gift in that department from Mr. Kuznetzoff was followed by others, so that the authorities felt it to be their duty to go on. In the course of six years, only 600 rubles have been expended in the acquisition of antiquities, yet the archæological section now contains 3,630 articles, principally of copper, bronze, gold, silver, and iron. The catalogue before us, which contains a topographical chart of the valley of the Yenisei, confines itself to descriptions of the plates, an account of the archæological remains of the district from personal observations, sundry facts about the peoples who anciently inhabited the Minusinsk region, etc. "The Upper Yenisei," Mr. Martyanoff says, "is separated from that great source of the culture of antiquity, China, by a long series of steppes and nomad settlements. The ruins which have descended to us from the ancient inhabitants of the Minusinsk region consist, (1) of funeral mounds, scattered all over the southern part of the Yenisei Government, North Mongolia, the Altai region, and West Siberia; (2) of the remains of ancient constructions, earthen walls, the ruined remains of irrigating canals, stone carvings, statues, inscribed stones, cliff rock faces covered with drawings and inscriptions, abandoned excavations and mines. In addition to these, ancient iron, gold, silver, bronze, and stone implements are constantly being turned up in agricultural operations and in the river drift, all over the southern part of the Yenisei Government. In one word, there are here rich treasures of archæology, which remain almost completely unknown up to the present day." Mr. Kuznetzoff gives his own impressions of some of these, amplifying the description and classification of the tumuli given by Radloff, and says that studies on the subject have been very fragmentary and insufficient. He also furnishes a description of the opening of these tumuli, mines, and ruins, and of the objects found in them, as well as of statues, miscellaneous articles, and pictures. The catalogue contains a list of metal objects, supplemented by a description of some of clay, bone, etc., with the places where they were found, and exact measurements both outside and in. This is the first scientific work of the sort to make its appearance in Siberia.

ROBERT E. LEE.—I.

Memoirs of Robert E. Lee. His Military and Personal History, etc. By A. L. Long, formerly military secretary to Gen. Lee, afterwards Brig.-Gen. and Chief of Artillery, Second Corps, Army of Northern Virginia; together with incidents relating to his private life subsequent to the war, collected and edited with the assistance of Marcus J. Wright, formerly Brig.-Gen. Army of Tennessee, and agent of the United States for the collection of Confederate Records. Illustrated 8vo, pp. 707. New York: J. M. Stoddart & Co. 1887.

SEVERAL volumes of Memoirs of Gen. Lee, either military or personal, have been written, but none of them can be said to be fully authoritative. The present one has certain advantages over most of those that have preceded it. Its writer, Gen. Long, as military secretary to Lee at the beginning of his career in the Confederate armies, had some positive advantages in his intimate relations with his chief, and has been able to give many incidents illustrating his personal character and habits of mind which are both interesting and valuable. It is going rather far, however, to claim, as the publishers do, that it is in substance a "consummation" of Lee's own purpose to write his autobiography. The book is still a compilation, in which the work of others has been freely used, though the material is welded together so as to make a fairly smooth-flowing narrative. The authoritative biography of Lee is yet to be written, and it has been stated that Col. Charles Marshall, the General's last military secretary, is selected by the family for the task. The greatest value of Gen. Long's book is found in the reminiscences of his personal association with Lee, and in his reports of the conduct and opinions of his chief as they were seen and heard by himself. The narrative of Lee's early life and his service in the army of the United States prior to the civil war is also more full than usual, and therefore more acceptable.

It is probably impossible for any writer, whether a Northern or a Southern man, to make an impartial estimate of Robert E. Lee's character as a man or as a soldier. The earnest Union man cannot wholly ignore the question of duty to the national Government owed by its military officers in 1861; and his mind refuses assent to the proposition that to throw off the uniform and take arms against the flag under which he had been educated and served as a soldier, involved no moral wrong. The earnest Confederate, on the other hand, exaggerates the preëminence of his hero, and hardly stops short of apotheosis in his praises. The time will doubtless come when the characters of our civil war will be analyzed with as impartial a criticism as that with which we now deal with the Commonwealth men and the Royalists of the seventeenth century, and with as little prejudice based upon sympathy or antipathy; but it is not yet. We owe it to our intellectual self-respect to make the sincere effort to be fair in our judgments and to put off our prejudices, but we also owe it to candor to admit that complete success in the effort is hardly possible.

When the civil war opened, Robert E. Lee was fifty-four years old, and Lieutenant-Colonel in the army. He was already beyond the age which was regarded as best fitted for command in the field, for the domination of ideas derived from Napoleonic history was then complete in our army, and men would have laughed at the idea of a campaign like the Franco-Prussian one, in which hardly a single general officer of either army was much less than sixty. But Lee was a man of most temperate life and robust body, and was younger than most men of his years. His only field service had been in the Mexican war, and almost the whole of his military life had been spent in duty as an engineer. His mind was sound and well-balanced, his personal character was pure, he was a sincerely religious man, dignified and reticent. The general testimony of those who knew him best would seem to make his reputation as an officer a solid and trustworthy one more than one of brilliancy or what is called genius. His family descent and his marriage into the Custis family gave him consideration and influence, as they naturally might, and jealousy might easily argue that he owed no small part of his standing and prestige to such accidents of fortune. The truth, however, seems to be that he deserved all the reputation he had, and that those who came nearest to him were most impressed with his worthiness and fitness for larger responsibilities than any he had borne. Gen. Scott's partiality for him was well known, and designated him without exception as the fittest man to succeed himself in the chief command of the army.

Arlington, the inheritance of Mrs. Lee and the home of Lee and his family, was in what had been the District of Columbia till the part south of the Potomac was ceded back to Virginia, and it would be hard to find a man who might more properly be considered a citizen of the United States rather than a citizen of any State. His life-long service in the army, his indirect connection with Washington's family, his home at the national capital, all seemed to separate him from local ties and bind him to the whole country.

In the case of Gen. Scott, himself a Virginian, somewhat similar circumstances made friend and foe feel, as he felt himself, that no State had any claim upon him; he belonged to the United States. There was, however, this difference, that Scott had no children, while Lee had a large family of sons and daughters, some of whom were in early manhood and womanhood when their father had to make his momentous decision. That this may have been, nay, that it probably was, the turning-weight in the balance, may be fairly concluded from Lee's own words. Social influences were almost omnipotent in the South in those days, and the young of both sexes far outran their elders in making secession sentiments the test of social standing. A man of prominence with a large family circle found his judgment and his purposes drawn by numerous strong cords of influence which the childless or the isolated would not have felt. The enthusiasm of youth committed itself, heart and soul, to a cause that graybeards sadly wagged their heads over, and often made their own only with reluctance.

Lee was as far as possible removed from being a secessionist in theory. He was a slaveholder, and looked upon the anti-slavery movement as an aggression and unjustifiable; but he did not regard secession as either the practical or lawful remedy. He wrote to his son in January, 1861:

"Secession is nothing but revolution. The framers of our Constitution never exhausted so much labor, wisdom, and forbearance in its formation, and surrounded it with so many guards and securities, if it was intended to be broken by every member of the Confederacy at will. It is intended for 'perpetual union,' so expressed in the preamble, and for the establishment of a government, not a compact, which can only be dissolved by revolution, or the consent of all the people in convention assembled."

Still, he added that if the revolution should come and the Union be in fact disrupted, "I shall return to my native State and share the miseries of my people, and, save in defence, will draw my sword on none."

At the time he wrote this letter he was on military duty in Texas, where for the most of the preceding year he was in command of the Department; Gen. Twiggs, the Commandant, being off duty by reason of ill health. There, Lee used the same language to his friends, as we learn from the conclusive testimony of Charles Anderson, brother of Gen. Robert Anderson and afterwards Governor of Ohio. Col. Anderson has published his reminiscences of the events attending the pretended secession of Texas, in a pamphlet entitled 'Texas Before and on the Eve of Rebellion.' He was a personal friend and sincere admirer of Lee, and received as much of his confidence as any one was likely to receive in such a time from a man who was struggling with the terrible problem of duty in such a case, and who was by nature one whose "grave, cold dignity of bearing, and the prudential reserve of whose manners, rather chilled over-early or over-much intimacy." He gives us as the substance of Lee's statements to him the following: "If Virginia stands by the old Union, so will I. But if she secedes (though I do not believe in secession as a constitutional right, nor that there is a sufficient cause for a revolution), then I will still follow my native State, with my sword, and if need be with my life."

No sooner was Lincoln elected than Gen. Twiggs, although in no better health than during the year before, resumed command. This was on the 27th of November, 1860, and it seems clear that it was done by direction of Floyd, then Secretary of War, a Virginian of different fibre from Robert E. Lee, and who was quite capable of conspiring with Twiggs and with the secession element of Texas to surrender the troops and the property of the United States, of which they both were officers. Lee could not be used for such a purpose. The surrender was finally made, as Anderson informs us, not to the State authorities of Texas, but to a committee appointed by the Knights of the Golden Circle, who were then conspiring to revolutionize the State against Sam. Houston, the Governor, who was too much of a Union man for them. These gentry even informed Col. Lee "that, unless he would then and there engage to resign his commission in the United States Army, and to take one under the Confederate authority, he should not have transportation for his effects (which were bulky and valuable) to the coast." This Lee himself told to Anderson "in greatest agitation of indignation." He scornfully rejected such terms, and left his personal property behind him, requesting Anderson to try to have it forwarded after him at his private cost.

Lee reached Arlington, on his return from Texas, some time in March, 1861, and was registered in the Adjutant-General's office as on leave, awaiting orders. He seems to have avoided society, and even to have held aloof from Gen. Scott. He was painfully awaiting the effect the Southern revolution might have upon Virginia, and reflecting upon the difficult task of deciding his own course. The most authentic account of his interview with Scott (for there seems to have been but one) is given by Gen. E. D. Townsend in his 'Anecdotes of the Civil War.' Gen. Townsend was then upon Scott's staff, and says that on the 18th of April the General asked if he had seen Lee lately, adding, "It is time he should show his hand, and, if he remains loyal, should take an important command." Townsend wrote a note to Lee intimating Scott's wish to see him at headquarters, and on the 19th Lee called. By Scott's desire, Townsend, who was at a desk in the same room, remained and was witness to the conversation. Scott urged the duty laid upon all to declare their position, and his opinion of the fatal mistake made by those who resigned from the army to take part with the seceding States. To repeated forms of putting this, Lee made no reply, and Scott, naturally interpreting the silence as proof of an unfavorable purpose, said, probably with some asperity, "I suppose you will go with the rest. If you purpose to resign, it is proper you should do so at once; your present attitude is an equivocal one." Lee then responded, "General, the property belonging to my children, all they possess, lies in Virginia. They will be ruined if they do not go with their State. I cannot raise my hand against my children." It is fair to interpret his silence as evidence of the severity of the internal struggle which had now come to a crisis, and not to a moody antagonism. There is no doubt that he deeply loved the Union, and that he regarded secession as unjustifiable revolution. In an agony of conflicting emotions, it was personal sympathies and feelings which most powerfully affected him, for he did not wish Virginia to secede, and had no political sympathy with those who were trying to force her to go with the South. It therefore most naturally took to his mind the concrete form of personal and family ties, binding him to a fate which he accepted, but could not affirmatively choose. It was not that he desired to go with the revolutionists, but that he could not fight against them, since this would involve raising his hand against his children.

The resignation which he wrote on the 20th of April refers to the interview as on the 18th (two days thus intervening), and says: "It would have been presented at once, but for the struggle it has cost me to separate myself from a service to which I have devoted the best years of my life and all the ability I possessed." He ended by saying, "Save in the defence of my native State, I never desire again to draw my sword." The mental process we have tried to portray appears in a letter to his sister, Mrs. Marshall of Baltimore, written on the same day with his resignation, and which is also quoted by Gen. Long. He says:

"The whole South is in a state of revolution into which Virginia, after a long struggle, has been drawn; and, though I recognize no necessity for this state of things, and would have forborne and pleaded to the end for redress of grievances, real or supposed, yet in my own person I had to meet the question whether I should take part against my native State. With all my devotion to the Union, and the feeling of loyalty and duty of an American citizen, I have not been able to make up my mind to raise my hand against my relatives, my children, my home. I have therefore resigned my commission in the army, and, save in defence of my native State, with the sincere hope that my poor services may never be needed, I hope I may never be called on to draw my sword."

On the 22d of April the Virginia Convention confirmed his appointment as "Commander-in-chief of the naval and military forces of this commonwealth," and the President of the Convention, fitting his words to what it may be presumed he knew of Lee's frame of mind, declared that "Virginia placed her sword in your hand upon the implied condition—which we know you will keep to the letter and in the spirit—that you will draw it only in defence." Lee, in his reply accepting the position, again reiterates, "I devote myself to the service of my native State, in whose behalf alone will I ever again draw my sword."

Lee's character and subsequent career cannot be thoroughly understood unless we take full account of all the opinions and feelings which have thus been described. He was not using words at a venture, but meant all he said. He saw a revolution going on, he scouted the idea of a right of peaceable secession, he intimated that the South was exercised over supposed as well as real grievances. He had not lost his love for the Union, he avowed his feelings of loyalty and duty as an American citizen. But Virginia had taken the fatal step, and he could not decide to raise his hand against his relatives, his children, and his home. He resigned, hoping, as he himself afterwards wrote, "that some way would be found to save the country from the calamities of war," and with "no other intention than to pass the remainder of my life as a private citizen."

But events were moving rapidly, and a few days brought the call to lead in the defence of Virginia as an independent commonwealth. The costly and painful first step had been taken, and this seemed to follow logically from the other. He accepted the call, as we have seen, with the express reservation that he would act only in defence. Another short period (it is hard to realize that it was but two or three days), and Virginia entered the Confederacy. Lee's position was now anomalous, and we can easily believe he sincerely hoped to solve it by a return to private life. He was at the head of the Virginia forces, under a Virginia commission, but Virginia's troops were put at the disposal of the Confederacy. He did not take the field. Johnston and Beauregard already held Confederate commissions, and were in command of the troops gathering at Manassas and in the Shenandoah valley. Lee confined his labors to the organization and equipment of Virginia regiments, and it was not till after the battle of Bull Run that he accepted the commission of General in the army of the Confederate States. The time may come when we shall know something of his mental struggles and experiences during those three months: at present we can only conjecture them. The fatal logic of events had fastened Virginia to the revolutionary policy her people never approved, and Lee's defence of home had, step by step, become the championship of the cause he had declared legally unconstitutional and practically unwise and unnecessary.

TIME REFERENCES IN THE DIVINA COMMEDIA.

The Time References in the Divina Commedia, and their bearing on the assumed date and duration of the Vision. By the Rev. Edward Moore, D.D., Principal of St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, and Barlow Lecturer in University College, London. London: David Nutt. 1887. 16mo, pp. 134, with seven tables.

A FEW questions in literature are of perennial interest. Every generation will have its own library concerning the composition of the 'Iliad,' the allegory of the 'Divine Comedy,' the various readings of Shakspere's plays. The discussion of these problems is the more alluring and entertaining because there can be no hope of a solution of them that shall be final and universally satisfactory. Now and then some Wolf, Grote, Witte, or Coleridge brings such learning or imagination to bear upon the interpretation as to clear away many a difficulty, while he still leaves many unexplained. But, besides these main questions, there are subordinate ones, offering, very likely, a wide field for difference of opinion, but which well-applied industry and careful investigation may hope to solve. Their solution depends not so much upon keenness of literary insight and delicacy of literary perception, as on thorough examination of the text and intelligent inquiry into its significance. The little volume which Dr. Moore has just published, on the 'Time References in the Divina Commedia,' is an excellent example of good work in elucidating a matter on which great difference of opinion has existed, and yet about which a correct conclusion is of considerable importance for the proper understanding of the scheme of Dante's journey in the spiritual realms.

The question divides itself in two; the first relating to the date of the journey, the second to the time which it occupied. It is certain that there was no lack of clearness or definiteness in regard to these points in Dante's own mind, and certain, also, that his narrative is so consistent throughout that a positive conclusion in respect to them is to be arrived at, provided his statements concerning them be properly interpreted. These statements, however, are not only very numerous, but are often very obscure and susceptible of more than one interpretation. The mentions of time in the course of the journey refer sometimes to the position of the sun, sometimes to that of the moon, and the interpretation of the latter depends, of course, on the year in which the Vision took place and on the day of the month on which it is assumed to have begun. The turning-point of the discussion is therefore in respect to this year and to the day.

The evidence, both direct and collateral, that the year of the Vision was 1300, is convincing. The time of year was about the spring equinox (Inf. i, 38-40); the actual day on which the poet entered the Inferno was Good Friday (xxi, 112). It was on the morning of this day that, after a night passed in the dark wood, during which the light of the full moon had sometimes been of service to him (xx, 127), he undertook the ascent of the hill whose shoulders were touched by the rays of the rising sun (i, 16). Brief as is his account of his attempt to ascend it, this occupied many hours, so that not till late in the day, having retreated to the base of the hill and abandoned his undertaking, was he met by Virgil and encouraged by him to follow him as his guide through "the eternal place." The day was going (ii, 1) as the poets set out for the entrance of Hell. Dr. Moore bids the reader "observe in passing how significantly Dante enters the Inferno at nightfall, and both Purgatory and Paradise at daybreak, and, moreover, the earthly paradise as well."

The day, as we have said, was Good Friday. But did Dante intend the ideal Good Friday—that is, the 25th of March, which, according to a widespread belief, was the actual day of the crucifixion, as well as the day of the creation, and, according to the Julian calendar, of the vernal equinox, or "did he follow ordinary custom and refer to Good Friday as generally observed, which would be, in fact, April 8, in the year 1300"? In case the former supposition be adopted, he must have falsely assumed the existence of a full moon on the evening of March 24; while in case we assume the latter supposition as correct, we find that, according to the calendar of 1300, the full moon fell on the evening before Good Friday, as Dante describes it as doing. In this year, however, the full moon by the calendar was two days later than the real full moon, and the new question arises whether Dante attended to the absolute fact, or to the commonly received statement and understanding of it. The answer to this question is, as might be expected of a poet writing for a popular audience, that "all his allusions are to be connectedly and consistently explained as referring" to the date of the calendar moon, and not to that of the real moon. "To have adopted," says Dr. Moore, "any other than a popular computation of familiar celestial phenomena would not only be poetically superfluous, but positively misleading." Yet many commentators have puzzled themselves and their readers by endeavoring to adapt Dante's references to the moon to its astronomically correct position, and have endeavored to interpret the poem as if it were intended to have the accuracy of a scientific treatise.

Assuming, then, that the poet adopted the actual Good Friday of 1300 as the date of the day on the evening of which he entered Hell, and that he followed the calendar in its date for the full moon, we may reasonably assume further that Dante would find it sufficient for such exactness as was required by his poem to calculate, in a rough and popular way, the retardation of the moon behind the sun at about fifty minutes for each complete day. "Further, we should not be many minutes wrong if, at a distance of about twenty days from the calendar equinox, we assumed sunrise to be about 5:15 A. M., and sunset about 6:45 P. M." Taking for granted these various assumptions, we proceed, following Dr. Moore, to see how the principal time references of the poem agree with this scheme; and since it is impossible, within the limits of our space, to set forth his argument at length, we condense its results in the following table for the benefit of students of the poem who may not have access to Dr. Moore's essay:

INFERNO.

I., 16, 37. "The time was the beginning of the morning" (37). Sunrise, Good Friday, April 8.

II., 1. "The day was going," as the poets approach the entrance of Hell.

VII., 98. "Already every star is sinking." Past midnight, as Dante and Virgil leave the fourth circle.

XI., 113. "The Fishes are quivering upon the horizon." The constellation of the Pisces is setting, about 4 to 5 A. M., Saturday, April 9, as the poets descend from the sixth to the seventh circle.

XX., 125. The moon is setting, past 6 A. M., as they are leaving the fourth bolgia of the eighth circle.

XXI., 112. 7 A. M., in the fifth bolgia.

XXIX., 10. "Now the moon is beneath our feet." About 1 P. M. The poets are leaving the ninth bolgia. Dante "avoids all mention of the sun during his passage through the Inferno," and describes the hour by referring to the position of "the face of the lady who rules here" (x., 80)—that is, Hecate, who in Heaven is Luna.

XXXIV., 68. "But the night is reascending," as the poets depart from Hell, at the beginning of the night of Saturday.

XXXIV., 96. "And now the sun returns to middle tierce"—that is, about half-past 7 A. M. "This rapid change of twelve hours is due to the passage through the centre of the earth, as explained by Virgil in lines 106-118." The time, by change of hemisphere, has been put back twelve hours, so that it is now again the morning of Saturday. The reference to the sun indicates that Hell has been left.

XXXIV., 139. "Thence we came forth to rebehold the stars." The passage from the centre of the earth to its surface at the Mount of Purgatory has occupied (in brief narrative) the whole of the new Saturday and the night following. It is now early in the morning, before dawn, of Easter Sunday, April 10.

PURGATORIO.

I., 19-21. "The fair planet that to love incites, was making the whole orient to smile." Dawn, Easter Sunday, as the poets arrive at the shore of Purgatory.

II., 1. Sunrise. "Now had the sun reached the horizon," as the boat with the celestial pilot appears.

II., 55. "On every side the sun was darting forth the day," when the poets are addressed by the new comers.

III., 16. "The sun was flaming red," as Dante and Virgil approach the foot of the mountain.

IV., 15. "Full fifty degrees the sun had risen," 8:45 to 9 A. M., as they enter the upward path.

IV., 137-8. "The meridian is touched by the sun," as the poets go on through the Ante-Purgatory.

VII., 43, 85. "The day declines"; "the lessening sun seeks his nest." Still are the poets in the Ante-Purgatory.

VIII., 1. Twilight, in the Valley of the Kings.

VIII., 49. "The air was darkening." The end of the first day, Easter Sunday, in the Valley.

IX., 1-12. Moonrise, between 8:30 and 9 P. M. Falling asleep of Dante on the grass.

IX., 13. Early dawn of Easter Monday. Vision of the eagle.

IX., 44. "The sun more than two hours high," about 7:30 A. M. The poets at the door of Purgatory.

X., 14. Moonset, during the passage of the poets through the rocky pass from the gate of Purgatory to the first ledge.

XII., 81. Just past midday. "The sixth handmaid of the day returns from service," as the poets are leaving the first ledge—that where Pride is punished.

XV., 1. Past three o'clock P. M., as they pass from the second cornice, where Envy is purged away, to the third, which is that of Anger.

XV., 141. The sun is getting low: as they enter the bitter smoke of this ledge.

XVII., 9. The sun "was now setting" as they pass out of the smoke, and the stars "are appearing on many sides" (72) as they go up to the fourth ledge, where Sloth is punished.

XVIII., 76. "The moon, almost to midnight late," as a band of the slothful hurry by the poets, and, when they have passed, Dante falls asleep.

XIX., 1-6. Description of the hour before dawn of a new day—Tuesday, April 12—in which Dante has a vision of the Siren.

XIX., 37-39. "Full already of high day were all the circles of the sacred mountain" as the poets approach the entrance to the fifth ledge, where Avarice and Prodigality are punished. "Observe," says Dr. Moore, "the admirable fitness with which D. times his progress so that the time spent in the Cornice where Accidia or Spiritual Sloth is punished, is exactly coincident with the hours of night—'the night when no man can work.'"

XXII., 118. The fifth handmaiden of the day "was at the pole," guiding the car of day as Dante and Virgil are passing along the sixth cornice, that of Gluttony.

XXV., 1-3. About two o'clock indicated by the position of the sun, when the poets ascend the narrow stairway by which they pass to the seventh ledge, or that of Lust.

XXVI., 4-6. The sun is getting low as they proceed along this ledge.

XXVII., 1-5. "The day was going"; 63. "The sun departs and the evening comes"; 70-72, the darkness gradually closes in; 89-90, the stars were shining bright, as Tuesday, April 12, the third day spent in Purgatory ends, and, the poets having attained to its summit, Dante falls asleep and has the vision of Leah. 109. The dawn of the next day, and (112) "now the darkness fled away on every side," and the sun shines upon Dante's forehead (133) as he enters the Earthly Paradise.

XXXIII., 104. "The sun was holding the meridian circle" when Dante is led by Matilda to drink of the waters of Eunoë, restored by which he is "Pure and disposed to mount unto the stars." This was at noon of Wednesday.

PARADISO.

The Paradiso affords no such indications of time as are given in the Inferno and the Purgatorio, for in Paradise the poet has passed from time to eternity, and to a realm where there is no need of the dividing light of sun or moon, for there is no night there. Dante, however, in vv. 37-45 of the first canto of the Paradiso, indicates the earthly morning as the time when he entered Paradise; and if mane, the morning, is to be taken here in its natural sense, the interval from the noon of Wednesday to the morning of Thursday is not accounted for, and the imagination of the reader must fill it as best it can.

Two passages in the Paradiso, canto xxii, 151-153, and canto xxvii, 79-87, suggest the passage of time on earth during the poet's vision of Paradise, but the indications they give are vague; it is difficult, if not impossible, to draw from them a precise reference to time, and, so far as they admit of a literal interpretation, it is, as Dr. Moore says, "rather local than temporal." The whole situation is purely ideal. But Dr. Moore is inclined to infer from these passages that the stay in Paradise occupied a single earthly day, and that Dante found himself on earth again on the evening of Thursday, April 14; the Vision having thus occupied precisely seven days. "The completeness and propriety of such a period would not fail to strike one so constantly impressed by the mystic significance of numbers."

Such, in brief, are the main conclusions of Dr. Moore's treatise. They are supported throughout by keen and discriminating argument, and they afford a consistent and, in the main, a satisfactory solution of the many difficult problems presented by the subject in its various aspects. Many points of interest, more or less closely connected with the chief topic, are incidentally touched upon in the discussion, and, whether all its conclusions be accepted or not, the student will find the little volume of great service for the understanding of the poem.

AN ORIENTAL STORY-BOOK.

The History of the Forty Vezirs, or the Story of the Forty Morns and Eves. Written in Turkish by Sheykh-Zâda. Done into English by E. J. W. Gibb, M.R.A.S. London: Redway; New York: Scribner & Welford. Post 8vo, pp. 450.

THERE is a fashion in literature, as in other things, and just now the fashion seems to be for popular tales of all descriptions. The four quarters of the globe are ransacked for nursery tales, which the learned laboriously comment and the public read for all that. Undoubtedly many of these tales are worthy of a place in more permanent literature, and, even when stripped of their pseudo-mythological or "survival-of-savagery" character, constitute no uninteresting branch of study. Still, there is danger of overstocking the market, and risk of wearying the mind of the reader with interminable variations of familiar themes. There are, however, certain great cycles of stories which are not only interesting in themselves, but valuable for the history of culture. Besides, they afford an unusually fascinating field for the student of comparative literature, because, belonging to the class of written literature, their diffusion can be traced with much greater accuracy than is possible in the case of stories handed down by oral tradition alone. In the latter case we can simply say that such and such tales are found in such and such countries, but how or when they came there is a question that would puzzle anybody but Prof. Max Müller or Mr. Andrew Lang. In the former case we have exact, or approximately exact, data in the shape of translations, by which the stories in question were diffused within historical times from one land to another. It is to this class of works, and to one of the most interesting of the class, that Mr. Gibb's translation of 'The History of the Forty Vezirs' belongs.

The Oriental estimate of woman has never been a high one, and probably found its justification in the results of the systematic ignorance and seclusion in which women were kept. Stories of woman's craft have always been popular in the East, and the idea of connecting a number of such stories by means of another tale employed as a frame is peculiarly Oriental. In the work of which we are about to speak, a king loses his wife and intrusts his son, the issue of the marriage, to a wise man or number of wise men to be instructed. The father meanwhile marries again, and the son is sent home to his father by the master, who first casts the son's horoscope and warns him of an approaching danger from which he can escape only by remaining silent a certain length of time. The king is disconsolate at finding his son a mute, as he supposes, and turns him over to the stepmother to try her art in making him speak. She falls in love with the youth, and, on his repelling her advances, accuses him to his father of an attempt upon her virtue. The king condemns his son to death, but, as the latter is led out to execution, one of the masters (or one of the king's ministers) begs for a delay, and narrates a story to prove the craft of woman and the inexpedience of killing the prince upon the queen's testimony alone. The queen in turn tells a story to show the danger of allowing the youth to live. Such is a brief outline of a story book of which Görres ('Die teutschen Volksbücher,' p. 154) says: "It sprang originally from the Indian mountains, whence from primeval days it took its course as a little brook, and flowed ever more westerly through Asia's wide fields. And, while it made its way for thousands of years through space and time, swelling wider and wider in reaching us, out of it whole generations and many nations have drunk; and, having passed to Europe with the great migrations, it has now also in our day and generation obtained such a wide circle of readers, that, in regard to its celebrity and the magnitude of its sphere of influence, it reaches the Scriptures, and surpasses all classical works."

The work in its simplest form is known as the 'History of the Seven Sages,' or 'Book of the Seven Wise Masters,' and contains, besides introduction and conclusion, fourteen stories, one by each of the masters and seven by the queen. In some versions the queen relates but six, and the prince the concluding one; in others the masters relate more than one story each. Of Indian origin, the book was brought to Persia and translated into Pahlavi; from Pahlavi into Arabic about the middle of the eighth century; from Arabic it was translated into Syriac, Old Spanish, and Hebrew; and from Syriac into Greek. There are also Persian versions, the genealogy of which is not so clear. In the course of time, as was the case with the 'Arabian Nights,' the frame was preserved with more or less care, while the stories varied in the different versions; so that some fifty-four stories are now to be found in place of the original fourteen.

In all of the Oriental versions (and the European ones based upon them), with three exceptions, the number of masters or vezirs is seven. These three exceptions are: the Turkish romance of the 'Forty Vezirs,' the Persian 'Bakhtyâr Nâma' or 'Ten Vezirs,' and the Hindu 'Alakeswara Katha,' in which there are four ministers. The last-named version has not been translated. The second, it may be interesting to American readers to know, was translated into English by "A Citizen of Philadelphia" in 1813 (a MS. note on the title-page of the copy in the possession of the reviewer states that the translator was Dr. Charles Caldwell). The third has been partly translated into French and entirely into German, and, from the incomplete French version, into English under the title of 'Turkish Tales' (1708, not 1809 as Mr. Gibb states). This latter version is now happily replaced by Mr. Gibb's scholarly work, which not only presents the original in its entirety, but also gives a number of additional stories from MS. sources, thus furnishing an indispensable companion-volume to Dr. W. F. A. Bernhauer's excellent German version, 'Die vierzig Veziere' (Leipzig, 1851).

The Turkish version, as the title indicates, differs from the other Oriental ones in the number of the king's ministers who relate stories to postpone the prince's execution, each relating one, and the queen forty, making eighty in all, besides the introduction and conclusion. A more important difference is found in the stories themselves, which, with few exceptions, are entirely new; two only, Nos. 3 and 59, being found in other Oriental versions of the 'Seven Wise Masters,' and two, Nos. 11 and 29, in the Occidental ones. Many of the remaining stories are familiar, being found in the great collections of Oriental tales; many, too, are taken from the Jewish and Mohammedan mythologies. Some, however, are peculiar to this collection, and are not found, to the reviewer's knowledge, in any other. One, with a moral, is about a king's son who could not learn his lessons because his mind was ever on a shop in a bazaar where hung many lamps, and the lad thought only of how many he could break at one blow with his stick. The king at last gave him a stick and sent him to the shop to break as many lamps as he could, offering to pay for all the damage done. The prince dealt his blow, satisfied his longing, and returned to his lessons. In our modern world the lamps, we take it, which must be broken, are foot-ball, etc., and the king's conduct may be commended to college presidents. Even the familiar stories contained in the book have something novel about them, as in the version of "The Matron of Ephesus" (the sixth Vezir's story), etc. We have not the space to mention even briefly the new and interesting stories of this version, many of which will be very acceptable to the student of comparative literature. Several tales Mr. Gibb has left untranslated; some others are too free to warrant placing the book in the hands of young people. Of the work of the translator it is possible to speak in terms of the highest praise. His English is racy and idiomatic, and yet adapts itself well to the Oriental fancy of the original. He has performed his task in the most scholarly manner, and earned the gratitude not only of the general reader, but also of the student to whom the original would be a sealed book, and who has here in a perfectly trustworthy translation a most valuable addition to his stock of Oriental tales. It is to be hoped that Mr. Gibb will continue his labors in this field, and give us a translation of other Turkish stories, notably the jest-book of the famous Nasr-eddin.

The English and Scottish Popular Ballads. Edited by Francis James Child. Part IV. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

ONE-HALF of this great work has now been completed with the conclusion of this part. In it are included thirty-one ballads with their introductions and variations, and about twenty pages of additions and corrections. In purely literary quality the pieces in this part, we are disposed to say, are on the whole inferior to those contained in any one of the three preceding. But if the literary interest is inferior by comparison, there has been no falling-off in the character and extent of the editorial work. The same exhaustive study has been placed upon a ballad of slightest importance as would have been given to one the literary value of which has recommended it to the favor of successive generations. Some idea of the extraordinary thoroughness with which the work has been done, as well as of the labor required to do it, may be gathered from one or two illustrations. Of the ballad of "Lamkin" there are twenty-two distinct versions given; of that of "Johnie Scot" there are sixteen. This, moreover, does not include certain verbal variations which are duly recorded.

Such facts as these, however, represent the labor rather than the learning and ability displayed in the carrying out of this great undertaking. The latter is something that can only be appreciated fully by the specialist. Still, the value of this collection is made distinctly higher to every student by the unhesitating manner in which Prof. Child pays his respects to the alterations and additions with which the words of the simple old ballads have been disguised or overlaid. For in investigations of this kind it is not merely the possession of greater knowledge that comes into play—in that respect the present editor has admittedly no equal. Far more important for that particular purpose are the correctness of judgment and the keenness of insight which enable him at once to detect the difference between the spurious and the genuine. Against literary emendations of traditional ballads the editor has all the hostility of the scholar, and all the aversion of the man of taste to the "sentiments of transcendent elegance," as he somewhere expresses it, with which the originals are apt to be decorated. For the sake of completeness he gives, for instance, in an appendix a version of "Young Waters," as contained in the collection of Buchan, an editor who, he tells us, can generally be relied upon to produce a longer ballad than any one else; but he characteristically adds that it is printed for much the same reason that thieves are photographed.

It is curious to see in these old ballads the recurrence in past ages of the feelings that are prevalent to-day. Of the many illustrations that might be given, one is perhaps worthy of special mention now. Those who spend any time in the examination of the stories that find a wide and almost exclusive circulation among the working classes, can hardly have failed to be struck by the frequency with which the interest of the plot turns upon the inequality of position that prevails between the lovers in the tale. In them the hero and heroine fall in love and marry, not in their own station, but above it or below it. A similar way of looking at life appears in these old ballads, and bears witness to the uniformity with which, in all periods and under all forms of expression, the sentiments of men repeat themselves. For higher literary effect it is noticeable that only one of these two conditions is tolerated. "No offence seems to be given," writes Prof. Child, "when King Cophetua weds the Beggar-Maid, but when the Lady of the Strachey marries the Yeoman of the Wardrobe good taste is shocked." It may be that something more than taste has been affected, that a deeper note has been touched which records unconsciously the accumulated wisdom of the race. It may be that this literary aversion to one of these two conditions is, after all, due to the fact that the experience of mankind has shown that, while the superior husband often elevates the inferior wife, the inferior husband is almost sure to drag down to his level the superior wife.

As time advances, the merits of this great collection are coming more and more to be known and recognized. Unless new sources of traditional ballad literature are brought to light—which is not a thing to be expected and hardly to be imagined—the present work will remain for all time the final one upon the subject. It is hardly necessary to say to those familiar with the preceding parts that this, like them, is printed in accordance with its value, and that its appearance does the fullest credit to a publishing-house which has long been honorably distinguished for the excellence of the typographical execution displayed in its publications.

A History of the Papacy during the Period of the Reformation. By M. Creighton, M. A. Vols. III and IV. London: Longmans; Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1887.

DR. CREIGHTON'S third and fourth volumes carry the work down to the point at which histories of the Reformation used to begin, to the year 1517. We are indebted to him for bringing clearly home to English readers the consciousness that what we call the Reformation is not the work of Martin Luther and his followers, but the resultant of a great complex of forces, social, political, intellectual, commercial, and religious. It is the gathering of these forces which forms the background of the four volumes before us. We say "the background," because Dr. Creighton never forgets that he is writing the history of a single institution which must necessarily occupy the foreground of his picture. In a way, this has been a misfortune for the author. Perhaps it would not have been possible for him to select any one point of view from which the whole field of human progress during the Reformation time could be so well surveyed as the point of view of Rome. At the same time, it is clear that the papacy was either in opposition to the most fruitful tendencies of the day or else was swept along by them. Its fatal defect was that it neither originated nor directed them. In telling the story of the papacy, therefore, one is forced constantly to leave the really great currents of human development and turn aside into what is, after all, a by-path.

In the first two volumes Dr. Creighton dealt with the great conciliar movement of the fifteenth century, which at one time seemed likely to drive the papacy out of existence. As compared with that great movement—the expression of the right of Christian Europe to settle its own church problems in its own way—the attitude of the papacy seems petty and trivial to the point of contempt; and its victory at Constance and Basel was not the triumph of real power, but the supremacy of mere inertia over a factious and disunited opposition. In the second two volumes the papacy is again shown in its relation to a great European movement, the triumphant humanism of the third generation. This time it does not oppose, but lets itself be quietly drawn into the movement of the intellect on its secular side, without a thought of what must be the consequence to its own highest interests. Once more it is not the papacy, but a process inevitably hostile to it, which claims our chief attention. It is not Rome, but Florence, which is the real centre of the Italian intellect. The splendid displays of Nicholas V. and his successors were only a varnish of modern ideas on a culture essentially mediæval still. Again the story of the papacy is one of vulgar intrigue for landed possession, for the building up of a papal state, for the settlement in life of sacerdotal bastards.

Dr. Creighton has gone into the sources of all this unedifying story with great diligence and tells it with great fairness. He follows the personal fortunes of each Pope with entire accuracy, and yet one can almost feel the sense of relief with which he turns to such an episode as that of Savonarola, or the work of Michel Angelo, or the expedition of Charles VIII., as a part of the greater life of the day in which the papacy as such could not share. With the method of the author we have before now expressed our satisfaction. It is the method of a man working with the best tools of modern scholarship, and with a steady purpose to keep in view the true historical meaning of events. It is not his mission to abuse the institution he is describing, but to show it as it was. The indictment against the papacy becomes all the more convincing from this very absence of passion in the historian. One feels that the author has not, like his chief modern opponent, Janssen, a thesis to prove, but that one is to be left to draw one's own conclusions from a calm statement of well-proved facts.

The appendices at the close of each volume give valuable information as to sources, and discuss several important controversies with scholarly thoroughness. The world of scholars will look forward with great interest to the appearance of future volumes, which shall deal with the Reformation in its stricter sense.

Römische Ikonographie. II. Die Bildnisse der römischen Kaiser: Erster theil, Das Julisch-Claudische Kaiserhaus. Von J. J. Bernoulli. 8vo, pp. xiv and 438; with thirty-five plates and fifty-nine illustrations in text. Berlin and Stuttgart. 1886.

BERNOULLI'S 'Ikonographie,' the second volume of which has recently appeared, treats of an important subject in such a thorough and masterly manner that it deserves to be widely known among our classical teachers and others interested in Roman portraiture. The care with which it is compiled, and the completeness of its illustrations, give the book a place among the classics of archæology; and while there may be differences of opinion as to individual questions with which it deals, there can be little doubt that it will remain for many years the standard authority on its subject. Bernoulli's 'Aphrodite' (Leipzig, 1873) showed that he possessed the patience which characterizes the work of the best German scholars; and as the same quality distinguishes the present book in a preëminent degree, it is hardly probable that anybody will attempt to improve upon it until the material bearing upon the subject is very largely increased. The sumptuous publication of E. Q. Visconti, completed by Mongez ('Iconographie Grecque,' 3 vols. folio, Paris, 1811, and 'Iconographie Romaine,' 4 vols. folio, 1817-26) was, as Bernoulli says, epoch-making; but the rapid accumulation of iconographic monuments during the last sixty years, the increase in the facilities for studying and comparing them, and, more than all, the development in the methods of archæological investigation during this period, have amply justified Dr. Bernoulli in undertaking this heroic task Of his success thus far we can only say that the second volume quite fulfils the expectations raised by the first ('Bildnisse berühmter Römer,' Stuttgart, 1882). In the care and thoroughness with which he has searched every nook and corner for material, he satisfies Carlyle's definition of genius.

The second volume treats of the five emperors of the Julian-Claudian house, and those members of their families of whom portraits survive. Julius Cæsar having been included among the "famous Romans" of the first volume, the present one begins with Augustus, and we can most easily give our readers an idea of the plan of the work by describing this chapter. It opens with a list of thirty-four of the principal events in the life of Augustus, with their dates, as a help in fixing the dates of the portraits examined later. Then follows a summary of the descriptions of his person and character, from the accounts of Suetonius, Tacitus, and other writers of the time; and with these are compared the heads which inscriptions establish beyond doubt as portraits. Of these the most important are the coin-types, because they are contemporaneous, and, though often of little artistic merit, they give at least the general character and shape of the head and features, thus serving as a basis in testing the authenticity of larger uninscribed monuments. Next comes an enumeration of the portraits mentioned in ancient authors and inscriptions, which is of great value to the historical student. Of these Bernoulli has collected thirty-one allusions to specific works, besides such general statements as that of the seventy silver statues of himself which Augustus melted down for the benefit of his temple of the Palatine Apollo. The most important section is that which follows—a list of the extant portraits of Augustus. Only those who have attempted to construct a list of this kind can form any conception of the amount of energetic labor and patience required to make it satisfactorily complete. It comprises ninety-seven statues and busts, thirty-eight gems, six reliefs, one wall-painting, and one bronze seal—a collection of one hundred and forty-three monuments in all. This, of course, includes not only those the authenticity of which has been doubted, but others which Bernoulli believes to be Augustus, though they are generally known under other names. Finally, these portraits are compared and classified—in the case of Augustus, according to the age at which he is represented—and their merits and claims are critically discussed. Bernoulli agrees, by the way, with those who have preceded him in considering the famous statue from Prima Porta, now in the Braccio Nuovo of the Vatican, as the finest of all the extant portraits of Augustus.

As would be expected, the material relating to the other Cæsars is less abundant, yet the author has collected fifty-eight statues and busts of Tiberius, twenty-three of Caligula, thirty-six of Claudius, and forty two of Nero; and numerous gems and other representations of each of them. Of the other members of the house Livia, Drusus, Antonia, Germanicus, and the Agrippinas are treated at length, and in all cases it is evident that the investigations have been limited only by the amount of material it was possible to collect.

But the merit of the book does not end with the collection and assortment of materials. The same care that characterizes this feature of it is equally manifest in the critical examination of the real and supposed portraits. It is too often a fault with German works of this class that their merits cease with their compilations of facts, and the student is either left to draw his own deductions from these, or is given a summary in which the bending of facts to fit preconceived opinions is unhappily apparent. Bernoulli's book is open to neither of these objections. Every monument receives its due amount of attention, and, where the author differs from commonly accepted theories, his arguments are stated in a simple and forcible manner, which, if it does not always convince, carries great weight. This is especially notable in his discussion (p. 381) of the so-called Agrippina, the sitting statue in Naples, which he unhesitatingly repudiates as a portrait of that empress. As is well known, this statue received its appellation from Visconti and Mongez, who identified it by comparison with certain of her coins. Bernoulli asserts that in this instance the testimony of coins amounts to nothing, because of the discrepancy in their representations of her, which he illustrates on plate xxxv, Nos. 1–6. He also maintains that there is no distinctive resemblance to the statue of Agrippina in the Lateran, identified by an inscription, and also that the statue is that of a woman much older than Agrippina, who was not more than forty-four years of age when she died. He therefore relegates it to the position now occupied by many a formerly "imperial" portrait, and labels it "Sitzende Matronenstatue" (pl. xxii). It is also interesting to note that he does not follow R. S. Poole in considering the beautiful "Klytie" bust in the British Museum as a portrait of Antonia, the daughter of Marcus Antonius, but thinks it more likely to have been some famous beauty of the imperial epoch—not, however, of the imperial family.

The illustrations form an important feature of the book. The thirty-five plates are in heliotype, which is well adapted for rendering the texture of the originals, and has the advantage of a mechanical process in that it transcribes facts much more exactly than a draughtsman can—a matter of the utmost importance in the identification of portrait-busts, as those who have had to depend upon Visconti's book are well aware. To the plates, however, the text illustrations are decidedly inferior. These are from drawings, mostly of a very sketchy character, and lack the absolute accuracy alluded to above, which is a chief essential where the object of the illustrations is to bring out minor points of difference in a number of portraits of the same individual.

Sne [Snow]. By Alexander Kjelland. Copenhagen. 1886.

In the literary arena Norway takes the prize in the race between Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. For the Christmas trade Ibsen wrote a play, "Rosmerholm," Lie a story, 'The Commander's Daughters,' and Garborg a story. After a silence of two years, Kjelland, the youngest of the four great prophets in the present literature of Norway, appears in two works, the story, 'Snow,' and a drama, "Three Couples" (Tre Par). This was all the more surprising as it had been rumored that he had lost both inclination and ability for further production, and that his literary career was ended. No evidence of either appears in 'Snow.' We there find the same Kjelland as of old. He may have grown in breadth of view and in strength of style, but there is the same tendency, the same love of satire, and 'Snow' is simply a new chapter in the human comedy which he has undertaken to write. If it be true that Kjelland's earlier works have given offence in various quarters, 'Snow' will certainly not tend to reconcile the enemies he has made. Those who have failed to be amused by his clever satirical descriptions of aristocratic merchants and bureaucrats, and have found them one-sided and distorted, will be slow to admit that his delineation of a priest, the chief figure in 'Snow,' is true and justifiable. Besides, priests are usually privileged characters in society, and we seldom find them held up to ridicule in elegant literature. That an author now and then, perhaps himself a priest or preparing for the priesthood, has cracked a little joke at the expense of the priestly dignity, is not to be taken into account, since all readers understand it to be a joke. Kjelland does not write in jest. His Daniel Jürges is an eminent, highly respected priest, fit to be made bishop when a vacancy occurs, an excellent type of his class; and when Kjelland discusses him we realize that he has the whole clergy and not merely Daniel Jürges in view. And we know that Kjelland is not in love with the priests. He regards them as a link in the chain of office-holders who run the Government machine without being in sympathy with the people, and he makes ideal claims on Jürges that seem to us to transcend the limits of human nature. He marshals a mountain of sins of commission and omission, and is a most unmerciful judge. He lashes the priest directly in what he makes others say to him, and indirectly in what he lets him say and do himself. Throughout it is evident that Jürges has to bare his back for his brethren in office.

Jürges is drawn with life and power. As a young graduate, he was lionized in the society of the capital, and in due course of time he leads to the altar the belle of the city, and takes her with him to one of the small fishing towns in the northern part of Norway. He hopes to be of some help to the plain people there, but, after a few years, he abandons the place without having made any impression whatever. His next parish is larger, and consists mainly of well-to-do peasants, but he has no better luck there. He does not understand the art of associating with peasants, and they look upon him as a sort of hostile authority against whom it is necessary to be on one's guard. Then Jürges retires from the obscure life of a priest, and comes out more conspicuously to battle with the disbelief and sin of the age. He takes charge of the religious department of the leading paper in the capital. In this position he finds abundant employment for his knowledge and talents, and he soon becomes known throughout the kingdom. He has a son who is a petty edition of himself. The son becomes engaged to a beautiful and rich girl of the capital; but whereas his mother, transplanted to the northern fishing town, soon lost all independence before the authoritative, domineering egoism of her husband, Gabriele is a step higher in the scale of evolution, and has the courage to demand of her lover that he shall not enter the priesthood. Johannes, who looks up to his father as his ideal, feels sure that Gabriele will change her mind when she is introduced to him in his home. Johannes and Gabriele accordingly go to his father's house. Then comes the struggle between the two, Daniel Jürges and Gabriele, the representatives of two forces in the community—the old orthodoxy, on the one hand, and modern liberal thought, on the other. The Church conquers and draws the doubting youth represented by Johannes to itself, while Gabriele, who resolutely breaks her engagement and leaves the house, regains her freedom and independence, and thus escapes the slavery of Daniel's wife. This is the thread of the story, which is told with all the vivacity, skill, satire, and earnestness of which Kjelland is capable, and that is saying a great deal.

THE ACADEMY EXHIBITION—I.

THE sixty-second annual exhibition of the Academy of Design is on all sides conceded to be nearly the best ever held in the history of the organization. It is not difficult to find the reason why, which is the exclusion of the numerous feeble works that have been so noticeable a component part of previous exhibitions. It cannot be set down as an exhibition distinguished by any considerable number of important works; on the contrary, there is a striking absence of such works. What pictures there are in the exhibition are well hung, and that fact goes a long way toward securing a favorable judgment for it. It gives a good all-around aspect, and makes the good canvases look their best and the mediocre ones unobtrusive. The members of the Hanging Committee, too, this year have not been unmindful of the valuable effect that may be obtained by suitable accessories, and have covered the upper part of the unsightly wooden walls with plush hangings, and in various ways have taken advantage of the aid of quiet decoration to set off the pictures.

The south gallery, the largest in the Academy building, and the one in which, from force of custom, we expect to find the most important pictures, is in this exhibition without a picture in what, from force of custom also, is considered the place of honor. There is no single picture in the centre of the south wall. Three or four small pictures are on the line at this point, and Mr. Freer's excellent "Portrait of a Lady" is placed in the middle over these. But this is not exactly the place of honor. Whatever may have been the reason why the Committee did not distinguish a single picture by giving it the coveted place in the centre of the line in the south gallery, it is a pity that there was not some one member of it able to carry the votes of the others with him and put Mr. Winslow Homer's "Undertow," No. 393, in that place. The picture deserves the honor. Though not remarkable for powerful drawing nor for any especially beautiful quality of color, this picture has a force about it, an air of truth, a fine sculpturesque quality of modelling, that puts it far beyond the ordinary well-done sort of work that we are bound to praise for its honesty, but which does not excite our enthusiasm. In this picture there is a breath of great art. Small though the canvas be, unconventional though real as the composition is, with its four figures in a row, and eccentric as is some of the drawing, this picture is tremendously effective. Were Mr. Homer a younger man and thoroughly trained in his art, as every painter must be as a matter of course to get to the highest rank, a wonderful future might be predicted for him. As it stands, sincere, honest searcher after truth as Mr. Homer is; poet, painter, and sturdy realist, at the same time, like Millet; distanced as he might be by a man of the same temperament but better equipped; faulty as his work is in some respects, we cannot but accord to Mr. Homer a very high homage. His "Undertow," by its virility, its truth, its sincerity of intention, outranks every picture in the Academy exhibition.

In the south gallery also is hung Mr. T. W. Dewing's "Days," No. 313. The picture is illustrative of Emerson's noble verses. That it is illustrative is the first point to be noted about it. That it is preëminently decorative rather than pictorial, as the word is generally understood, is the other important point. Here are four or five figures of women in clinging draperies, a man in the background to the left of the picture, a suggestion of something like a landscape, particularly prominent being a sort of wall-like arbor of leaves and flowers. The picture is by no means realistically treated. There is no attempt at out-door effect as it is understood by the followers of the modern school. The values are left to take care of themselves, local color is entirely subordinated to the effect of the ensemble, a color scheme is taken up and carried through without regard to truth and nature. There are no facts—there is only fancy. It is fancy, however, of the better sort. One has a wholesome contempt for those poets in paint who, having no control or mastery over the rudiments of art, yet strive to express a poetical idea, as it might be understood by a literary man, on canvas. There are many examples of such poets in paint in contemporary art, especially in England. Mr. Dewing has little in common with these. First and beyond everything his figures are drawn. They are tenderly painted. One feels an earnestness of intention in their execution, an honest desire to make them beautiful and truthful at the same time. It is the work of a man who knows his art. It is beautiful, indeed, in its sweet refinement, in its graceful delineation of type, in its harmonious whole. To judge it in two words, it is not a picture: it is an admirable decorative panel.

Looking at the Academy exhibition as a display of native art, and trying to draw conclusions as to its status therefrom, it is a difficult matter to place this work of Mr. Dewing. Had the painter remained in Paris, where he studied, and grounded himself thoroughly in the principles of painting (for Mr. Dewing was noted in the schools as a skilful draughtsman and able painter), it is more than probable that he would have given his best efforts to a realistic subject. In New York, as in London, there is a strong undercurrent of the literary idea in art. We have not yet, even as artists, got to the point of caring for a fine morceau rather than a fine idea. In hard words, after all, the best criticism of a picture of Christ on the Cross may be expressed in this wise, for instance: "The chest is luminous and well in relief, the arms are well drawn, the movement is good and the legs belong to the body; the head is well constructed." Apply this sort of criticism to the great pictures of the world and they will always bear it. There are brutal pictures of the Crucifixion and there are refined ones; but they must be good from the point of view of the soulless technician, or they will not live. It is not unjust to say that the predominance of the so-called "poetical idea" in art, which really means the literary idea, if carried very far, will kill good art. Realism in its best sense, as Rembrandt or Velasquez understood it and expressed it, must be adhered to and always kept in view. There can be no other foundation to build on, and those who search for something else will go astray. To return to our subject, though Mr. Dewing's canvas is not distinguished by such qualities as those we have named, it can be very highly esteemed as a piece of decoration, and as such it must be accorded a due meed of praise. Judged from the decorative point of view, it is excellent. "Days" is easily among the best things in the exhibition.

In judging of the excellence of an exhibition of pictures as well as the standing of the school of painters whom it represents, no better test can be found than portraits. Under such conditions as are forced upon American artists it is almost in portraits alone that an opportunity can be found to estimate their abilities as painters of the figure. Doctors always disagree, it is said, except they be the very best doctors, when they sink their small differences and find themselves in accord on essential points. The painters of portraits in the Academy, those worthy of mention at least, seem to come very near to agreeing as to how to paint a portrait, and to cite some of these amounts to a verdict of approval. Mr. F. P. Vinton's "Portrait of Theodore Chase," No. 227; Mr. J. Carroll Beckwith's "Portrait of a Gentleman," No. 403; Mr. W. M. J. Rice's portrait, No. 290, a full-length figure of a lady; Mr. Eastman Johnson's "Portrait of a Lady," No. 363; Mr. J. Alden Weir's portrait, No. 147, a child in a white dress in an interior; M. de Munkacsy's "Portrait of Doctor McCosh," No. 333, and "Portrait of Mr. Henry G. Marquand," No. 347; and Mr. F. W. Freer's "Portrait," No. 339, already mentioned, are all painted with a due regard for values, proper drawing, and an intention to depict the sitter on canvas in as lifelike and at the same time artistic way as possible. These are all good portraits. To discriminate, it may be said that of all of them Mr. Vinton's and Mr. Beckwith's portraits are the most lifelike and the best as regards drawing and construction; that Mr. Rice's is the most showy, but perhaps the least sincere; that Mr. Freer's is the best in color; that M. de Munkacsy's are the most perfunctory and at the same time the cleverest; and that Mr. Weir's, being a successful attempt to make a portrait and a picture at the same time, is the most charming. It has been many a long day since such a good lot has been seen on the Academy's walls. In Mr. Wyatt Eaton's "Man's Portrait," No. 429, there is less realism and a striking lack of harmony between the light on the head and hands and that on the clothes, but a fine sort of impression of character; in Miss Maria Brooks's "Portrait of Mr. E. L. K.," No. 386, there is a notable solidity of painting combined with a certain looseness of construction; in Miss Rosina Emmett's "Portrait," No. 437, a half-length seated figure of a lady, a considerable quality of color, but rather weak drawing; and in M. Paul Rajon's pastel, "Portrait of Mrs. K.," No. 5, a great deal of cleverness in the handling of the medium, and a pretty, though not very truthful, color scheme. Altogether the portraits are of the most interesting things in the exhibition. It is gratifying to see so goodly a display of them, to find so many that are good, and to see that the Hanging Committee has given them good places. It is certain that a portrait as a piece of painting is as interesting as any other sort of picture. True, these are not for sale, but are we not getting beyond the state in which an art exhibition is considered a market? No doubt we are, and the Academy jury this year is to be congratulated on having made a famous advance in the right direction.

Political Economy

FROM A

New Standpoint!

Natural Law in the Business World.

The light of Natural Law applied to the live social and economic topics which are now attracting so much attention. It aims to expose the abuses and evils which masquerade under the banner of Labor, and the bad results of class prejudice and antagonism. Labor combinations, and their effect on the laborer; socialistic tendencies; excess of economic and railroad legislation; the distribution of wealth; principles governing corporations and railroads, and also many other prominent issues, are fully and thoroughly examined, in their connection with unvarying natural laws and principles. It is shown clearly that the business world is permeated by Natural Law, and that success in any department can be gained only by conformity to it. The opposing combinations unions, corners, unwarranted legislation, sentimental and socialistic ideas, and everything else of an artificial nature, are shown to be mischievous, destructive, and on a false basis.

Those who have read Drummond's 'Natural Law in the Spiritual World' will be especially interested in seeing a corresponding application of natural and fixed principles to the economic and business world in which we live.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN

GOETHE AND CARLYLE.

Edited by CHARLES ELIOT NORTON.

12mo, $2.

"The publication in full of this remarkable series of letters is by far the pleasantest of recent contributions to the Carlyle literature. . . . Here is a substantial addition to the philosopher's biography which everybody who cares at all for the subject will value for the strong light it throws upon the most attractive side of Carlyle's character. He is represented here in the full possession of all the domestic and minor virtues of which his later life seemed bare."—New York Tribune.

"Preserves in a scholarly form the matter that the world would not willingly let die. . . . The book is one of the most valuable contributions to contemporary literature."—Boston Evening Traveller.

"A collection of letters at once interesting and enlightening. . . Like the 'Early Letters,' issued a few months ago from the hands of the same admirable editor, the letters here given embrace a period of which there has been either a dearth of information or a superabundance of false impressions. . . . It is an altogether beautiful picture here revealed of the aged German poet—a picture of benignity, generosity, wisdom, and tranquility which will captivate the reader, as it not only captivated, but firmly enchained the wedded pair of Craigenputtock."—New York Times.

EARLY LETTERS OF

THOMAS CARLYLE.

Edited by CHARLES ELIOT NORTON.

With two Portraits. 12mo, $2.25.

"The whole picture of the man from his youth upward cannot be completely understood without a study of the present volume, and it therefore ought to be possessed by all those who have accumulated the other volumes which have attempted to throw light upon the career of Thomas Carlyle."—Christian Advocate.

"The letters are full of human interest, warm with sympathy and affection—just such letters as a young man of good breeding and a kind heart, of brilliant, though of somewhat erratic genius, might be expected to write to those whom he loved and who loved him. They are, indeed, remarkable letters, viewed in whatever way; entirely unconventional and never commonplace; instinct with wit and wisdom and wholesome good cheer."—New York Observer.

"We are enabled to see the genesis of his great talents and the transformations they wrought in his character; the difficulties, doubts, and forebodings which he encountered; the sturdy simplicity of his home relations; and, through all, the firm, unalterable confidence in his own destiny as a leader among men. It is a significant and even an inspiring narrative here unfolded."—Literary World.

"Lewis Carroll's immortal story."—Academy.

LEWIS CARROLL.

With 42 Illustrations by Tenniel.

12mo. $1.

What wert thou, dream-Alice, in thy foster-father's eyes? How shall he picture thee? Loving, first, loving and gentle: loving as a dog (forgive the prosaic simile, but I know of no earthly love so pure and perfect), and gentle as a fawn: then courteous—courteous to all, high or low, grand or grotesque, King or Caterpillar, even as though she were herself a King's daughter, and her clothing of wrought gold; then trustful, ready to accept the wildest impossibilities with all that utter trust that only dreamers know; and lastly, curious—wildly curious, and with the eager enjoyment of Life that comes only in the happy hours of childhood, when all is new and fair and when Sin and Sorrow are but names—empty words, signifying nothing.—Lewis Carroll in The Theatre.

BY

LEWIS CARROLL.

With 50 Illustrations by Tenniel.

12mo. $1.

And the White Rabbit, what of him? Was he framed on the 'Alice" lines, or meant as a contrast? As a contrast, distinctly. For her "youth," "audacity," "vigor," and "swift directness of purpose," read "elderly," "timid," "feeble," and "nervously shilly-shallying," and you will get something of what I meant him to be. I think the White Rabbit should wear spectacles. I am sure his voice should quaver and his knees quiver, and his whole air suggest a total inability to say "Bo!" to a goose!—Lewis Carroll in The Theatre.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1887.

The Week.

MR. EDWARD ATKINSON, in an interview published by the Boston Herald, says that the Inter-State Commerce Act, if it can be enforced, will have the effect to increase the average charge for railway transportation in the country—an effect precisely opposite to that which was intended. One of the examples cited by him is the increased charge on the wool of California, which must pay a much higher rate for carriage to the Eastern manufacturers than before. It is doubtful, indeed, if it can be carried at all by railway. If it cannot be so carried, it must come by water, and the vessel-owners will be able to charge any rate up to that which the Commerce Act compels the railway to charge. Probably the act will have the effect to increase the importation of foreign wool, for, as Mr. Atkinson observes, the low rates on the "long haul" have been brought about not by competition among the railways nor by competition of the railways with water routes, but "by the paramount competition of product with product in the principal markets." It is this and not any choice of their own which has given such low rates to the long haul on the wool and fruits of California, on the wheat of Dakota, the corn of Kansas, and the cotton of Texas. The very phrase "charging what the traffic will bear," Mr. Atkinson shows, grew out of the necessity of lowering the rates to meet this superior, this domineering competition of product with product in the markets, and not out of any supposed desire to raise the rate to the highest figure the merchant or manufacturer could pay.

When the Inter-State Commerce Bill was pending we pointed out the fact that the long and short-haul clauses would operate as an inter-State protective tariff. The Ohio wool-growers have not been slow to perceive its value in this sense. They are said to be preparing a protest against granting the petition of the California wool-growers, who have asked that the clause in question be suspended as to their product, representing that its enforcement would be absolutely ruinous to their industry. The Ohio wool-growers are alive to this fact also, and they are accordingly strenuous in insisting that the law be strictly enforced. The producers of raisins in California have discovered that the Commerce Act serves to nullify the tariff on foreign raisins by increasing the freight charge to Eastern markets to a point equal to the customs duty. The sugar-refiners on the Pacific coast, who have been enabled, by getting their raw sugar from the Hawaiian Islands free of duty, to send their product as far east as St. Louis, have likewise struck the snag of the Commerce Act, and have put in a petition that the long and short-haul clause be suspended as regards sugar, to which the Eastern refiners who pay duties equal to 100 per cent. ad valorem on raw sugar, have very properly objected. The salmon canneries of the Columbia River will be heard from soon, and it will be in order then for the fishermen on the Atlantic coast to stand up for a strict construction of the law.

The applications of the railway employees and of the travelling salesmen to the Commerce Commission, for a construction of the new law on the subject of free passes and free extra baggage, serve to show what an enormous deal of work the Commission are likely to have before them. The Supreme Court of the United States, with its four years' arrearages of undecided and unheard cases, will be a marvel of promptness and activity by comparison with the Commission. The two petitions present eight separate questions, and some of these are divisible into two or three parts. The Commission were enabled to answer all of them in a summary manner by saying that no authority had been given them to decide suppositious cases, but only those which come up in the practical working of the law. Thus the answers to the eight questions, with their variations, are merely deferred. They will all come up again, and must then be answered after more or less argument pro and con. Attention is drawn by the petition of the railway employees to the magnitude of the deadhead tax on the railways. It appears that passes are customarily granted to the employees of the railway and their "immediate families," also more or less to the employees of other railways, also to officers and employees of railways out of employment and seeking situations, also to associations of railway officers and employees travelling to and from their meetings and conventions, also to the immediate families of delegates to such conventions. In fact, it would seem that all railway officers and most railway employees have their "hats chalked" all over the United States. The Commerce Act is very stringent on the subject of discriminations in the transportation of passengers, and it makes no exception in favor of railway employees. The railway companies themselves appear to be nothing loath to observe this clause.

It would not be surprising if the next Congress should witness a struggle between the commercial classes of the country and the railways, the former seeking to repeal or essentially change the Commerce Act, and the latter to keep it in force. The great virtue of the act to the railways is that it prevents the secret cutting of rates. Such cutting has been the cause of the breaking of all the agreements to maintain rates in the past. It has undermined all the pools. It has driven pool commissioners frantic, and has led railway managers to doubt the very existence of virtue. Competition has been, and is always when freight is scarce, so savage that no dependence could be placed upon the word of anybody who had the authority to issue a way-bill or to make a freight contract. The pools, having no legal character and no standing in court, could not enforce their agreements against their own members. Consequently, they went to pieces almost as fast as they were formed, until Mr. Fink in desperation asked for a law of Congress to legalize and regulate such contracts, and was willing to make concessions in return for it at which railway managers would have stood aghast twenty years ago. The Commerce Act goes far towards supplying what Commissioner Fink wanted. It does not legalize pools. Indeed, it abolishes them. But it gives what no pool ever had before, viz., publicity, together with the power of the Sheriff and the Grand Jury to ascertain the truth and to punish the guilty.

The controversy between the principal Eastern and Western railroads on the question of paying commissions on the sale of passenger tickets undoubtedly has its mainspring in private and personal interests. It is said that at least $2,000,000 per year is involved in the dispute. This sum is now diverted from the treasuries of the railroads or the pockets of the travelling public to those of the commission men. If the commissions were not paid, the railroads would get the full fare, or they could afford to reduce passenger rates, and probably would do so whenever they should believe that the commission system was dead beyond hope of resurrection. Now, the question is, why do the Western roads fight so stubbornly to maintain the commission system? The Inter-State Commerce Law is flatly against it. If commissions can be paid for passengers, they can be paid for freight also, and to any extent, and the agent or broker can divide his commissions with the shippers in any way he chooses. In other words, the law may be completely nullified by making rebates at the point of shipment and calling them commissions. We cannot conceive of any motive for retaining the commission system in the West in the face of the law and in defiance of the protest of the Eastern roads, unless the commission men themselves are making a "square divide" with somebody.

There was something at once comic and pathetic in the Republican banquet which was served up in Boston on Saturday. Distinguished Republicans from outside the State had been invited, but with remarkable unanimity they all declined to attend. This threw the burden of speechmaking upon Senators Dawes and Hoar, and they improved it to a most wearisome length. We can conceive of no more heartless use of a banquet than to entice several hundred men to it, and then to turn loose upon them two such lugubrious orators as Dawes and Hoar. They both stood up and said at great length the same things that they had been saying with more or less fulness for the past five or ten years. There was not a ray of freshness or a gleam of a new idea in either speech from beginning to end. The quality of Mr. Dawes's speech can be inferred by the following sample from his introductory remarks: "The atmosphere we are breathing here to-day is so surcharged with genuine Republicanism that there can be little need of either tonics or stimulants. The spirit of the olden time is upon us again. The cause is again, as of old, paramount, and the individual subordinate. I congratulate the Republican party of Massachusetts, so largely represented here to day, upon the harmony and earnestness everywhere manifest—sure precursors of success."

Mr. Hoar's speech was in the same line, as the following familiar passage will show: "The Democratic party represents and is controlled by the opinions and purposes as they are to-day of the men who, twenty years ago, thought rebellion, secession, and slavery were right; and the Republican party represents and is controlled by the opinions and purposes as they are to-day of the men who, twenty years ago, thought rebellion, secession, and slavery were wrong." After an hour or more of this kind of oratory, other but brief speeches were made, and then Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, with the late untoward result in Rhode Island in mind, quoted with depressing effect:

> "I hold it truth with him who sings
> To one clear harp in divers tones,
> That men may rise on stepping-stones
> Of their dead selves to higher things."

This confession that the party was dead was received in silence, and Mr. Lodge went on to explain that its death was merely seeming, that it has suffered disaster chiefly because of the "petty personal dislike which is shown towards candidates." Mr. Lodge's stepping-stone of the party's dead self is not high principle, but loyalty to the candidate, no matter what his character. He is going to help the party to rise to "higher things" by reelecting Gov. Ames next fall, and by waging unrelenting war upon all Independents and reformers of whatever name or character.

The Independent, we are informed, is to contain an editorial note this week identifying "Arthur Richmond," the blackguard contributor of the North American Review, with Gail Hamilton, the great "lady Junius" of the Blaineites. It is intimated by a hint in the Tribune, that there are two Arthur Richmonds in the field, and, therefore, the Independent's discovery will not conflict with the theory that the other "Arthur Richmond," who attacked Mr. Bayard in the Review, was Mr. William Henry Hurlbert. If this be true, we must say frankly to all the blackguard writers in the country that they are not treating Mr. Allen Thorndike Rice, the editor, with due consideration. They should not presume too much on his simplicity or his infirmity. The way they are behaving in dumping their rubbish on him, and getting paid for it, reminds us of a story which the late James T. Fields used to tell of a certain storekeeping New England deacon, one of whose friends related, "That he warn't so fore-handed as he used to be, because his eyesight failed him about a year ago, and as soon as they heerd tell on 't they began to bring him in the counterfeit money from fur an' near, and unloaded nigh $200 of the stuff onto him before he found it out."

Iron and steel are again in peril, as we learn from the Philadelphia Times, which in turn learns the fact from the Bulletin of the American Iron and Steel Association. The trouble is not a new one. It broke out some weeks ago, but was thought to have been suppressed by timely action of the producers. It proceeds entirely from an excessive advance in the price of rails, enabling the foreign producer to run his stuff in, despite the existing duty of $17 per ton, not to mention ocean freights and other charges. American producers are exhorted to hold their appetites in check, and not to charge so much for rails that the foreigner can come in here and crush us. The Bulletin of the Iron and Steel Association "wisely admonishes them that the large volume of importations means an early and unfavorable influence on home prices," although how that effect is to be produced it does not explain. Domestic rails were selling a year or two ago at $27.50 per ton. They are now quoted at $41.50, at which price it appears that they can be imported. The advance of $14 per ton lets in foreign rails. Now, an unfavorable influence on home prices cannot be produced by any amount of importation at $41.50 per ton, and the presumption is that at any lower price they could not be imported. A hint is thrown out by the Bulletin that there are undervaluations at the New York Customhouse, but it is evident that this suggestion is not much relied upon, because in the same breath the American producers are admonished to "recall the suicidal folly they perpetrated only a few years ago, when the iron trade revived, by advancing prices until they emptied all the surplus iron of Europe upon our markets and bankrupted themselves. Fraud in custom-houses can be readily detected and remedied, but the temptation to inordinate profits for producers is most difficult to restrain." So it would appear.

Within the last few years a change has taken place in the attitude of our Department of State towards American citizens residing abroad. It has, of course, from the first, extended protection to our citizens temporarily residing in foreign countries. But the inclination of the Department for many years was to seize upon any small circumstance as indicating the abandonment of nationality. Indeed, until the present Administration, the only exception which had ever been made to the presumption of such abandonment by long residence abroad was in the case of missionaries. In the cases of all others the rule laid down by Mr. Webster has always been applied. That rule was: "A person found residing in a foreign country is presumed to be there animo manendi, or with the purpose of remaining; and to relieve himself of the character which this presumption fixes upon him, he must show that his residence was only temporary, and accompanied all the while with a fixed and definite intention of returning. If in that country he engages in trade and business, he is considered by the law of nations as a merchant of that country." The growth of our commerce has been so great since Webster's day that it is not at all uncommon for a large central firm, situated in New York, for example, to have in various foreign countries "branch houses" presided over by trusted agents, American-born citizens, who must needs live continuously abroad. It is very much to Mr. Bayard's credit that he has not scrupled to place these in the same class with the missionaries. About a year ago he held that such agents were subject to the laws of the country in which the firm is domiciled, and to that country their domiciliary duties belong. He has had occasion lately to emphasize this, and to add that such agents are not only American citizens, entitled to our protection and subject to our laws, but are exempt from all burdens which are imposed by the laws of the country in which they reside upon its citizens, such as poll taxes, taxes on personalty, militia duty, and the like.

It is becoming evident that the movement for church union finds it dangerous to pass from the region of vague sentiment to that of practical proposals. The resolutions of the Presbytery of New York, in the form of an overture to the General Assembly, treat the Episcopal olive-branch as if it were the traditional chip on the shoulder. Under the guise of hoisting a reciprocal flag of truce, they really throw down the gauntlet for new conflicts, with a curious mixture of benevolence and belligerence, assuring the Episcopal Church that its proposed bases of union will do very well for Episcopalians, but will never answer for Presbyterians. In fact, it would seem that the most probable outcome of the modern talk about the cordial feeling between the denominations and the vanishing away of the old distinctions, as soon as approach is made to any positive action, will be a revival of theological and sectarian controversy. This has certainly been the result in the case of the Presbyterian churches, North and South. As soon as men began to speak above a whisper about the possibility of the two uniting, the old leaders flew to their guns again. The Independent, the great champion of organic church union, has undoubted reason for its sorrowful conclusion that little if anything can be done in this generation. But why should anything be done? Is any human being harmed by the want of church union?

The notorious Mrs. Howe, the Boston banker, who swindled so many women nine years ago by offering them 90 per cent. per annum on their deposits, has been able to set up her bank again in the same place, and has met with such success that she has actually "skipped" with $50,000. When she was in business on the former occasion, her operations raised the question whether women were or were not more gullible than men, and a controversy of considerable bitterness broke out between the sexes, in which, if we remember rightly, Gail Hamilton played the part of a giantess and struck heavy blows for woman. We do not believe the discussion had any decided result one way or the other. The illustrations of gullibility which each side was able to produce were very impressive, but, as well as we remember, the balance between them was almost, if not quite, even. Mrs. Howe's ability to open the bank again and do some business on the old principles among her own sex, tells with some force in favor of the theory that women fall victims to imposture more readily than men. It must be admitted, however, that since the career of the firm of Grant & Ward has been exposed, the men have had but little to say in favor of their superior business perspicacity. The promises made by Ward were as wild as Mrs. Howe ever made to her depositors, and it was not poor spinsters they took in, but men familiar with the operations of business and the ordinary chances of profit.

The condition in which Messrs. George Riddle and Edgar Fawcett have left the once proud city of Boston, is really pitiable. Mr. Fawcett wrote for Mr. Riddle a play which he confidently declared to be his own masterpiece. Mr. Riddle appeared in it. The public declined to attend save in very sparse numbers, and the critics of the newspapers "jumped upon" both play and actor without mercy. Mr. Fawcett, we believe, left town instantly; Mr. Riddle, shortly after the composition of a farewell address to the city, in which he tells its inhabitants in the frankest manner just what he thinks of them. He says he has no grievance, and he asks neither sympathy nor congratulation, regarding the latter as "hollow and insincere." He wishes it to be understood that he is as indifferent to Boston as Boston is to him, and that no matter what other cities may hereafter say of him as an actor, "Boston will never have an opportunity again of sitting in judgment on me, nor of jumping on me with both feet —and the Boston foot is notoriously large." This neat rap at the physical aspect of the abstract Bostonian appears to have made Mr. Riddle very happy, for he concludes: "I am in buoyant spirits, not at all discouraged, and very hopeful of being able to exist without the suffrages of Boston, whose damnation is purely local." Announcement is not yet made of the locality in which Messrs. Fawcett and Riddle will next appear, and every city in the land will be more or less nervous until it is.

President Hyde of Bowdoin College, in Maine, who is the youngest college president in America, and was a good base-ball player when he was a student himself a few years ago, has been talking very sensibly on the general subject of college athletics. "Anybody who has had experience with a lot of vigorous young fellows," he says, "knows that they must have some way to dispose of their superfluous energy," and he believes that, if they do not have sports, they will expend it on doors and windows. The proof of this is found in the fact that the new gymnasium at Bowdoin has effected a great saving in the College's expenses for repairs, the general average of such expenses having never before been so low as it was last term. Part of the credit for this, it should be noted, Dr. Hyde gives to the jury system introduced by him a year and a half ago, under which, in case any damage is done by bonfires or smash-ups, the jurors investigate, ascertain who is responsible, and assess the persons who did the mischief. Each student is obliged to work in the gymnasium half-an-hour a day four days in the week, the gymnasium work being carefully graded according to the strength and ability of the men; and the system is already working a marked improvement in the College physique. Dr. Hyde approves of base-ball and boating as healthful and manly sports, but questions the advantage of intercollegiate base-ball leagues, on account of their tendency to foster gambling and lower the student to the level of the professional player. For this reason the Bowdoin Faculty encourage games between the several classes in preference to participation in the Maine intercollegiate base-ball league, although they do not prohibit the students from entering the league.

The extraordinary speech which Mr. Joseph Chamberlain made on Thursday last in Scotland seems to indicate either that he has completely got rid of all the political sagacity he ever had, or has finally determined to cut loose from the Liberal party altogether, and enroll himself among the Tories for good and all. Ever since Burke's famous protest against the "indictment of a whole people," the foundation-stone of the Liberal creed has been the assumption that all large bodies or communities are on the whole, if not always wise, at least well-meaning, and desire to be peaceable, and orderly, and respectable. This may not always be true—indeed, it is sometimes far from true; but Liberal politicians in every country in the world feel bound at least to profess to believe it as one of the cardinal articles in the democratic creed. When a country is much ravaged by crime or disorder of a political nature, the Liberal theory is expressed in the words of Sully, that men are never turbulent except through "impatience of suffering," or, in other words, that protracted resistance to or defiance of law is the fault of the Government. It is only high Tories, or German Junkers, or French Legitimists who maintain that a whole community or nation is a pack of thieves or cut-throats, who do wickedness because their nature is corrupt and their desires wholly evil, and that the only way of reducing them to order is by the free use of the dungeon and the scaffold.

Mr. Chamberlain seems to have lost all hold of this central idea of Liberalism. His denunciations of the Irish are worthy of Mr. Chaplin, or the Hon. James Lowther, or any old Tory squire. They are all thieves and assassins together, and they will probably try to assassinate him for denouncing him, but, like a fine old English gentleman that he is, they cannot intimidate him. They may kill him if they please, but they are not going to prevent him and his friends "handing down unimpaired to their children the mighty empire which their forefathers bequeathed to them." When one reads this fustian one can hardly help wondering at the rapidity of his rise from the position of an active and dexterous local politician to that of a leading British statesman. It is, however, doubtless accounted for by his extraordinary skill as an organizer, and his undoubted ability as an executive officer. It is now plain enough, however, that his head was not strong enough for his elevation. Since his revolt against Gladstone, to whose recognition of him he owed everything, the number of those who believed in his sincerity or disinterestedness has been rapidly diminishing, and his increasing fury against the Irish is doubtless due to disappointment over the now admitted failure of the Unionist secession. It has not loosened Gladstone's hold on the bulk of the Liberal party, and the old man's health continues to be provokingly good.

The letter of Parnell about the Phœnix Park murders, of which the London Times has printed what purports to be a facsimile, would, of course, be damaging to the last degree if authenticated. But the presumptions are all against its authenticity. The Times has been publishing a series of long articles entitled "Parnellism and Crime," trying to show the connection or the sympathy of the leading members of the Land League and National League with the various crimes and outrages committed or proposed by Irish Nationalists during the past seven years, both in Ireland, England, and America. The articles were got up, in the well-known journalistic way, by putting together all sorts of damaging and suspicious facts, pressing all possible presumptions into support of the charge, ignoring everything that makes against it, and giving to all careless or ambiguous phrases the worst possible meaning. The articles have, however, owing to their savage animus, fallen very flat. Neither the Liberals nor the Parnellites have taken the least notice of them. The silence of the Parnellites has been apparently very exasperating to the editor, for he keeps calling their attention to them, and challenging them to take legal proceedings against him. It was in this extremity that he announced that he had something stunning in reserve, which he would produce on some future day. This something appears to be the letter in question.

The principal internal evidence against the authenticity of the letter is that it covers the case far too completely. It is just such a letter as the Times would get Parnell to write if he agreed to help it to damage him seriously. In this it closely resembles the campaign stories and letters that "workers" get out in this country a day or two before election. He is a very close-mouthed and cautious man, and yet, merely to satisfy a dissatisfied murderer, he writes a most explicit letter, in plain English, without suppressing a single name or resorting to any sign or cipher, and then signs it, like a man, with his own name in full on another page, so that his correspondent, the Times suggests, might tear it off if he chose; but also, it might be added, if he did not so choose, that he might sell it to the Tory press. If his signature be genuine, its appearance on the other page looks as if it was obtained as an autograph. The Times has fortified the letter in a very amusing way by declaring in advance that Parnell's denial will be of no use in demolishing it. It will probably turn out to be a clumsy forgery like the Morey letter, and its appearance is made doubly suspicious by the fact that it appeared on the very day on which a division was expected on the second reading of the Coercion Bill.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, April 13, to TUESDAY, April 19, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND has appointed William J. Allen of Springfield, Ill., to be United States District Judge for the Southern District of that State; Col. Wesley Merritt of the Fifth Cavalry, now Superintendent at West Point, to be a brigadier-general; and Sigourney Butler of Boston to be Second Comptroller of the Treasury, in place of Judge Maynard, promoted to the Assistant Secretaryship of the Treasury.

On April 16 the President appointed Alexander R. Lawton of Georgia to be United States Minister to Austria. Mr. Lawton was appointed United States Minister to Russia in 1885, but his name was withdrawn on account of a discussion of his political disabilities, which were removed by the last Congress. Newton W. McConnell of Tennessee has been appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Montana, and George S. Peters of Ohio United States District Attorney for Utah.

Secretary Whitney has awarded to the Bethlehem Iron Works Company of Pennsylvania the contracts for furnishing steel-gun forgings and steel-armor plates for new war ships at a total cost of $4,512,938.29.

Gen. Greely, the new head of the Government Weather Bureau, has had prepared, from the records of the last fifteen years, a table of mean temperature, rainfall, etc., on every day of the year. The figures of any current date, by comparison with the mean figures of the last fifteen years on a corresponding date, show how far the temperature, rainfall, etc., of the current date exceed or fall below the normal line; and the mean records of a part of any season, compared with the mean records of the whole of the corresponding season for fifteen years, furnish a basis on which it is reasonably safe to predict the general character of the remaining part. Gen. Greely hopes thus to send to the produce exchanges periodical reports that will be of the highest service in changing their transactions from a purely speculative basis to one of reasonable assurance.

For the first quarter of this year the revenues of the Post-office Department foot up not far from $12,500,000, which is an increase of 9 per cent. over the revenues of the corresponding quarter of last year, and is the largest quarter's business ever done by the Department.

At a reception to ex-Speaker Carlisle at Covington, Ky., April 13, he expressed the opinion that "there has never been a time since 1876 when the majority of the people were not in favor of the principles of the Democratic party"; and he said: "This country is full of vagaries on the powers of Government. Some want it to become a great eleemosynary institution for the care of everybody; some want it to purchase the railroads and telegraph lines; some want it to interfere with the people's private business; some want it to loan money to indigent people. It is impossible to enumerate the schemes to rob the taxpayers for the benefit of somebody else. We must overcome the Socialistic theories abroad in the land. We must stand everywhere for the protection of both capital and labor. We must stand everywhere for the rights of men to do business with their own money in their own way. If the Democratic party does not do this, it might as well cease to exist."

After the defeat of the Prohibition amendment in Michigan, fifty Republican members of the Legislature, in caucus, decided to prepare a bill for high license and local option. Drug stores wishing to sell liquors are to pay the same tax as saloons. The limit of the license was fixed for cities of 10,000 inhabitants and over, $700; for cities under 10,000, $500; for incorporated villages, $100; for townships, $300. A High-License Bill has been introduced in the Massachusetts Legislature, which fixes the price of a first-class license at $1,000, second and third class at $750, fourth class at $500, and fifth class at $150.

Three proposed amendments to the Constitution of California failed of adoption at the polls on April 12. The first provided that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court should be elected by the judges instead of by the people; the second, that the salaries of certain Superior Court judges should be increased, as well as the salary of the Supreme Court judges from $6,000 to $7,500; and the third, that cities of more than 10,000 population should make their own charters.

Investigation of the recent effort to kill a member of the Illinois Legislature, named Bailey, of which the friends of the condemned Anarchists in Chicago are suspected, has led to the suspicion of an oath-bound organization of Socialists to wreak vengeance (in case hope of saving the condemned Anarchists is lost) on all who have aided in their prosecution.

The Ohio State Centennial Commission, of which Gov. Foraker is Chairman, is making preparations for the exposition to be held at Columbus next year in commemoration of the first settlement of the Northwest Territory.

A very destructive cyclone swept through Belmont County, O., April 14. At St. Clairsville nearly every house was damaged. The churches, banks, court-house, newspaper offices, and hotels were demolished or so badly shattered as to be useless, and many people were hurt. At Martin's Ferry 80 to 100 houses were swept away, and almost 100 families made homeless. Twenty-five people were more or less seriously wounded.

On April 13 Columbia College celebrated its centennial anniversary. There were present many distinguished visitors from other institutions of learning, and honorary degrees were conferred on the following: Degree of Doctor of Letters—Andrew Dickinson White, Merrill Edwards Gates, Francis Andrew March, Richard Salter Storrs, John De Witt, Horace Howard Furness, James Albert Harrison, William Milligan Sloane, Charles Waldstein, William Copley Winslow, Henry Barnard, George William Curtis, Alice Elvira Freeman, President of Wellesley College; George Lansing Taylor, Martin Brewer Anderson, James Hammond Trumbull, Nathaniel Henry Rhodes Dawson, Isaac Hollister Hall, Moses Coit Tyler, George Bancroft, Francis James Child, William Dwight Whitney, Amelia Blandford Edwards, Secretary Egyptian Exploration Fund. Degree of Doctor of Laws—Abram Stevens Hewitt, Julius Hawley Seelye, Benjamin Apthorp Gould, James Burrill Angell, John Call Dalton, Charles Andrews, John Barbee Minor, Simon Newcomb, Charles A. Rapallo, Robert Earl, Maria Mitchell, Director of Observatory, Vassar College; John Chandler Bancroft Davis, Frederic René Coudert, Charles Augustus Young, William Watson Goodwin, Daniel Coit Gilman, Francis Amasa Walker, Morrison Remick Waite, William Crawford Ruger, John Tyndall, Lewis Morris Rutherfurd, Eugene Waldemar Hilgard, Émile Lavasseur, Hermann Ludwig von Helmholtz, John William Dawson, Daniel Manning, Edward Singleton Holden, Moritz Steinschneider. Degree of Doctor of Divinity—Frederick Dan Huntington, George Williamson Smith, Eugene Augustus Hoffman, Robert Brinckerhoff Fairbairn, Albert Zabriskie Gray, Henry Augustus Coit, Phillips Brooks, John Richard McGrath. Frederic R. Coudert of this city, an alumnus of the College, delivered the oration.

Dr. C. W. Bennett of Evanston, Ill., acting for a donor whose name has not been made public, has purchased the Ranke library at Berlin for the Syracuse (N. Y.) University, Mr. V. H. R. Carey of this city, a post-graduate student of Harvard, has given $25,000 to aid in building the swimming bath for the gymnasium. The bath will be 100 feet by 60, and will contain a thousand lockers and a racquet court. An anonymous gift of $25,000 has been made to the Law Department of Yale College, to be used for the furtherance of the study of contracts and commercial law. The fund is to be known as the Phelps Fund, in honor of Prof. Phelps, now United States Minister to England, who was one of the Faculty of the Law Department.

A dinner was given in this city April 14 in behalf of the American School at Athens, to which many distinguished scholars sat down. Mr. George William Curtis presided and delivered the opening address, and speeches were made by Mr. James Russell Lowell and Dr. Waldstein.

Walt Whitman read his lecture in the Madison Square Theatre on "Abraham Lincoln" April 14, which was the twenty-second anniversary of Lincoln's assassination. In the box at the left of the stage sat Mr. James Russell Lowell and Prof. Charles Eliot Norton, and on the right Mr. E. C. Stedman.

The anniversary of Jefferson's birth, April 13, was celebrated by the alumni of the University of Virginia who live in New Orleans. The orator was William M. Burwell, whose father was private secretary to President Jefferson. Though advanced in years, he is an active journalist, and at the last election was the Republican candidate for Congress in the First City District.

The remains of Lincoln were privately taken from their hiding place April 14, and interred in the north vault of the Lincoln monument in Oak Ridge Cemetery, Springfield, Ill. The Lincoln Guard of Honor had kept them concealed since the effort to steal them in 1876. The features were easily recognizable.

Mrs. M. M. Dickey, one of the six surviving pensioners of the Revolutionary war, died on April 12, at Towanda, Pa., aged ninety-six. Her husband died at the age of ninety-six in 1844. James S. Delano, an employee of the Treasury Department at Washington since 1862 until recently, died April 14. He began as a clerk, and rose through the different grades until he became Deputy Second Comptroller. The Rev. Francis W. Tustin, Professor of Greek in Bucknell University, Pennsylvania, died on the same day. The Right Rev. Monsignor William Quinn, Vicar-General of the Archdiocese of New York, died in Paris on April 15. In 1875 he was made Vicar-General and rector of the Mott Street Cathedral, and the labor of building the new Cathedral fell almost entirely on his shoulders, because of the illness of Cardinal McCloskey. In 1879 the Pope made him one of his domestic prelates, conferring upon him the rank of Monsignor. Other deaths are those of John L. Hayes, Secretary of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, April 18; Chief-Justice David K. Cartter of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, April 16; ex-Congressman A. J. Weaver of Nebraska, and Alexander Mitchell, President of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad Company, April 19.

FOREIGN.

Mr. Chamberlain made a speech at Ayr, April 14, which greatly excited all parties, and so inflamed the Irish against him that he received many threatening letters. In the course of his speech he said: "The opponents of the Crimes Bill have made an outcry against the repression of liberty. Liberty to do what? To commit theft, to ruin industrious men, to outrage women?" When he was hissed he continued: "This is the spirit of the parties in the Irish Convention in Chicago. That Convention, besides being attended by delegates honestly in sympathy with Ireland, had apostles of outrage and murder, who have paid the outrage-mongers of England. Mr. Redmond, the delegate of the Irish Parliamentary party, explicitly declared that it was the aim of that party to effect the entire separation of Ireland from England, and that their policy was to make the government of Ireland by England impossible." In the House of Commons Mr. Redmond made a personal explanation with reference to his speech at the Chicago Convention, disclaiming the interpretation of it made by Mr. Chamberlain.

The popular protest against the Coercion Bill in all parts of the United Kingdom has been emphatically expressed. In John Bright's own division in Birmingham, every representative elected to the Two Thousand (the Liberal Association) except Mr. Chamberlain himself, is a pronounced Gladstonian. A resolution denouncing coercion and expressing unabated confidence in Mr. Gladstone was carried. The Daily News of April 15 contained eleven advertisement columns of solid signatures, numbering altogether 3,200, of Nonconformist preachers in England and Wales, protesting against coercion, and expressing the belief that "force can be no remedy for political discontent." Earl Spencer, formerly Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, on arriving at Truro April 15, was greeted by a concourse of 20,000 persons, and was presented with an address of welcome. In his reply he condemned the Government's Irish policy and advocated home rule. Sir George Otto Trevelyan, one of the Unionist leaders, and formerly Chief Secretary for Ireland, on April 14 published a letter on the Coercion Bill tantamount to a manifesto against it. He said that the bill was chiefly aimed at politicians and editors opposed to the Government's policy, and added: "The full weight of this terrible but one-sided measure is intended to fall, and will fall, upon the politicians of one party alone. The measure will be administered by those who, beyond all question, are actuated by the strongest Orange sympathies, and it is calculated to exasperate the people without serving any useful purpose." This letter is regarded as the severest blow yet dealt to the Unionist party.

At Limerick on April 17th, 60,000 persons joined in a demonstration against the Coercion Bill, the Mayor presiding.

There was an extraordinary scene in the House of Commons on April 15. Mr. Saunderson, Conservative, accused the Irish members (clearly alluding to Mr. Healy in particular) of associating with murderers. When the Speaker refused to rule the remark out of order, Mr. Healy said: "If the honorable, gallant gentleman refers to me, I have no hesitation in telling him across the floor of the House that he is a liar," for which he was suspended and he left the House amid the cheers of the Irish members. Mr. Saunderson continuing, Mr. Sexton next rose: "I say you are a wilful and cowardly liar. If I meet you outside the door of this House I will cram this statement down your throat and thrash you within an inch of your life." It was clear that unless Mr. Saunderson withdrew his expression, every Parnellite member present would give him the lie direct, and all would be suspended in succession. He withdrew his remark and order was restored. Mr. Healy was, therefore, suspended for contradicting a remark which was subsequently withdrawn by the Speaker's order.

On the second reading of the Coercion Bill, April 18, Mr. Gladstone, in his speech, which was delivered with every sign of vigor, protested eloquently against the scoffs at the American contributions to the relief of the famine-stricken Irish people, contributions to the rent of their landlords, and the like, as scoffs at one of the glories of the United States. He described the bill as directed not against crime but combination. He concluded with these words: "The bill, sir, in my view, is a cup of poison. I will not commend it to the lips of Ireland. It must be offered to them by another hand than mine. To me it will be honor and happiness enough should I be permitted the smallest share in dashing it to the ground." Mr. Balfour's speech was important for his statement that the Government will stand or fall by its Land Bill. The bill then passed its second reading.

The London Times on April 18, as a proof of its assertion, at the conclusion of its series of articles on "Parnellism and Crime," that it had documentary evidence of Parnell's connection with crime in Ireland, printed a facsimile of a letter which it said was written by Parnell to Egan to pacify his subordinates when Parnell publicly denounced the Phœnix Park murders. The letter is in a handwriting which does not resemble Parnell's, but the signature, the Times asserted, is his. The letter, which is dated simply "15, 5, 82," without an address, is as follows:

"DEAR SIR: I am not surprised at your friend's anger, but he and you should know that to denounce the murders was the only course open to us. To do that promptly was plainly our best policy. But you can tell him and all others concerned that though I regret the accident of Lord F. Cavendish's death, I cannot refuse to admit that Burke got no more than his deserts. You are at liberty to show him this, and others whom you can trust also, but let not my address be known. He can write to the House of Commons."

The letter was the topic of universal conversation. Irishmen emphatically repudiated it, and not one believed it genuine. At one o'clock that night, in the House of Commons, Mr. Parnell described it as "a villanous, bare faced forgery" to influence the division. "I never heard of the letter," he said. "I never directed such a letter to be written. I never saw such a letter before I saw it in the Times this morning. The subject-matter is preposterous; and the phraseology, absurd as it could possibly be in every particular, bears evidence of its want of genuineness." Concerning the Phœnix Park murders, he said: "It is no exaggeration to say that if I had been in the park that day, I would gladly have stood between Lord Frederick Cavendish and the daggers of his assassins [cheers and cries of "Burke"]; for the matter of that, between their daggers and Burke. Now, sir, I leave this subject. I have suffered more than any other man from that terrible deed in Phœnix Park. The Irish nation has suffered more than any other nation. I have never had any dealings with Alexander Sullivan, or any one else, in respect to the doings or proceedings of any secret society." This was during the debate on the second reading of the Coercion Bill. In conclusion, taking up his hat, he said, in a strong voice: "I trust in God this nation and this House may be saved from the degradation, mistake, and peril of passing this bill."

Messrs. Parnell and Davitt, and other prominent Irishmen, are making an effort to help the Irish in an industrial way by promoting the organization of an Irish woollen manufacturing and exporting company with a capital of $500,000. Mr. Davitt, while in the United States, received many promises of assistance from importers of woollens

The Rev. Dr. Parker of London will deliver a eulogy on Henry Ward Beecher in Brooklyn on June 24. After that he will preach a number of times in Brooklyn, and will subsequently deliver several lectures in the United States.

The volume of European emigration to America is again rapidly increasing. The railways are running special trains to Queenstown to accommodate emigrants. The emigration from Hamburg to the United States in March amounted to 4,059 men and 1,904 women, whence the total since the new year has been 7,820 men and 3,572 women.

The German Government has issued a decree that all public placards posted in Alsace-Lorraine shall be printed in the German language, but French translations will be permitted. Every Mayor or other official in the provinces suspected of French sympathies has been dismissed. On April 13 the Berlin Post published a spirited article on the relations between Germany and France. Referring to the French cavalry evolutions at Lunéville, it said: "These and similar military preparations along the frontier bear the character of provocations, and appear to proceed entirely from a wish to annoy and alarm Germany." Le Paris in reply spoke of the German policy as "lying, cynical, and brutal."

Gen. Brialmont, aide-de-camp of the King of the Belgians, recently said: "War is certainly inevitable. But, from what I can gather from all sources, it will not break out so long as the aged Emperor of Germany is alive. He is strongly imbued with religious and humane sentiments, which cause him to shrink from shedding more blood. There is no effort he will not make compatible with the dignity of his empire to avoid an outbreak of hostilities." Gen. Brialmont's opinion is that a Franco-German war would mean the invasion of Belgium, and invasion would mean annexation.

The Czar has rejected the French proposals for an alliance between France and Russia. The French Ambassador, M. de Laboulaye, thereupon offered to resign.

A Frenchman named Nillairand on April 18 stabbed ex-Marshal Bazaine with a poniard at Madrid, exclaiming, "J'ai vengé ma patrie." He was arrested, and is thought to be insane. The wound is reported to be slight.

At the opening of the Italian Parliament, Prime Minister Depretis said that Italy would follow a policy of peace, but, since every other Government was increasing its armament, the Cabinet would ask the Chambers for credits to strengthen the kingdom's defences.

It has been reported from Madrid that leading statesmen and literary men will join influential politicians of Central and South America in advocating closer commercial and political relations between the Spanish countries on both sides of the Atlantic. Their hope is to form a commercial zollverein and political alliance to combat the growing influence of the Anglo-Saxon race, especially in Central America, Mexico, and the West Indies, and to prevent the Panama Canal's falling into the hands of the United States.

The Pope has decided that the Church shall not oppose the Knights of Labor in America. This decision will stand so long as the present method pursued in furthering their aims prevails. The document of Cardinal Gibbons has been endorsed. In Canada, where a mandament had been issued against the Knights, the members of the Order will receive absolution on promise of obedience to future decisions of the Holy See.

Several Arab tribes have detached themselves from the Mahdi's authority and proclaimed one of their Sheikhs Sultan, with a residence at Kassala. They have an organized army of 8,000 men, and the new Sultan has appointed five governors of provinces.

A Somali trader from the Uganda country has brought news that Emin Bey is established north of the Albert Nyanza, and has two small steamers plying on the White Nile. The King of Uganda, a youth of eighteen who has 1,000 wives, refused him permission to pass through his territory towards Zanzibar. It is reported that the messengers sent by Stanley from Zanzibar to Emin Bey were detained by a chief on the way.

The Dominion Parliament opened April 14. The Governor-General in his speech said that the negotiations between Great Britain and the United States on the fisheries question were still in progress, and would, he hoped, result in an arrangement honorable and satisfactory to both nations; meanwhile, provision had been made for the protection of the Canadian inshore fisheries. On April 15 the Hon. Edward Blake said the Government had not treated the Americans as it becomes one people to treat the citizens of another country. He asked what had been done, and what assurance the Government had of a satisfactory settlement. In reply Sir John McDonald declared that the question was such a delicate one to handle in an incomplete stage of proceeding that he could not now give an answer. The Canadian fisheries fleet this season will include, besides the flagship Arcadia, two steamships, seven schooners, and the confiscated Highland Light, which has been christened Vigilant. These vessels carry thirty officers, and sixteen guns, and 130 men.

The Joint Committee of the Mexican Congress has reported in favor of the repeal of that amendment to the Constitution which forbids the immediate reëlection of the President.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE FINISH.

In a year from this time, the record of the Administration on which it must go to the country will be finally made up. There are already in that record, in the matter of appointments and dismissals, a great many things which the best friends of the President cannot reconcile with his promises and professions, made before election, except by making allowances for the difficulties he has had to encounter from his own party. That is to say, they have had to presume that he tried to do better and meant to do better than he has done, but encountered resistance too great for any one man to overcome. But we feel bound to say that this is one of the excuses, like those that one makes for the shortcomings of a young man, which are only good as long as there remains time for improvement —that is, there are a good many defences and apologies which one can produce, with more or less effectiveness, for an Administration during its first and second years, which begin to wear out in the third, and become mere rags and tatters in the fourth. Unfortunately, when the time comes round to vote, it is the doings of the third and fourth years which people have most distinctly in their minds in forming their judgments.

For these reasons, we who believe firmly in the great superiority of President Cleveland to any of his recent predecessors, in his manner of using the patronage of the Government, cannot conceal from ourselves, nevertheless, that it is in the highest degree dangerous to enter on the last year of his Administration without greatly checking the political activity of some of his subordinates; and not only this, but without giving the public a good many conspicuous examples, between now and June, 1888, of the kind of Administration he had in mind when he wrote his celebrated letter to Mr. George William Curtis and others. A good many gentlemen are, in fact, now preparing for his renomination in ways which will make it extremely difficult for civil-service reformers to go to the polls for him with the alacrity they displayed in 1884. Numerous dismissals have been made or are being made which are just as bad, from every point of view, moral, political, and administrative, as any that occurred under Grant or Garfield, or would have occurred under Blaine. This downward course must be arrested if we are to have 1884 over again. There is still time, but it will soon be too late to make an effective change. No man who has ever sat in the Presidential chair since Jackson's day can less well afford to go before the American people for reëlection with such a record as President Cleveland is now allowing some of his official followers to make up for him. Nobody could afford it who had accomplished even half as much good as he has done.

We cannot now recall any other Administration than his since the war to which such an appeal as this could be effectively made. He has given many illustrations during the past three years of the utility of calling his attention to departures made by his followers from his own programme. What we wish now to emphasize is, that the time during which such corrections and emendations can be made to produce their proper effect on public opinion, is very brief, and must be improved.

THE DRINK BILL, FORMERLY AND NOW.

Mr. W. F. Switzler, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics at Washington, has done a good and timely piece of work by compiling and presenting in his last quarterly report some interesting and valuable figures as to the consumption and cost of liquor in times past and now. The public attention has been so fixed upon the drink evil during the past winter by the controversies over liquor legislation in many States, that a careful investigation of the facts is peculiarly welcome.

The records of the Internal Revenue Bureau and of the customs service furnish the figures as to the quantity of distilled spirits, wines, and malt liquors produced in this country, exported from it, and imported from abroad, so that it is possible to present a reasonably accurate statement as to the amount of each sort consumed in recent years, while less accurate data as to the past are found in the census reports for 1840, 1850, and 1860. The annual consumption in gallons for each of the decennial years and for 1886 is given in this table:

	Distilled spirits.	Wines.	Malt liquors.
1840	43,060,884	4,873,096	23,310,843
1850	51,833,473	6,315,871	36,563,039
1860	89,968,651	11,059,141	101,346,699
1870	79,895,708	12,225,067	204,756,156
1880	63,526,694	28,329,541	414,220,165
1886	72,261,614	22,067,220	642,967,720

The real significance of this table, however, only appears when it is supplemented by one which gives the total consumption per capita of population for the various years, as it is this which indicates the increase or diminution of the drinking habit. Here is such a table:

	Distilled spirits.	Wines.	Malt liquors.
1840	2.52	0.29	1.36
1850	2.23	0.27	1.58
1860	2.86	0.35	3.22
1870	2.07	0.32	5.30
1880	1.26	0.56	8.26
1886	1.24	0.38	11.18

Dismissing as of doubtful value the census figures for 1840, 1850, and 1860, the reports beginning with 1870 show certain tendencies very clearly. Eliminating from the account the divergences caused by the ups and downs which the distilling business experiences, like every other industry and more than many others, and which often cause great differences in the amounts withdrawn for consumption in successive years, it is obvious that there is a steady drift toward a diminution of the amount of "hard liquor" consumed in the country. There has not been a year during the decade beginning with 1876 in which the consumption of distilled spirits per capita was as great as it was in each of the half dozen years beginning with 1870; and the conclusion is unavoidable that Americans as a race drink decidedly less whiskey now than they used to do, the average for the last ten years being but 1.29 gallon, against 1.54 for the previous six. It will surprise many people to find that the use of wine appears also to be decreasing of late, the average having crept up pretty steadily until it exceeded half a gallon per capita in 1880, and then receded to but little over a third of a gallon in the last three years. The consumption of malt liquors, on the other hand, has increased almost thirty-fold in absolute quantity, and nearly ten-fold relatively to population, since 1840, and this increase has been most marked during the past decade, in which the amount per capita has increased nearly two-thirds.

Figures from the 'Statistical Abstract for the United Kingdom' show a similar decrease in the consumption of spirits and of wine in Great Britain of late years, and an arrest, at least, of the beer-drinking habit:

	Distilled spirits.	Wine.	Beer.
1871	1.12
1880	1.04
1881	1.00	.43	33.90
1882	1.07	.41	33.65
1883	1.03	.40	33.13
1884	1.05	.39	33.72
1885	1.01	.37	32.79

There would seem from these figures to be no ground for doubt that the consumption of the more intoxicating liquors is decreasing in both England and America. Any candid person who has reached middle life will confess that drunkenness appears to him less common, as it certainly is less respectable, than when he was young, and it is satisfactory to find this impression justified by the most accurate figures which are available. Few people are so fanatical that they will not admit that whiskey is worse than beer, and that a nation is better off when it is reducing the quantity of "hard liquor" it drinks, even if it increases at the same time its indulgence in the lighter alcoholic beverages. It is an interesting fact, by the way, that the consumption of coffee increases with the falling off in whiskey, the average in this country having risen in the past five years from 8.2 pounds per capita to 9.11 pounds.

The report presents a valuable contribution from Mr. F. N. Barrett, editor of the American Grocer, published in this city, as to the cost of alcoholic beverages to consumers in the United States. The wildest guesses on this subject are constantly put forth in temperance addresses, and Mr. Switzler has done well to seek an estimate from an intelligent source. We can only summarize briefly Mr. Barrett's methods. He gives good reasons for the belief that 10 per cent. of the spirits distilled is used in the manufacturing and mechanic arts, but he regards this as fully made up for by the water added by the retailer. He therefore accepts 75,000,000 gallons, the average for the past five years, as the proper total, which, at 60 drinks per gallon, and at an average of 7½ cents per drink, makes $337,500,000 for whiskey; beer is put at an average of 609,705,367 gallons, which at 50 cents to the consumer makes $304,852,683; imported wines, 4,100,664 gallons, at $4, $16,402,656; domestic wines, 17,391,343 gallons, at $2, $34,782,686—a grand total of $693,538,025, or, adding a reasonable allowance for illicit whiskey and home-made wines, a round sum of $700,000,000 a year paid by the consumers (the cost to the retailers, it should be explained, being placed at only $300,000,000, which allows a profit of 133 1-3 per cent. paid by the consumers). Mr. Barrett's computation is so well fortified that it would command acceptance of itself, but the value of his $700,000,000 estimate is, of course, enhanced by the fact that so high a statistical authority as Mr. Edward Atkinson has reached the same conclusion by an independent investigation.

Mr. Barrett estimates the number of people who consume this liquor at 14,925,417, or a trifle above one-quarter of the whole number, and presents the following table of per capita consumption and cost:

Year.	Spirits.		Beer.		Wine.		Cost yearly to consumers.
	Total population.	Drinking population.	Total population.	Drinking population.	Total population.	Drinking population.
	Gals.	Gals.	Gals.	Gals.	Gals.	Gals.
1882.....	1.3	5.4	9.8	39.1	.48	1.9	$47 65
1883.....	1.4	5 7	10.2	39.9	.47	1.8	49 20
1884.....	1.4	5 7	10.6	41.6	.36	1.4	49 25
1885.....	1.2	4.8	10 4	40.9	.38	1.5	45 05
1886.....	1.2	4.8	10.9	43.0	.37	1.4	45 90
Average.	1.3	5.3	10.4	40.9	.41	1.6	$47 41

What relation does the expenditure of $700,000,000 for alcoholic beverages bear to the nation's expenditure for food, clothing, and shelter? Mr. Barrett discusses this question, and, estimating that $150 to $200 a year represents the per capita cost of maintenance throughout the country, makes the total for absolute living expenses from $8,790,000,000 to $11,720,000,000. This gives a ratio of $1 spent by the American people for liquor to every $12.55 to $16.74 spent for the support of life.

We regret that Mr. Barrett did not extend his estimate to cover a longer period of years, though we know of no reason to doubt that such an extension would merely have confirmed the conclusion justified by the figures from 1882 to 1886, viz., that the drink bill of the United States relatively to population is decreasing. A statement copied in the report from an English publication proves that this is the case in the United Kingdom, the average cost of liquors per capita (of the whole population, not merely the consumers) being as follows for a series of years:

1871	19 24	1878	20 46
1872	20 12	1879	18 25
1873	21 23	1880	17 25
1874	21 21	1881	17 58
1875	21 23	1882	17 52
1876	21 66

All of these figures lead up to the same conclusion, that the consumption of liquor—certainly of the more fiery sorts—is decreasing; that the drink bill of great nations, like the United States and England, enormous as it is, has at least ceased to grow, and apparently has begun to diminish; in short, that civilization has begun to gain the upper hand in the warfare with intemperance.

GETTING THEIR EYES OPEN.

THERE are multiplying signs that the workingmen, who were at first blinded by the "organized labor" movement, are at last getting their eyes open, and beginning to see how badly they have been fooled by their leaders. The unbroken succession of failures in the great strikes started by the Knights of Labor, beginning with last spring, appears to have set the workingmen to thinking. They have turned over in their minds the results of these various ventures, scarcely any of which would have been made except for the organization, and they find that the only people who have profited by the long series of controversies have been the "professional organizers" who run the Knights, and who are never so happy as when they are making mischief.

The attitude of the shoemakers in this city is so significant of the change which is in progress that it merits examination. About a month ago the Knights of Labor issued an order that the men employed in Hanan & Son's manufactory should quit work. There had been trouble in the shop last fall, growing out of the interference of the Executive Committee of District Assembly 91, but on the 16th of February the employees held a meeting and made an agreement to continue work for the coming year at the old rate of wages. On the 16th of March, one Gill and two other members of the Executive Committee called upon the proprietors and demanded the discharge of a man named Dunphy, threatening to order a strike if the firm did not comply. The senior Hanan told Gill, the spokesman, that they would never yield to his demands, because they had been advised that they should render themselves liable to prosecution for damages if they discharged Dunphy. He also reminded Gill that such a demand was unlawful and in violation of the Penal Code, and that those making it rendered themselves liable to arrest for conspiracy. Gill replied that he did not care anything for the Penal Code or the laws against conspiracy, and was able to take care of himself. Mr. Hanan told him to put his demand in writing, and he sat down at the desk and began to write. Mr. Hanan asked him to explain why the demand was made, when he stopped and said: "I guess I won't commit myself in ink." Finding that nothing was to be gained by further discussion, the Executive Committee withdrew and ordered a strike.

Frank P. Campbell, the foreman of the shop, is a Knight of Labor, and so prominent that he is Master Workman of a local Assembly in Tarrytown where his home is; but he seems to be a man with a mind of his own, and, when the order was given to quit work, he refused to budge. Most of the workmen stood with him in refusing to strike when they had no grievance, simply to gratify the whim of an Executive Committee, and the places of the few who left were quickly filled. District Assembly 91 promptly suspended Mr. Campbell as Master Workman of his local assembly for such contumacy, and on Saturday he carried his appeal from this ruling to the office of 49. As he handed it to the Secretary, Master-Workman Quinn stood by, and a Sun reporter, who fortunately chanced to be near, gives this account of the interview between them:

> Mr. Quinn—You are working there still?
> Mr. Campbell—I am, and I don't think——
> Mr. Quinn—Oh, you go to blank!
> Mr. Campbell—What power have you got to send me there? Who are you, any way? I am as good a man as you.
> Mr. Quinn—If it had not been for you, your men would have come out.
> Mr. Campbell—Your committee had no right to call my men out. I don't obey such orders, and never will. The men would not come out without cause.
> Mr. Quinn—No wonder they [the proprietors] can go on with their work when such scabs as you work for them.
> Mr. Campbell—I suppose if I sat in beer saloons all day, and smoked cigars which other people paid for, you might like me better.
> Mr. Quinn—I'll black-list you in every shop in the United States.
> Mr. Campbell—I don't care a d—— for you. I can live in spite of you. You are getting $1,200 a year from the Assembly for doing nothing but create trouble for honest workmen, but you get no more of my money to support you in loafing round, wearing fine clothes, and smoking good cigars.
> Mr. Quinn—Don't you wish you could do it?
> At this point Campbell walked out of the office, fearing he might be helped out.

On Sunday about 350 shoemakers, most of them, but not all, from Hanan & Son's, held a meeting to consider the situation. Mr. Campbell made a speech which was so full of common sense that our readers will be glad to see the Sun's report of his remarks:

> "It is time that a halt was called upon the leaders of the Knights of Labor, and particularly those of District Assemblies 91 and 49, for they surely are losing their heads. The leaders are in receipt of large incomes, and in order to earn them cause useless and nonsensical strikes. Because I would not break a contract that was signed with the full consent of the Knights of Labor, Quinn threatened me with outlawry. Quinn and Maguire sat in secret conclave at midnight, and the edict, like one issued by the Czar, went forth: 'Peremptorily withdraw Campbell.' It is time the shoemakers put down these men. In the Federation of Labor there will be no secret conclaves, no more meetings in the dead of the night. I told Quinn plainly that it was his $1,200 a year he was after, and not the interests of the men he was paid to protect. It comes to this, that these men must be curtailed in their power to issue edicts to ruin any man who opposes them in their schemes. Of what use was this great sympathetic strike of 49 last February? Go to the tenement-houses on the river front and seek out there the starving children of the 'longshoremen who took part in that strike. Many of them have had no work since, and will not get any either, for their employers were angered at their actions. Could not any capable man see how it would result? War is now brought about that the leaders might draw their salaries more consistently, because they filled a large space of the attention of workingmen. It is better that the workingmen be rid of the Maguires, the Quinns, and the Drurys, than that they and their children should be brought into misery and poverty. John E. Gill, Chairman of the Executive Board of Assembly 91, Knights of Labor, has been but two years a shoemaker; yet he is grand dictator of all the shoemakers in this vicinity, and can say how, when, or where real shoemakers shall work."

After this exposition of the matter it was determined by a decisive vote that those present should form themselves into the "Manufacturing Shoemakers' Protective and Benevolent Union, No. 1," leave the Knights of Labor, and join the American Federation of Labor. In the course of the discussion another shoemaker, Thomas P. Masterson, talked in much the same strain as Mr. Campbell. The only plan for workingmen, he said, was to organize themselves into trade unions. Cigarmakers ought not to say how much money a shoemaker should get. The workingmen had grown tired of the mystical order. When they came to star-chamber business, the people began to watch for crooked work, and without the confidence of the people the order could not stand. "One man near the head of affairs," said Mr. Masterson, "went into a Park Row saloon and got $20 on a forged check, and those are the kind of men that give orders to us. If these are the angels in disguise sent to lift up the earth, the sooner they drop it the better."

At the same time with this revolt against the Knights in New York, an equally encouraging movement in the same direction is reported from New England. For some time there has been growing discontent among boot and shoe cutters in that part of the country because of the tyranny of the Knights, and they have finally decided to form an organization of their own. A most significant feature of this movement is the fact that the platform adopted takes the ground that "strikes and lockouts are wrong in principle, and tend to work harm, and are not for the interests of either employer or employee, and should not be resorted to until all other measures have failed."

AFTER THE IRONSIDES ON A TRICYCLE. —II.

At Marston Moor the snake had been scotched for the Parliament, but not killed. In another year the King was once more in the field, energetic and enterprising. By means of the "Self-denying Ordinance," Parliament swept incapables out of places of command; by means of the "New Model" it invigorated its army in the rank and file. The noble Fairfax, his face honorably disfigured by the scar of Marston Moor, was put at the head, with Cromwell for second in command. Following on the track of Fairfax as he sought the Cavaliers, in June, 1645, I pushed my tricycle through an upland region, until at length, on a point six hundred feet above the sea-level, a tall spire rose before me. I passed through a rather shabby village, and, after a dinner at the inn, during which I admired the beautiful horse-chestnut trees in the churchyard opposite, I turned on my machine northward, and was presently in a by-road, between high hawthorn hedges. A steep declivity carried me from the plateau into low ground through which flowed a brook, a slope down which I rushed with my hand on the brake, while the air rung in my ears. At the foot was a gate at the roadside, opening which I followed a cart path to the "Broad-Moor Farm." In a great field, rising gradually towards the tall spire which I had left behind, I saw to my left, as I made my way rather painfully along the rough track, the Broad-Moor farmer and his men pitching into cocks, ready for the wagon, the heavy windrows of hay just thoroughly cured by the August sun. I went to the group through the stubble on foot, and the strong farmer, leaning on his pitchfork, received me well.

I now stood in the centre of the battle-field of Naseby, on the declivity of "Mill Hill." A mile northward the ground rose from the lowland in an answering ridge, "Dust Hill"; beyond which still another height could be seen, "Sibbertoft Ridge." The names are all as on the battle day, and the appearance of things quite unchanged except that, as at Marston Moor, what was then partially waste land is now thoroughly cultivated, and a few hedges divide what was then unenclosed.

On the morning of June 14, 1645, Fairfax, marching out from Naseby, saw from Mill Hill the flashing pikes and waving pennons of the King just coming into view over Sibbertoft Ridge to the north. Presently they were on Dust Hill, whence the drums and trumpets and even the voices of the captains must have sounded clearly across. Fairfax, withdrawing a furlong or so, into a hollow behind Mill Hill, made his dispositions. To the west, on his left flank, behind "Sulby Hedge" (the name and the hedge are still there), he put the Anabaptist Major of Cuirassiers Okey, who led a force of excellent troops, dragoons, for the time being dismounted, but with their horses close by. Next to Okey ran the left wing under Henry Ireton, once a scholar and lawyer, one of the best brains and stoutest hearts in England, Cromwell's favorite, afterwards his son-in-law, for the first time that day in high command, promoted for his merit from a captaincy over the heads of many older soldiers. Behind a "forlorn hope" of musketeers stood as centre five regiments of foot under the doughty and genial old Skippon, leader of the London trained bands, a campaigner from the Low Countries, whose shout to his men peals cheerily out of the past: "Come, my boys, my brave boys! let us pray heartily and fight heartily. I will run the same fortunes and hazards with you. Remember the cause is for God and for the defence of yourselves, your wives, and your children!" Behind the centre was a reserve under Pride, a foundling and once a drayman, destined to be hereafter the hero of "Pride's Purge," and Hammond, a gentleman and Oxford scholar—impetuous fighters both. So in the "New Model" high and low-born stood shoulder to shoulder. We find the Ironsides on the east, constituting the Roundhead right, six regiments, of which Cromwell held two in reserve. The one destined on this day to be especially noticeable was led by Whalley, afterwards the regicide who fled for his life to New England, the hero of one of the most familiar and picturesque of our colonial traditions (exploded, alas!), the saving of Hadley in the Connecticut Valley from Indian attack, near the time of Philip's War. The baggage was in the rear of Ireton, to the west of Naseby, guarded by a thin line of matchlock men, ranged round it in a circle.

As to the King's array, Rupert, smarting under the recollection of his beating, longed to cross swords once more with Cromwell. He was, however, opposed to Ireton; while Sir Marmaduke Langdale, a thin, serious Yorkshireman, one of the King's best soldiers, had the place the Prince desired for himself. Sir Marmaduke had the drawback of a hasty temper; and now, as the battle was joining, hot words were exchanged between him and his subordinates, a want of union most ill-timed when the points that glinted on the opposite hill-side were those of the Ironsides. Between Rupert and Sir Marmaduke, with a strong reserve behind, the centre was led by Sir Jacob Astley, a fine type of the better Cavaliers, trained by the great Gustavus, his fire not at all extinguished under his gray hairs. One wonders whether, as he stood before his array, he repeated the naïve trooper's prayer which he is said to have uttered at Edgehill: "Lord, Thou knowest how busy I must be this day, but if I forget Thee do not Thou forget me!" The forces on both sides were in number scarcely half of those engaged at Marston Moor, but the troops were magnificent and the leaders the thrice-sifted corn.

As I went over on the field the story of the battle with the kind farmer at my side, I could trace narrowly the position of the two lines—solid English masses facing one another in the middle of the beautiful June forenoon, scarcely distinguishable except that the Cavaliers wore a green sprig and the Roundheads their badge of white. The standards of the former, of course, were far gayer and more numerous. The Puritan ensign is said to have displayed five Bibles on a ground of black. Over the King's centre burned the royal banner of crimson, embroidered in gold with a crown and lion. One troop bore the white silk streamer of the Queen, another a flag of flowered damask; while from the right flew a sky-blue color, that with which Rupert had replaced the one lost the year before by the White Syke.

"Prince Rupert's lodge," an old farm building which tradition makes to have been his temporary headquarters, was half a mile from us, on the opposite rise. Down the gentle descent before it I followed with my eye the track of his horsemen when, thinking Fairfax was retreating as he withdrew behind Mill Hill to form, the Prince spurred hotly forward. Just here to the right it was that Charles, in complete armor, with fine horsemanship, and with all the majesty of men which a King should have, rode along his front. "Soldiers, will you fight for me?" he cried. "All! all!" was the enthusiastic answer, mingled with shouts of "Queen Mary," the watch-word, as the solemn ranks of Fairfax, amid prayers and psalms, pealed "God with us!"

Between ten and eleven, as Rupert descended, Fairfax reappeared on the slope thoroughly ready. We find the same simple but desperate tactics as at Marston Moor. Down either slope masses of horsemen flung themselves upon each other with cries and clashing and awful thunder of hoofs. As the mad flood of Cavaliers swept along Sulby Hedge, the dragoons in ambush behind the dense hawthorn poured in a heavy flanking fire. Okey declared afterwards that, peering through the leaves and the dust, he saw the King himself leading a troop most valiantly. The dragoons gave themselves up for lost. The Roundhead colonels of the left struggled desperately to hold their men, but they were mercilessly overridden and sabred; Rupert's rearing chargers pushed irresistibly onward while the bright blades flashed in the sun, driving before them what soon became a headlong mass of fugitives. So the wave rolled over Ireton. But as always, Rupert went too fast and too far, drawing rein first, with his horses all spent, when he reached the baggage-train beyond Naseby. An eye-witness who sat there within the circle of matchlock men tells graphically how the troopers rode up, the Prince in front in a red Spanish cap: we may suppose that, being out of the mêlée, he had laid aside his helmet, under the hot sun, for something lighter. The captain of the baggage-train, believing him to be Fairfax, asked him, hat in hand, how the battle was going. The Prince asked in turn if he would have quarter; thereat the matchlock men trained their sights upon the intruders, who made no attack.

On the east, Sir Marmaduke, as brave as Rupert, had spurred with his troopers against the Roundhead right; but Cromwell launched against them the regiment of Whalley, who met them in full career, and again the Malignants were given as stubble to the swords of the Ironsides. The ground was here difficult for the Parliament troops, but everything was broken through, till the scene on the west was repeated on the east with the parties reversed. But Cromwell never went too fast or too far. At the centre the foot stood until noon in the closest conflict—mutual volleys, then a rushing forward into push of pike. Sir Jacob held the King's men so sternly to their work that Skippon gave ground. While bringing up succor, he found his armor broken and his side pierced by a bullet; but he shouted that he would not stir "so long as a man shall stand." For a time all seemed lost. Had only Rupert been at hand! But now Oliver, having trampled out Sir Marmaduke, thunders promptly on the royalist rear. Ireton from the west, rallying a party of his routed and overridden men, smites in on the flank, hip and thigh. His horse is shot, his leg pierced with a pike, his face gored with a halbert thrust. Thus maimed and bloody, he is taken prisoner, but presently retaken; and the blow he inflicts is at once repeated by the dragoons, who, galloping across from Sulby Hedge, dash in unopposed. Fairfax, too, is at hand with his life guard. Under the hot noon the Roundheads beat all to the earth, Sir Jacob making his way with difficulty from under the hoofs of the horses. One regiment stands like the "White Coats" in the White Syke Close. Fairfax charges them twice in vain. Struck simultaneously in front and rear, they melt, disdaining to be spared, until the Roundheads meet in their centre, Fairfax himself seizing their pennon from the hand of its bearer as he falls.

It is said that Rupert, supposing the battle gained, returned at a leisurely pace, his helmet laid aside, while he continued to wear, after his charge, his comfortable cap. Upon Mill Hill he was undeceived; but his horses were blown, his men scattered, and their ardor relaxed. He might even then have helped the hard-pressed Astley; but suddenly, out of the battle-smoke, the reserve of the Ironsides broke upon him, and his formation was shattered. The King, too, before all was lost, flinging himself in front of a fine body of horse which he had held back, addressed them with spirit. "Give one charge more," he cried, "and recover the day." At the same time he put spurs to his steed, and was in the act of leaping forward; but a timid Scotch courtier suddenly laid hands upon the King's bridle. "Will you go upon your death in an instant?" said he. Before Charles could prevent, his charger swerved, and word ran through the troops that they were to wheel to the right. The unfortunate King seemed to set an example of flight; a sudden panic seized all, and a mad rout tore northward. The remorseless squadrons of Cromwell were instantly upon them, and the roads were strewn with slaughtered fugitives. What frenzy of the war-horse! what fierce exulting of the fanatic rider, shouting the war cries of Hebrew Joshua, his weapon heavy as a weaver's beam! The long locks were sweat through and dishevelled, the scarfs and embroidery rent and blood-stained in the agony of that summer afternoon.

"Fools! your doublets shone with gold, and your hearts were gay and bold,
As you kissed your lily hands to your lemans to-day;
But to-morrow shall the fox, from her chamber in the rocks
Lead forth her tawny cubs to howl above the prey!
Where be your tongues that late mocked at Heaven, and Hell, and Fate,
And your fingers that once were so busy with your blades?
Your perfumed satin clothes, your catches and your oaths,
Your stage-plays and your sonnets, your diamonds and your spades?
Down, down, for ever down with the Mitre and the Crown!
They shall tremble when they think of the edge of England's sword;
And the kings of earth in fear shall shudder when they hear
What the hand of God hath wrought for the Houses and the Word."

The Broad-Moor farmer leaned on his fork; the horses caught a few mouthfuls from the windrow. Down there in the cart-path the tricycle waited where Astley must have come forward as the Puritan centre gave way. Just here it must have been that Skippon staggered; from the thorns Pride must have hurried with his succor. I saw that when I had come down the hill with a rush, the air ringing in my ears, I was precisely in the track of Whalley when the Ironsides threw themselves upon Sir Marmaduke. One of the laborers came forward with two corroded bullets in his palm; he showed me where he found them, near where the reserve had charged the flank of Rupert. I bought them for a shilling. They whistled in the hearing of Cromwell; perhaps they came from the pistol of the Prince. As I write these lines, they are my paper-weights. Bidding the farmer good-bye, I pushed the machine across the field through the stubble, with some difficulty, to the western verge. (If one sweats a little at Naseby, perhaps the story grows more real.) A boy who guided me pointed out three or four depressions on the declivity of Mill Hill, still traceable and with a rank growth of weeds about. They are the pits, says tradition, in which were buried the slain men and horses. The officers lie under the spire of Naseby church.

A gate let me through Sulby Hedge to the high road. From the ambush of the dragoons here I took my last look in the light of the late afternoon. There was the sod that had been dinted by Rupert's war-horse, and had drunk the blood of Ireton. No spears that day glittered upon Sibbertoft Ridge; cattle fed quietly in the field where the poltroon hand baulked the King's last charge. How narrow was the chance of victory! For three hours it was a most doubtful fight. Defeat would have been utter destruction for the Independents, for the majority of the nation were about ready to overlook all and restore the King. Victory for the Cavaliers would have been the death of freedom in England, and perhaps not in England alone. The King lost, and this time lost utterly. I remember the Broad-Moor farmer told me his fork was of American make, and I believe the grass had been mowed by an American machine. America has reaped another harvest from that field than one of hay! Naseby is said to be Navelsby, the centre of England. In the history of the English-speaking race, few events are more central than Naseby battle!

NOTES ON THE WINDWARD ISLANDS.

ON BOARD THE BARRACOUTA, March, 1887.

THE first thing that arrests the attention of the visitor to the Windward Islands is the unwonted splendor of tropical vegetation. This may be seen in its greatest perfection in the island of Martinique, but it has been described so often by letter writers, and is examined so minutely and depicted so enthusiastically by Charles Kingsley in his 'At Last,' which is in the hands of every tourist, that I shall not attempt to say again what has been so well said by others. I have not, however, seen any adequate description of the view presented to the eye of the passer on shipboard by the lofty volcanic cones and sloping cane fields of St. Kitts, Montserrat, Nevis, and St. Lucia. The mountains to their summits and down into their craters are embowered in vegetation so dense that it can hardly be penetrated by man. Half way down begins the checker-board of cultivated fields laid off in sugar cane in various stages of advancement, with here and there brown bits of fallow land that give variety to the picture, together with white shining towers of sugar factories and the sweeping arms of windmills. An artist of even less grasp than Church or Bierstadt might make both fortune and fame by putting on canvas these glorious vistas.

The next thing that presses upon the mind of a thoughtful observer is the extreme poverty of the inhabitants—a poverty such as one can hardly form any conception of in the United States. The inhabitants are nearly all negroes and mulattoes. In Barbados 8¼ per cent. of the population are white, but this is quite exceptional. In Antigua the whites are 5 per cent., in St. Kitts, Nevis, Dominica, Grenada, and Demerara (British Guiana) less than 2 per cent. In all the lesser Antilles taken together the whites cannot number more than 4 in 100 of the population, and the proportion of whites is diminishing.

The wage of laboring men throughout the islands is about twenty cents per day of our money—oftener less than more. What can a man buy for himself and family with twenty cents? Suppose that his wife earns as much as himself, and that they have three children—they cannot have a less number if the population of the island is kept good. The commonly reported and commonly received opinion is, that the African laborer of the West Indies lives, or may live, on the spontaneous productions of the bountiful soil and climate, by rooting around in the earth or plucking fruit along the roadway as he goes to and from his labor. The fact is, that the islands do not produce one-twentieth of the food necessary to keep the bodies and souls of these poor people together (vide Salmon's 'Crown Colonies of Great Britain'). Nineteen-twentieths must come from abroad, and mostly from the United States of America. Now the question recurs, what can a family of five get to live upon with 40 cents per day (supposing the man and woman have steady employment and no sickness), being obliged to bring the bulk of their food from New York and pay 30 per cent. duties on it—an interesting fact—in addition to freight and middlemen's profits? The corn laws of the West India islands are a greater shame than those of England in the last generation, because the poor negroes do not know what hurts them, and would not be able to better themselves if they did know.

It is said by well-fed people who take a cheerful view of the situation, that the West Indian negro is spared the expense of fuel, and that he needs very little clothing in that warm climate. It is true that the minimum of clothing suffices to protect the body. The very scantiest raiment consistent with decency is the type of all the islands. Nearly all, men, women, and children, go barefooted, and most of the older men show deformities, such as the loss of toes, resulting from the want of protection to the feet. As to fuel, I observed in all the market-places little piles of charcoal, about as much as would serve to boil a teakettle, which were offered at one cent per pile. Nobody bought more than a cent's worth, but when that calls for 5 per cent. of a man's total earnings it must be made account of. Give the American laborer all his fuel and clothing free, and then ask him to work for twenty cents per day—nay, compel him to do so or starve—and what would be the result?

What has brought this melancholy condition of things upon some of the fairest and richest portions of the earth's surface? The amount of wealth produced by these islands in the last two centuries is vast beyond imagination. Why are they now in the depths of poverty? Why are the landowners for the most part bankrupt, while their laborers are on a scale of diet that would be considered in Baxter Street the verge of starvation? This question is not to be answered in a hasty way and after a superficial glance. But it appears to me that if all the produce of a country, however rich its soil, were removed from it every year except just sufficient to sustain the lives of the cultivators and to induce them to rear children, so that there could be no growth of capital there, then if some untoward event, some revolution of industry, should take place, superseding or greatly depressing the chief and almost sole product of the country, the result would be about what is now witnessed in the Windward Islands. The absentee landlord has carried away the yearly produce and spent it in England or on the continent of Europe year after year, and generation after generation. Nothing has been left as a reserve fund. Worse than all, the absentee landlord has had little knowledge of his estate and little care for his laborers. His overseer or local representative has been under the necessity of getting the largest sum out of the property each year, and has not been compelled to make an intelligent forecast of the future from time to time, or able to put his ideas into practice if he should do so. Thus it has come about that sugar-growing is the sole reliance of most of the islands; cocoa is now grown to a limited but increasing extent on Grenada and Trinidad. Orange groves were cut down during the heyday of sugar to make room for cane. It is a fact most strange to the visitor from the United States that oranges cannot be procured among the islands in sufficient number to supply the tables of passing steamers. Our steward took out a supply from New York sufficient to last us to Santa Cruz. After that we went orangeless to Demerara. There we obtained a moderate supply, and a few more at Port of Spain, Trinidad, but we could find none in the markets at Barbados, Antigua, Montserrat, or St. Kitts. The case was even worse as regards pineapples. One specimen of this delicious fruit was brought on shipboard at St. Kitts as a present to the Captain. Its aroma pervaded the whole cabin and excited the passengers with the expectation of a grand treat, for which they would have paid roundly and gladly, but not another pineapple could be "scared up" on the whole island, nor did we see another until we arrived at Demerara, 600 miles further south. This is mentioned by way of illustrating the utter want of diversified industry and the fatal monopoly of sugar-growing throughout the lesser Antilles.

Well, sugar has come to grief as a paying crop. Two pounds of it will not buy one pound of flour in any of the islands. The wholesale price of sugar is higher in Barbados than at any other port, because the facilities for shipment to foreign countries are greater there than elsewhere. At Barbados the price is $1.80 per 100 pounds, and no money is to be made either in raising or handling it. The absentee landlords are ruined, and the holders of mortgages on their estates are little better off. One of the best estates on Antigua was sold under mortgage while we were there "for a song." There is a universal wail among the whites, and a great outcry against the sugar bounties of Europe, and a great longing for annexation to the United States. The blacks know nothing about governments, either local or foreign, but they echo what they hear from the whites. A mulatto on the island of Montserrat, with marked Irish features and a pronounced brogue, said to me that he "would rather see the flag of New York flying over this island than the flag of Great Britain." He added that he had nothing to say against Great Britain, but that he believed New York would make business better for the people. The secret of the desire for annexation to the United States is that our customs duties on sugar would be thrown off as to the islands, and the price to the seller would be nearly or quite doubled. This is a consideration which overtops everything. There is no political ill-will toward Great Britain in the islands. Nor is there reason for any, unless it be that England, absorbed in affairs of greater moment, gives little heed to them, and allows them to drift whither they will. This is not a just cause for ill-will on the part of the handful of whites, for they constitute a tight monopoly of the Government on each island. The negro knows nothing about government except as he feels its restraining power now and then. If you were to talk to him about taxation, for instance, he would not understand you. An exception must be made of a few, a very few, educated mulattoes on each island, who are shrewd men of business, and are white men for all purposes except color.

The masses are sunk in deep, dense ignorance so far as social and economic laws are concerned. Would it be believed that the working classes of Demerara and Trinidad suffer themselves to be taxed to pay the cost of bringing coolies from Calcutta to compete against them in a labor market which yields wages of only 20 cents per day? This is what has been going on more or less for forty years and is still going on. Seven-tenths of the passage-money of every cooly "apprentice" brought out from India is paid out of the food-tax levied on the negroes of those colonies, and yet they make no complaint. They make no complaint of anything. They are kindly, docile, good-natured, universally polite, deeply religious, and grossly immoral, according to our standards. About 66 per cent. of the births are illegitimate—so I was informed by the Bishop of the northern islands, a robust and hearty and hard-working servant of God, who took passage on our steamer at Antigua, to visit his charges in the Virgin Islands. His explanation of this incongruity was that sufficient time has not yet elapsed since the régime of slavery, when every woman with African blood in her veins was at the command of some white man, and practically of any white man, to eradicate the ideas and customs bred by so gross a system. The negro is religious by nature, but he cannot as yet connect religion and morality together. This is the testimony of all the religious instructors whom I met. There is some progress, however, sufficient to warrant the belief that with a moderate degree of prosperity enabling them to live decently, so that a home life might spring up, more correct ideas concerning the virtue of women and the sacredness of marriage would prevail. At present there is no public opinion among them which condemns illegitimacy. It does not pass with them for a sin. Schools for children are, however, numerous and well attended, and no distinctions of color are allowed or thought of among the pupils.

THE COERCION BILL.

DUBLIN, April 9, 1887.

WE have now before us the text of the "Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill." As expounded by Mr. Balfour it sounded badly enough; in the columns of the newspapers it read worse; but in the official form, in eleven foolscap folio pages of leaded pica (how innocent the clear type and printing look!) the bill recalls Burke's definition of the Penal Laws: "a Machine of wise and elaborate contrivance, and as well fitted for the oppression, impoverishment, and degradation of a people . . . as ever proceeded from the perverted ingenuity of man." In sober truth, this is a cunningly devised instrument for the political degradation of Ireland. Severe as the bill appears, however, it may, if passed, be administered with timid leniency. But there it would stand, poisoning the relations between the classes and between the countries—an insult to all Irish men and Irishwomen.

To understand its scope, we must read it in connection with the "Whiteboy Acts" which it incorporates. To understand its possible effects, the instrumentality through which it would be administered must be considered. Such an act, applied to a free country during a period of local or sectional disturbance, would have numerous and weighty safeguards in its working which this act would not have in Ireland. Its application here would be in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant. He is independent of the pressure of Irish public opinion. He is generally more or less of a puppet, and, at all events, whether puppet or not (as was well shown in the case of Lord Spencer), is entirely dependent for information and policy upon those by whom he is surrounded at the Castle, for the most part permanent and irremovable paid officials, and upon the class here most opposed to the mass of the people. Next to slave-owners, or the descendants of slave-owners living among liberated slaves, it is doubtful whether elsewhere such contempt and suspicion were ever entertained by one section of society towards another as that which is here felt towards the people by the governing class. That class it is which formulates the opinion influencing the Lord Lieutenant. From that governing class the "resident magistrates" are drawn upon whose judgment would depend the application of the Act. Clause 11, section 6, it is true, provides that one on each bench "shall be a person of the sufficiency of whose legal knowledge the Lord Lieutenant shall be satisfied." What a comment the necessity for this clause is upon the administration of justice in Ireland! It is, however, pretty safe to say that not a single "resident magistrate" would be asked to go through a course of legal training, and not one would be dismissed for deficiency of legal knowledge. And, whether trained or not, they will breathe the same mental atmosphere, read the same newspapers, and be influenced by the same prejudices and considerations as those of the class against whom in the present Irish struggle the mass of the people are pitted. These "resident magistrates" are for the most part the needy scions or friends of wealthy or aristocratic families. They do not mean to be unjust; but they have not been subjected to any legal or mental training to fit them for their posts.

As to the bill itself, the application of which would lie with the Lord Lieutenant, it differs from all previous Coercion Acts, so far as I remember them, in that it would not be limited in time, but would be perpetual. Even where no one is charged with the commission of an offence, magistrates might compel the attendance of persons and hold an inquiry; witnesses not to be excused from answering any question on the ground that the answer may criminate or tend to criminate themselves; such crimination, however, not to be admissible against the witness in any proceeding, civil or criminal. Resident magistrates would be given summary jurisdiction in agrarian cases, and might inflict penalties up to six months' imprisonment with hard labor. Under the incorporated Whiteboy Acts, any twelve persons meeting together and not dispersing on the proclamation of a magistrate, or not dispersing when the magistrate has been prevented from making such proclamation, would be liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labor. The right of political combination and the liberty of the press would be handed over entirely to the Lord Lieutenant by the following sections, which render the following persons liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labor:

"Any person who shall take part in any criminal conspiracy to compel or induce any person or persons, either not to fulfil his or their legal obligation, or not to let, hire, use, or occupy any land, or not to deal with, work for, or hire any person or persons in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation; or to interfere with the administration of the law. . . . Any person who by words or acts shall incite, solicit or encourage or persuade any other person to commit any of the offences hereinbefore mentioned. . . . [Under the incorporated Whiteboy Acts] any person or persons who shall knowingly print, write, post, publish, circulate, send, or deliver, or cause or procure to be printed, written, posted published, circulated, sent, or delivered any notice, letter, or message, exciting or tending to excite any riot, tumultuous or unlawful meeting, or assembly, or unlawful combination or confederacy, . . . or directing or requiring any person to do or not to do any acts or to quit the service or employment of any person, or to let or to give up any land."

"It is a plain fact," writes the Pall Mall Gazette, "that once the bill is passed, no editor in a proclaimed district will be able to print or comment on any statistics as to the fall in prices without rendering himself liable to imprisonment (with hard labor) for six months, without a jury to try him." Offences declared legal under the Trades-Union Acts would be technically exempted from the operation of above clauses, though it is not clear where the line could be drawn. When desired by the Government, criminals would be tried before special, not ordinary juries. (Ordinary juries are taken from the average ratepayers: special juries from those who occupy premises above a certain value—in Dublin, of £50 rating or about £100 rent, corresponding, probably, to three or four times that amount in one of your business centres.) The venue could be changed to any other county or district than that within which the alleged offence has been committed; and in cases of murder and manslaughter, attempt to murder, violence against the person, arson, assaulting or injuring a dwelling-house, however such crime may be described in an indictment, the venue might, by the permission of the Attorney-General for England, be changed to England.

The Lord Lieutenant would be given the power to suppress "any association which he believes to be a dangerous association." He must, however, lay a copy of his proclamation before Parliament, if sitting, before seven days; and if Parliament were not sitting and were not to meet within twenty days, such proclamation would stand for only one week. One week would, however, be amply sufficient to cripple or break up any political association, and certainly no such proclamation would be issued unless with the approval of the Cabinet.

Such are the main provisions of the bill. There is little doubt that this bill, perhaps with some modifications, will be passed into law. The advocates of the measure are not likely to falter in their determination. What can the Opposition do? A powerful feeling may be aroused in England against the measure; with its promoters Irish public opinion is of no account. We shall have strong speaking by men like Mr. Morley, and strong writing in the Pall Mall and other papers; but what does that matter to the Government, so long as the Parliamentary majority is assured? They are pledged to make the experiment, to stand or fall by the issue, and they will hardly compromise themselves by retracing their steps. The present is different from other great party struggles regarding Ireland. Previous contests were, in the main, between a party that had a certain policy regarding Ireland and a party that had only the negative policy of letting her alone. We now have two parties depending mainly upon a distinct and definite Irish policy. The issue is more momentous than ever before. If Lord Salisbury succeed, we shall not have home rule, and his party will probably enjoy a long term of office. If Lord Salisbury fail, Mr. Gladstone will return to power and we shall have home rule. Neither party can flinch.

The bill has the warm approval of the upper class in Ireland, and, in the main, of the Protestant middle class. Its introduction tends to consolidate and strengthen the National party. Many who had withdrawn from active participation in the details of politics are now again earnestly coöperating in the movement. We cannot accept all the shibboleths of party; but, before such a bill as this, minor considerations are forgotten. Many who a year ago, under the sunshine of a home-rule viceroyalty, were beginning to bud out into Nationalists, have returned to their former proclivities; but men the tendency of whose lives and thoughts were National are more and more decidedly taking sides. The young generation of Protestants is very powerfully influenced towards nationality. The crisis is stimulating anti-Home-Rulers to unwonted exertions in the formation of associations, the collection of funds, the preparation and dissemination of literature. The open expression of their real sentiments regarding the majority of their countrymen will make their position in the country, upon the establishment of home rule, more difficult than it otherwise would have been. If home rule could have been suddenly obtained, these anti-Nationalists could have remained uncommitted by that full expression of their opinions in which they feel safe under the present régime.

On the National side in Ireland there is less bitterness; the position is being regarded with more good humor than at any previous similar crisis. This, of course, arises from the consciousness that we are now in alliance with a powerful English party, through whose assistance we are sure ultimately to win. There are in Ireland elements of disorder and unrest that will tax to the utmost the patience and statesmanship of any rulers, National or otherwise. The weight and influence of the National party desire to be on the side of law and order. Opposition to the bill does not arise from a love of misrule, but from the conviction that disorder can be effectually combated only by an Irish administration for Irish affairs, in accordance with the prejudices and sentiments of the people. The more the subject is carefully considered by liberal-minded Englishmen, the more they will learn that the tendency of such an administration would be surely, if perhaps slowly, towards the establishment of law and order here, and of an amicable and workable relation between the countries, while a coercive policy such as that proposed would have an opposite tendency. If the bill pass and be worked to the satisfaction of the ascendancy class, the middle class in England will be soon disgusted with the measure. If it be not worked to their satisfaction, the present movement will in time compel them to come to some settlement.

I have said nothing regarding the land proposals of the Government. So far as known, they are condemned by Mr. Parnell and by the National party. (It is well recollected that Mr. Parnell has never been belied in his condemnation of any measure relating to Ireland.) An effectual land bill from the Conservative party relying upon the support of the Irish Conservatives is more than we can expect. In any case, certainly no measures accompanied or preceded by coercive legislation can tend to the pacification of Ireland. The miserable hopelessness of the coercion policy must be becoming apparent to Englishmen. The cartoon in this week's Punch is very significant—Lord Salisbury, as Sisyphus, at full strain, pushing a huge "Irish problem" up a rocky height, and, underneath, the lines:

"Unending task . . .
Swift roll the years and still the ceaseless round,
The toilsome press up the precipitous ground,
The sullen slow ascent, the swift rebound."

THE CONQUEST OF UPPER BURMAH.

LONDON, March 29, 1887.

THE course which events have taken in Upper Burmah has not fulfilled the official expectation. The war was entered upon in the confident assurance that the advent of British rule would be hailed with acclamation by the subjects of King Theebaw. This assurance rested upon a conviction—altogether mistaken, as events have shown—that English rule and English officialism were firmly rooted in the hearts and affections of the people of British Burmah. For a time, indeed, nothing occurred which ran counter to these comfortable opinions. Mandalay, the capital of Upper Burmah, was occupied on the 28th of November, 1885, only eleven days after the British troops had crossed their own frontier. The troops had encountered only the merest semblance of resistance. King Theebaw was deposed, and conveyed to British territory, without, so far as appeared, exciting his former subjects to either pity or anger. And on the 31st of December, 1885, her Majesty's Government informed Lord Dufferin that they "derived special gratification on learning from your Excellency that the British force was welcomed by the inhabitants of the country as a deliverance from past and existing evils, and as the prelude for the establishment of British rule, for which the people, according to the reports received from the commander of the expedition, evinced a genuine desire." This hallucination that any and every free people dwelling in the vicinity of British India is pining to be subjugated and annexed, is one which no amount of experience can eradicate from the bosom of the Anglo-Indian official. It is not of the slightest use for the threatened people to protest that they have no such desire. He waves aside all such protests as merely conventional forms of Oriental politeness He knows better; and he has, under any circumstances, a mission to humanity which he must discharge, whatever their own foolish and ignorant wishes may be. Upper Burmah, accordingly, was annexed, and almost immediately afterwards our troubles began.

What took the Indian Government most completely by surprise was that the most vehement protest against the extinction of the native dynasty in Upper Burmah arose from our own subjects in British Burmah. The deposition of King Theebaw was a signal for the outbreak of a fierce and bloody insurrection among the people whom we had been governing for thirty years—entirely to our own satisfaction. The fact of this insurrection was carefully and successfully concealed from the knowledge of Parliament and the British nation. It was said to be no more than an outbreak of "dacoity." Its real character, however, has been made known in a little book just published by Mr. Mackenzie Smeaton, an English civilian.

"While," he writes, "our army was far away north, on the Irawaddy, a real campaign—and a bloody one—was being prepared for us in the low country. The people do not want us any more than they did thirty years ago. They rose to throw off our yoke, and they are still carrying on a guerilla warfare against us. . . . It has frequently been said that there is no patriotism, no national sentiment among the Burmese. Those who know the country best will, I am convinced, hesitate to admit this. The inhabitants of Lower Burmah have undoubtedly prospered under our government. This they readily allow; but they never bargained for the overthrow of their ancient monarchy. They were proud to know that a Burmese King somewhere ruled a Burmese people; and the allegiance of their hearts was given to the King—not to the British Government."

Lower Burmah at this time was almost wholly denuded of troops, and so general was the revolt that Mr. Smeaton is of opinion that the Queen's Government would for a time have ceased to exist but for the timely appearance of a singular and unlooked-for ally. Among the many races which find a home in those mountains between which the Irawaddy River cuts a way to the sea is that of the Karens. By the Burmese they have always been despised and oppressed as a race of irreclaimable savages; and savages, in truth, they are, but with this peculiarity, that there survive among them traditions of a religion which they once possessed, and which bear a most astonishing resemblance to passages from the Old and New Testaments. It was, moreover, a general expectation cherished among these wild hillmen, at a period long anterior to the coming of the English, that a race of white men were the destined agents for restoring the knowledge of this ancient religion among them. Having this expectation to aid them, American missionaries—the successors of Dr. Judson—have preached Christianity among the Karen villages with a very large measure of success. The Karens have accepted their teaching, not, as in the case of other Asiatic converts, as involving a rupture with a cherished past, but as a recovery of it. So far as Christianity has spread, it has breathed a new life into these wild mountaineers.

"Once," writes Mr. Smeaton, "a village has embraced Christianity, it feels itself a head and shoulders above its neighbors, and all the energies of the people are at once employed in making the village worthy of the name. No labor, no expense are spared. The Christian village must be clean, healthy, neat; it must have the best school and the best church they can afford. Nothing will satisfy till all these are accomplished facts, Money aid from the missionaries is not sought; the people do it all themselves—plan, contrive, carry out. They are proud of their new condition, and their zeal knows no bounds. Their children must be well dressed and educated, better tillers of the soil, better hunters, better foresters than their fathers, because they are now animated by a new spirit, fired with a new zeal, and their wits sharpened by education."

When the insurrection broke out in British Burmah, these Christianized mountaineers placed their services, en masse and without solicitation, at the disposal of the Government. They took the field, under the leadership of their tribal chiefs, and fairly suppressed the revolt by sheer hard fighting and persistent marching.

I have referred to this episode in the latest Burmese war, firstly, because it is almost unknown, and, secondly, because it shows that missionary labor in India is doing more for the consolidation of British rule than is the Government itself. These Karens have been altogether neglected by the English authorities. All places of public trust open to the native population were retained exclusively for Burmese. The Karens were deemed to be an ignorant, savage, and cowardly race, fit only to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. The fact, however, of a common religion ranged them on the side of the English when the more favored race had flung off their allegiance. And so it will be found to be throughout India. The only part of the people that is genuinely loyal to the British Crown—who, in other words, prefer British rule to any other that could be set up in its stead—are the Christian communities. Others may acquiesce in it as the best under the circumstances, but in the case of the native Christian it is the best possible. It is not creditable to the sagacity of Anglo-Indian administrators that they were so long in perceiving this—if, indeed, they do yet perceive it. They were not content to hold aloof from missionary labor: they actively discouraged it, and, till quite recently, subjected converts to Christianity to heavy legal disabilities.

In Upper Burmah, as in Lower, there can be little doubt that it was annexation which stirred up the resistance that we have found it so difficult and costly to overcome. Had we been content to select from the crowd of possible pretenders some other king in place of Theebaw, and to govern the country through him, the people would, in all probability, have concurred willingly enough in the new order of things. But they were not prepared, without a struggle, to be blotted out from the roll of independent people, and the physical features of their country rendered guerilla warfare as easy to them as it was dangerous and difficult for us. The population of Upper Burmah is not more than two millions, scattered over a vast area covering about one hundred thousand square miles. The Irawaddy is a huge drainage channel, running from north to south through the centre of this area, and on both sides of it the country is covered with dense, primeval forest, and seamed and cut to pieces by the innumerable streams which pour into the main river from the mountain ranges on either hand. With the exception of Mandalay, which is fed almost wholly on supplies from British Burmah, there are no centres of population by the occupation of which an invading army could obtain control over a large surrounding district. The villages, thinly scattered here and there, are self-supporting. Roads, as might be expected, there are none, and, when once the rains have set in, all locomotion is well-nigh impossible. The low-lying lands are then under water, and the streams which rush down the sides of the hills are transformed into swollen cataracts, presenting, in the absence of bridges and boats, an insuperable barrier to the movements of troops.

In addition to these natural difficulties, a not less formidable one existed in the extreme simplicity of the social system in Upper Burmah. Among the Burmese there are no nobles, no large landowners, no people of hereditary influence. The constituents of government consisted of the King and his officials. But the authority of these latter depended wholly upon the good-will and pleasure of the sovereign. An official was no sooner degraded than he sank at once into the general mass of the people. The consequence was that when King Theebaw was deported to Rangoon, the entire machinery of administration not simply fell out of gear, but was, as it were, annihilated. An English force nominally held possession of the country, but, scattered as this was over a multitude of isolated posts, and incapable of rapid movement, the influence of the different detachments did not extend beyond the range of their rifles. A new civil administration on the British model was organized at Mandalay, but it was found impossible to place the officials in possession of the districts they were appointed to superintend. These districts were, in truth, merely arbitrary divisions drawn on the map. The "dacoits," as we were pleased to call those ranged against us, moved where they pleased, attacked our posts whenever they thought they could do so with impunity, harassed and intercepted our trains, and were, in fact, masters of the country through all the summer and rainy season of 1886. In the autumn of that year we had (inclusive of military police) a force of forty thousand men collected in Upper Burmah, and Sir Frederick Roberts, the commander-in-chief, repaired to Mandalay to take the supreme command. With these ample means at his disposal, he has experienced little difficulty in dispersing the wandering bands of marauders. It remains to be seen whether, when the rains set in, they will not again collect and recommence their harassing operations.

That the Indian Government is apprehensive of this is seen by the fact that they do not intend to reduce the large force at present garrisoning Upper Burmah. The army of occupation is to be maintained at its full strength during the summer, and there still remain one-half of the territories of King Theebaw whither our influence has as yet hardly penetrated. This portion is known as the Shan States. The Shans are a people more civilized, more determined, and much more capable of united action than the Burmese. The desire of the Indian Government is to avoid all conflict with them. They do not wish to curtail their independence, but merely to obtain from the chiefs of the different States a formal recognition of the British Government as the paramount power. It remains to be seen if they will succeed in this. If they do not, the most arduous portion of the conquest of Upper Burmah has still to be undertaken. The Shan chiefs will not withhold the acknowledgment of British suzerainty unless they are prompted to do so by the Chinese officials in Yunnan, and can rely upon their support. The action of the Chinese has always been the unknown factor when the conquest of Upper Burmah has come under discussion. The fear of what they might do restrained Lord Dalhousie from annexing it at the close of the war of 1853. Should their influence now be cast in the scale against us, the acquisition of Upper Burmah will prove to be that of a white elephant indeed.

DUMAS ON VICTOR HUGO.

Paris, April 7, 1887.

For a long time the special audience which attends the receptions of the members of the French Academy had heard no interesting "Discours"; in order to create such an interest it was necessary that some criticism should be mixed with the classical and perpetual eulogy—that there should be some gall on the edge of the cup filled with honey. Alexandre Dumas's only speech of this sort had been on the day when he was himself received. It has just now happened to him in his turn to receive a new member, a poet, M. Leconte de Lisle. It was generally known that Dumas did not much appreciate the new school of poetry which goes under the name of the school of the Parnassians, and of which Leconte de Lisle may be said to be the head. He emerged from obscurity only a few years ago, though he was known and most admired in a small circle. I remember well seeing him in the year 1848, after the Revolution. He was pointed out to me as a great poet, but I confess that his verses left me very cold. I felt a little like the man who, after having heard a celebrated pianist, said to somebody who observed how difficult it was to play in such a fashion: "Difficult! I wish it were impossible!" I was unjust. I have since read verses of Leconte de Lisle's which may take a place in a French anthology. His celebrity may be said to be owing to one of these pieces, called "Midi."

Alexandre Dumas tells us, in his speech, that Victor Hugo was walking one day in the island of Guernsey, during his exile. A young French visitor recited to him the verses—

"Midi, roi des étés, épandu sur la plaine,
Tombe en nappes d'argent des hauteurs du ciel bleu.
Tout se tait. L'air flamboie et brûle sans haleine;
La terre est assouple en sa robe de feu."

"What are you saying?" inquired Victor Hugo, when he heard these verses which were not his own. The young visitor continued:

"L'étendue est immense et les champs n'ont point d'ombre;
Et la source est tarie où buvaient les troupeaux;
La lointaine forêt, dont la lisière est sombre,
Dort, là-bas, immobile en un pesant repos.
Seuls, les grands blés mûris, tels qu'une mer dorée,
Se déroulent au loin, dédaigneux du sommeil;
Pacifiques enfans de la terre sacrée,
Ils épuisent sans peur la coupe du soleil.
Parfois, comme un soupir de leur âme brûlante,
Du sein des épis lourds qui murmurent entre eux,
Une ondulation majestueuse et lente
S'éveille et va mourir à l'horizon poudreux."

I wish I could cite the whole piece. Victor Hugo recognized a brother poet, and his visitor recited to him all he knew by heart of Leconte de Lisle; told him who he was—how he had been born in the island of Réunion, in the Indian Ocean; how he lived in Paris, poor, independent, disdainful of money and even of glory. Victor Hugo took a volume which he had himself just published, wrote on it "Jungamus dextras," with his signature, and sent it to Leconte de Lisle. When he returned from his exile, and could again vote in the Academy, he gave persistently his solitary vote for him. Leconte de Lisle presented himself once, and had only the voice of Hugo, to whom he wrote on the same day: "You voted for me; I am elected." The election of Leconte de Lisle took place after the death of Victor Hugo, and may be considered as a last homage of the French Academy to our great poet.

Alexandre Dumas had to make a eulogy of Leconte de Lisle as well as of Victor Hugo. He rendered justice to the extraordinary powers of versification of the author of the trilogy of the 'Poèmes antiques; Poèmes barbares; Poèmes tragiques.' But he criticised the ethics of the Parnassian school. Leconte de Lisle is a Greek lost in our nineteenth century; he wrote in one of his prefaces:

"Since Homer, Æschylus, and Sophocles, who represent poetry in its vitality, in its fulness, and in its harmonic unity, barbarism has invaded the domain of the human mind. Artistically, the Roman world is on the level of the Dacians and the Sarmatians; the whole Christian cycle is barbarous. Dante, Shakspere, and Milton have only the force of their individual genius; their language, their concepticus are barbarous. The progress of sculpture was arrested with Phidias and with Lysippus. . . . What remains of the centuries which followed the reign of Greece? Only a few powerful individualities."

Leconte de Lisle is at the same time a Greek and a Buddhist: his form is Greek, his verses are sculptural; his thoughts are imbued with a sort of Buddhist sadness and melancholy. He is a pessimist, a pantheist. Man was everything to Greece, and the Greek gods themselves were human. Man occupies but a small place on the modern Parnassus.

"You have," said Dumas to Leconte de Lisle, "been impassible, brilliant, and unalterable, like an antique mirror of polished silver; you have merely been a reflex of all worlds, facts, ages, external things. You do not wish the poet to speak to us of the things of the soul, too intimate or too vulgar. No more emotion, no ideal, no sentiment, no faith, no heart beatings, no tears. Your skies are deserted, your earth is silent, and you suppress in it what is the life of the universe—love, eternal love. Material nature, science, philosophy are enough for you. Certainly the firmament, the sun and moon, the stars, the ocean, the forests, divinities, monsters, animals, are interesting; but I also am interesting—I, the man."

Dumas compares the human soul to the famous Agnès of Molière. The innocent pupil of Arnolphe tells her old tutor, who wishes her to love him:

"Tenez, tous vos discours ne me troublent point l'âme;
Horace, avec deux mots, en ferait plus que vous."

These "deux mots" are precisely what Leconte de Lisle and his school would suppress.

In his judgment on Victor Hugo, Alexandre Dumas develops qualities which have surprised his greatest admirers. We knew him to be a dramatist, and, in a certain way, a moralist; he has shown himself a true critic. Leconte de Lisle's eulogy of Victor Hugo did not contain a single word on the Romantic school, not a word on Lamartine, on Musset. Dumas reminded him of the existence of these two poets, and professed his great admiration for them. He recited the beautiful verses of Lamartine:

"O Père qu'adore mon père,
Toi qu'on ne nomme qu'à genoux," etc.

He recited also the famous passage of Musset's:

"Celui qui ne sait pas, durant les nuits brûlantes
Qui font pâlir d'amour l'étoile de Vénus,
Se lever en sursaut, sans raison, les pieds nus,
Marcher, prier, pleurer des larmes ruisselantes,
Le cœur plein de pitié pour des maux inconnus," etc.,

and, comparing these spiritual effusions with the prayer of Hugo, "Ma fille, va prier," etc., he showed that the three poets were brothers, that they drew their inspirations from the same source, that they were neither atheists nor pantheists, that they believed in the soul and its immortality.

Referring to the first poems of Victor Hugo, M. Leconte de Lisle had said in his speech that Hugo at one time thought himself a monarchist and a Catholic. Dumas answered that Victor did not think himself such—that he really was what he said then; and he examined by what process of mind he ceased to be a Catholic and a monarchist. This part of his speech is a curious psychological study. He shows Victor Hugo writing at the age of eighteen admirable odes, "Moïse sur le Nil," the "Vierges de Verdun," and continuing during nearly seventy years to write poem after poem, drama after drama, novel after novel. He had a manifest destiny: he was made to write, to receive and to transmit impressions, as the river is made to flow. "Victor Hugo had the essential character of the sublime folly which science tries in vain to classify in its pathology; he had a fixed idea, which was simply this—he wished to be the greatest poet of his time and of his country, and, when he advanced in life, to be the greatest man of all countries and of all times." The unity which is not to be found in his acts or in his work will be found in his iron will. In his first volumes, in the "Odes et Ballades," in his earliest youth, he is never really in love: he knows neither Béranger's Lisette nor Lamartine's Elvire. He could say,

"Je suis maître de moi comme de l'univers."

When he begins to sing of love in his poems, you feel at once that he describes it and does not feel it. Dumas compares him to Jupiter, who sometimes condescended to take a human or an animal form. At the age of eighteen Hugo writes in one of his note-books: "I will be Chateaubriand, or I will be nothing." Chateaubriand had called him "un enfant sublime." At nineteen he writes, in the "Poète dans les révolutions,"

"La gloire est le but où j'aspire."

Dumas studies the development of the personality of Hugo, and says: "He could not tolerate being shut up in forms of government or religion that denied the right to say everything and the chance of being the first. He repudiated monarchy and Catholicism because, in these social and religious forms of the State, he would always and inevitably have had somebody over him. He would have accepted monarchy if he could have become king; he would have persevered in Catholicism if he could have become Pope, and united in himself the Pope and the Emperor, 'ces deux moitiés de Dieu,' as he says in 'Hernani,'"

But this is not all. Why did the figure of Napoleon have, for a long time, such an attraction for him? He had said that Homer was greater than Achilles; could he not, if he sang of Napoleon, become as great, perhaps greater? He first writes the famous "Ode à la colonne," the "Ode à l'arc de triomphe," etc. Later he compares his rock of Guernsey to the rock of St. Helena, and writes that posterity will place the thinkers above the actors, ideas above force. "Les traîneurs d'armées, Nemrod, Sennachérib, Cyrus, Ramsès, Alexandre, César, Bonaparte, tous ces immenses hommes farouches s'effacent." The poet remains alone, between heaven and earth, like Moses on Sinai, like Saint John at Patmos: "The poet is the priest; there is a pontiff on earth, the poet." Louis XIV. said "L'État, c'est moi." Hugo could have said: "Le génie, c'est moi." This popularity became a sort of religion after 1870; he was called "the master," "the father." When he died, a whole people followed his funeral. "Cæsar was put aside," said Dumas, "for his altar; a saint was dismissed to make room for him. [The Church of Saint-Geneviève, the patroness of Paris, was changed once more into a Pantheon.] A million of men accompanied the 'petit char des pauvres,' the last antithesis of the poet, with enormous cars covered with crowns."

Dumas reminded his auditors here that he had himself, with only six other men, followed Lamartine's coffin to the cemetery of Saint-Point; and that there were not more than thirty-three people, himself included, at Musset's funeral. He ended his brilliant discourse by a general description of Hugo's poetical work, comparing it to an immense edifice:

"I hear that many stones will fall from it; it is possible, it is true; but this edifice, which partakes of the Greek tempie, of the pagoda, of the mosque, of the feudal castle, of the Gothic cathedral, of the Oriental bazaar, of the palace of the Renaissance, round which have agglomerated peasants' huts and the houses of workmen and poor people—this edifice is so majestic, so picturesque, so singular, it is cut against the sky in such powerful masses, it has such gigantic vaults in which the wind is heard, it has such high walls flanked with such imposing towers, it has columns of such a pure marble, so many arcades of unexpected curves, . . . the bells of its enormous belfry, which ring the angelus or the tocsin, are made of such a noble metal, fill the air with such majestic waves, and wake such powerful and prolonged echoes in the vast plains and the immense forests which surround it and over which it towers, that you ask yourself at times if, as in the stories of the Middle Ages, God or devil has helped to build it."

Dumas has scandalized some by his criticism of Hugo, he has delighted others; he has astonished all by the unexpected development of his critical faculties. As a dramatist, he is always cutting and often pedantic and dry; as an orator, he has shown a height and a breadth of thought which have been a most agreeable surprise.

THE CINCINNATI ELECTION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In beginning the review of the week in your issue of the 7th instant, you said: "The recent municipal elections in Philadelphia, in Cincinnati, in Chicago, and Milwaukee are excellent illustrations of what can be done toward taking municipal government out of politics. . . ."

This statement is true, undoubtedly, of the three other cities, but I am sorry to have to say that you are mistaken about Cincinnati. Our municipal government is not likely to be taken out of politics until we have a newspaper which will not sacrifice our local interests on the altar of national politics. There was no revolt against either the Republican or Democratic Machine as such at our late election. The Republicans and Democrats each nominated, in the usual way, tickets no better than usual, and the palpable defects in these tickets were, in the usual fashion, whitewashed and denied by their party organs respectively. The labor organizations put forth an appalling ticket, for which their members were ordered to vote, and they did as they were bid. The remainder of our electors voted as they were directed by their respective party organizations and organs, except that probably a few reckless Democrats, realizing late in the day that it was impossible to elect their ticket, voted for the labor candidates. That is the whole story.

The result proved nothing, except that the labor organizations of this city contain more Democrats than Republicans. As for any organized breaking down of party lines, in aid of good government, no such thing has been known here since the days before the Commercial and Gazette threw overboard their occasional independence to issue a joint party organ for revenue only; and no such deliverance can come to us without the aid of an independent newspaper, which Cincinnati has not. C. B. Willey.

ARCHÆOLOGY IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In a letter printed under the above title in the Nation of October 28, 1886, Mr. W. J. Stillman, while strongly recommending that excavations should be undertaken in southern Italy, discourages an archæological expedition to the Cyrenaica. Mr. Stillman's assertions are made so positively that we should hardly dare to dispute his conclusions, were it not that we have just made an exploration of these very regions with the object of reconnoitring the archæological field and settling the question of accessibility.

The Italian Government, we are told, is most cordially disposed to researches in archæology, and would no doubt materially aid the American Institute in its work. But in our case, at least, the Italian Government has done its utmost to prevent the examination of any site in Magna Græcia by excavation, even when an application was supported by the owners of the land concerned, and contained the provision that no part of the antiques discovered should be removed from the country.

The case in point was as follows: Digging was undertaken by us at the expense of the Institute, on the site of the great temple of Hera Lacinia, near Croton, last January. This work was begun with the full permission of the local authorities, not in the hope of treasure-trove, but solely for scientific ends. It was presently brought to a close through the direct intervention of the Italian Ministry of Public Instruction—fortunately not before the main objects in view had been attained. The official mandate was carried out with a rigor which could leave no doubt as to the temper of those in power. The objects discovered were taken from a house of a landowner situated within the sacred enclosure, flung into the trenches which had been dug to determine the extent of the edifice, and covered with earth. Among these objects were exceedingly important fragments of the gable sculptures of the temple which it had been our good fortune to bring to light. The vandalism of this act on the part of those at the head of archæology in Italy requires no comment.

In the Cyrenaica, on the other hand, although not "protected by a considerable body of troops," but careful to avoid injudicious pretensions to political significance, we made excursions, both by land and water, entirely unmolested. Representatives of four races showed an equal eagerness to facilitate archæological work, however unauthorized. Cyrene itself, the most remote of the five great cities of the country, lies only eight miles from the sea, and districts much further inland may be visited safely with the customary escort of a single Turkish zaptieh. Indeed, Christian natives generally dispense with such a guard altogether. Your correspondent is, however, quite right in stating that nothing serious can be undertaken without the consent of the Sublime Porte; for, contrary to his assumption, the Arabs are submissive to the Turkish rule throughout the entire vilayet. There is every reason to believe that the Porte would grant a concession for excavation, and the removal of objects thereby discovered, to representatives of a Power from which she has to fear no political designs. It is true, the material difficulties offered to investigation by the remoteness and uncultivated character of the country are immense, but these very circumstances have preserved to us, in the Cyrenaica, a field for archæological discovery incomparably richer than any other province of the ancient world.

COMPOSITION OF THE NEW REICHSTAG.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A recent number of the Berliner Tageblatt contains a series of statistical statements regarding the composition of the new Reichstag which may, perhaps, be of interest to your readers. First as to the age of the members. The average of all parties taken together is, in 1887, fifty-three years five days, which is a little more than a year above the average of the last Reichstag, chosen in 1885. Of the leading parties, the German Liberals have relatively the fewest old men; 16 per cent. of them are above sixty years of age. On the other hand, 32 per cent. of the National Liberals belong in this category. Of the Centre, 70 per cent. are above fifty years of age. Particulars as to the Conservatives are not given.

In 1885 37 per cent. of the members belonged to the nobility; in 1887, 33 per cent. Of the Poles, 83.3 per cent. are of this class; of the Conservatives, 70 per cent.; of the Centre, 80.5 per cent. The "high nobility," that is, barons, etc., has 33.5 per cent.; the simple von's, 46.5 per cent. The Centre has twenty-six members of the former rank to four of the latter; among the eleven "noble" National Liberals is only one of the deeper blue; among the German Liberals is but a single member from the nobility.

Of greater interest for American readers will probably be the classification according to occupations. Here it is possible to make comparisons with our own legislatures, and striking differences are to be noted; as, for example, in the number of lawyers. So far, however, as legal training is concerned, it must be remarked that the "public officials" are to a large extent jurists. This is true, almost without exception, of bureau chefs in all departments, mayors, Landräthe, and so forth. German Beamtenthum is, of course, a more comprehensive term than our "civil service." Our nearest equivalent for the Landrath is, perhaps, the presiding officer of the board of supervisors of a county. If not originally appointed, he must at least be confirmed, by royal patent. As for mayors, the election by the city council is subject to royal confirmation, which may be refused on political grounds. The classification according to party and occupation is as follows:

Party.	Clergymen.	Landowners and Farmers.	Merchants and Manufacturers.	Physicians.	Public Officials.	Authors, Editors, etc.	Professors and Teachers.	Rentiers.	Lawyers.	Others.

Under "landowners and tenants" is to be understood the interest of large landownership. Adding the seventeen possessors of great estates among "public officials," the "agrarian party" rises to 39.2 per cent. No comfort for American wheat-growers and live-stock men here.

The Tageblatt is an organ of the German Liberal party, which lost about half its strength in the recent elections. It classes the Centre, Conservatives, National Liberals, and Imperialists together, as being conservative in fact, and comprising 79.5 per cent. of the Reichstag. It would be a pity not to give its last sentence in the original: "Für Staatsmänner die hauptsächlich das Autoritätsprincip vertreten und den 'Unterthan' hübsch unten halten wollen, muss es eine Lust sein, ein Volk zu regieren, das solche Vertreter wählt."

PSYCHIC PLAGIARISM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: People have been talking a little, and writers, as usual, expatiating on the bold plagiarism lately perpetrated by H. Rider Haggard, in his recent Lytton + Ebers + Poe extravaganza entitled 'She.' But a far grosser case, it seems to me, is the following:

The Vanity and Insanity of Genius, by Kate Sanborn. New York: George J. Coombes. 1886.

Victor Hugo possibly exceeded all others when, in his poem "L'année Terrible," he paints with startling rhetoric the possibility that God may at last be found to have deceived us all along; that the moral cosmos may be reduced to a chaos, and man, the sport of destiny, expire in a ruined universe. And this is the central point, the idea which stands out for our strength and solace, that Hugo himself may be relied upon to chase and catch the recalcitrant Deity, and to overawe Him by the majesty of his personal appearance and the eloquence of his rebuke. "I shall go for him," is the first statement.

"J'irais, je le verrais et je le saiserais
Dans les cieux, comme on prend un loup," etc.
(Pages 42, 43.)

Essays Modern, by F. W. H. Myers. Second edition. London: Macmillan & Co. 1885.

In one of the last poems of L'Année Terrible, M. Hugo paints at great length and with startling rhetoric the possibility that God may at last be found to have deceived us all along — that "the moral cosmos may be reduced to a chaos," and man, the sport of destiny, expire in a ruined universe. What, then, is the central point of this poem? What is the idea which stands out for our strength or solace from this profusion of rhetoric and metaphor? It is—I blush with shame for M. Hugo in writing it down—it is that M. Hugo himself may be relied upon to chase and catch the recalcitrant Deity like a wolf in the forest, and to overawe Him by the majesty of his personal appearance and the eloquence of his rebuke.

"J'irais, je le verrais, et je le saiserais
Dans les cieux, comme on prend un loup," etc.
(Pages 160, 161.)

Now is not this a pretty dark showing against the obscure English essayist, Mr. Myers? To be sure his book was printed the year before Miss Sanborn's; but as it were ungallant to suppose a lady capable of such piracy, this trifling chronological fact only proves that Mr. Myers must be a more than ordinarily skilful plagiarist. And if by some occult theosophic trick of mind-reading or astral-bodying he can steal Miss Sanborn's thoughts and style of expression a year before she confides them to paper, what is to prevent this impudent Britisher doing the same to other inspired Americans? Indeed, if this goes unpunished, may we not expect to see Mr. Myers and kindred pirates printing Howells's new novels, or possibly—ye gods forefend!—even Joseph Cook's lectures, long before the luckless authors can evolve them? Protection, therefore, and national legislation tending thereto are unquestionably the imperative need of the hour.

TRANSFORMATION OF SURNAMES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There are two instances of transformation of surnames that have come to my notice that seem worthy of a place in your already valuable collection. Both instances are of a change from the French, which seems to furnish the greater number of these cases. A Frenchman named Le Sayre, because his name was unpronounceable by Yankees, changed it to Saul, which came nearest to it of any name he could find in "the Big Book." Another family, named L'Arrivée, has for convenience sake become Cummings!

J. W. SUTER.

WINCHESTER, MASS., April 14, 1887.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As the Nation's columns seem likely to be consulted hereafter as a record on this subject, you may think it worth while to print the following facts, although I sent them some years since to a Boston daily paper.

It is well known that families in the eastern part of Virginia who spell their name Eorought are always spoken of as Darby. I was assured by a Virginian that the families in question were quite ignorant of the origin of this extraordinary state of things. Some years afterwards, the late Bishop of Gibraltar, who took much interest in such matters, confessed to me that it was the most remarkable case he had heard of, but added that he happened to be able to do something towards explaining it. Having married a lady from County Clare, he knew that some families named Enright or Enraght had gone thence to the United States some generations since; that they belonged to the religious sect of Derbyites (Darbyites), and were often insulted in the streets by cries of "Old Darby."

Why Mr. Enroughty, when he grew tired of pronouncing his name differently from the rest of the world, persisted in spelling it in a way no one in the world would hit upon, is and must remain a mystery. A. D.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A correspondent in your issue of April 7 gives us a notice of the curious change of the Lithuanian-Jewish Yitshak (Isaac) into the English Hitchcox. The most curious part of it all is that Hitchcox, Hickok, and a dozen other like names all probably stand for Isaac. Ike, Hyke, and other similar country nicknames take the diminutive termination in ock and become finally transformed—past ready recognition. So Luke becomes Luckock, Jacob Jacox, Henry (Hank) Hancock, and so on.

Let me add here, if not strictly pertinent, that the third part of the 'New English Dictionary,' under the entry "Bêche de mer," follows the other dictionaries in saying that it literally means "sea-spade." True enough; but it is equally true, and more important, that it is simply a corruption of the Portuguese bicho do mar, or "sea-worm." C. W. G.

Notes.

D. Appleton & Co.'s forthcoming books include 'An Index to the Works of Shakspere,' containing some novel features, by Evangeline M. O'Connor; 'Proverbs from Plymouth Pulpit,' selections made with Mr. Beecher's sanction, and partly revised by him; 'Public Debts: An Essay in the Science of Finance,' by Prof. Henry C. Adams; 'Teaching English,' with detailed examples, by Alexander Bain; 'The Ventilation and Warming of School Buildings,' by Gilbert B. Morrison; 'Principles of Education Practically Applied,' by J. M. Greenwood; and 'Elementary Psychology and Education,' by James Baldwin.

Frederick Warne & Co. have nearly ready an illustrated volume, 'The Queen, her Early Life and Reign,' and a 'Victoria Birthday Book,' illustrated with portraits of the Royal Family.

T. Y. Crowell & Co. publish immediately 'The Blind Brother,' by Homer Greene.

Laughton, Macdonald & Co., Boston, are about to issue the fourth volume of Halkett and Laing's 'Dictionary of Anonymous and Pseudonymous Literature,' thus completing the work, whose authors no longer survive.

'The Order of Words in the Ancient Languages Compared with the Modern,' by Henri Weil, translated by Prof. C. W. Super, will be published in June by Ginn & Co.

D. C. Heath & Co. announce 'Notes on the Early Training of Children,' by Mrs. Frank Malleson.

'Organic Analysis: a Manual of the Descriptive and Analytical Chemistry of Certain Carbon Compounds in Common Use,' by Albert B. Prescott, is in the press of D. Van Nostrand.

The third and final volume (for this year) of the Dunlap Society is Mr. Laurence Hutton's admirably annotated 'Opening Addresses, written for and delivered at the first performances in many American theatres, from Boston to San Francisco, A. D. 1752-1880.' There are more than forty of these addresses, and they are of very varying literary value, but of most indubitable interest. The frontispiece of the collection is a facsimile, printed in blue, of a blue-china plate giving a view of the old Park Theatre.

Few words are needed for the praise of the new Riverside edition of Browning's Works in six volumes (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.). The two already issued include the Dramatic Lyrics and Dramatic Romances, with "Pauline," "Paracelsus," "Strafford," "Sordello," "Pippa Passes," etc. A fine portrait of the poet accompanies the first. The beautiful typography is condensed but clear, while the page form and the dull olive binding have been carefully and most satisfactorily thought out. At the end we shall have, we are assured, indexes of the contents and of first lines.

The same firm send us a third edition of Dr. Beardsley's 'Life and Correspondence of Samuel Johnson, D.D.,' a timely issue in view of the recent centennial of Columbia College, whose first President Dr. Johnson was.

A second edition has been reached of the 'Report of Commemorative Services with the Sermons and Addresses at the Seabury Centenary, 1883-1885' (James Pott & Co.), a volume of considerable ecclesiastical and historic interest.

Mr. Ernst E. Lemcke's 'Skat' has met with such success as to warrant a second edition, styled 'An Illustrated Grammar of Skat' (B. Westermann & Co.), revised and greatly enlarged, with rubricated title, illustrations, and even a bibliography of this German game of cards. A literary interest is imparted to the contents by a translation from Fritz Reuter's 'Ut mine Stromtid,' describing a Low German card party—a "Boston party"—kept up "until the Rector, making a rough guess at the amount of money he had after all won, and finding that it was about 3 Thalers and 8 Groschen, and since of late luck had been somewhat against him, concluded to stop, rose and said that his feet were cold, putting his booty in his pocket."

'The Annual Statistician for 1887' (San Francisco: L. P. McCarty), contains, as usual, a number of new features for which room has been made by the omission of some things which it is not worth while to publish every year. Probably the most valuable of the new matter in this year's issue is the comparative statistics of the seventeen leading cities of the country. The tables under this head show the number of votes registered and polled in 1886, the number of voting precincts, the strength of the police and militia forces, the number of fire engines, etc., and of firemen, the loss by fires, the value and capacity of the gas and water works, the number and character of the street lights, the vital statistics, the number of murders, suicides, and executions, the length of street railways operated by each sort of motive power, the telegraph and telephone mileage, the number of saloons, the cost of licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors, the school population and the amount expended for schools in 1886, the annual tax-rate, revenue, and expenditure, the public debt, and the names of the principal municipal officers. The annual publication of the latest attainable statistics, upon the subjects mentioned, for the principal cities of the country would add an extremely useful feature to the 'Statistician.' In future publications it will be possible, we trust, to submit the statistics, received as it is stated these were, from the city officials, to independent criticism by persons well posted upon the details of the municipal governments of the cities in which they live. In this way the danger of making serious errors, several of which we notice in the tables of this year's issue, will be reduced to a minimum.

'Isaac Bickerstaff,' from the Tatler; Landor's 'Gebir, and Count Julian'; and Lodge's 'Rosalind,' extend the series of little volumes in Henry Morley's "Cassell's National Library."

The Westminster Review succumbs to the spirit of the age and turns monthly, putting on a new and attractive cover, and making altogether a very handsome appearance (International News Co.). It now enlists in its regular service a number of writers on this side the water, beginning with our new Minister to Turkey, who describes the development of religious liberty in America. It will still preserve anonymity in general, but with provision of an "Independent Section" in which articles may or may not be signed, at the writers' option. It will labor consistently for the Liberal cause, and will not be a mere "platform" for chance-assorted essayists.

Among the Shelley scholars who are delivering sentence on the poet's conduct toward his first wife, in view of the Dowden biography, is Mr. J. A. Symonds, who writes to the April Fortnightly to the effect that he does not accept the defence that Shelley believed his wife unfaithful before he united himself with Mary Godwin. He thinks that Shelley formed the suspicion afterwards, and clung to it. Every one must have his say over "the blood eagle" of the Dead Prophet (if a reference to Tennyson is intelligible or pardonable in these later days), and we have had ours.

The Manchester Quarterly (John Heywood) is a publication of the Literary Club of that city, and is a very creditable one. Mr. Alexander Ireland, whose name is favorably known in this country, contributes a list of books for popular reading, in imitation of the lists of the one hundred best books so numerous of late, but his list comprises many hundreds. It shows distinctly individual prepossessions, but is on the whole a wise and conservative guide. The American department is not without its curiosities; we note "H. D. Howells," the novelist, and "Cable (Negro Life)"; Holmes's poetry. Aldrich, Higginson, and others of note are apparently unknown; the Authors' Club of this city suffers an eclipse well-nigh total; but not so Miss Wetherell and Henry Giles. In fact, the American list is a curious mélange of the established reputations and literary mistakes of the last age, with a scattering and uncertain selection of doubtful names of the present. The French and German departments are similarly highly classic, and, with regard to modern days, incomplete. An admirable comical skit on Browning's last volume, and one or two articles of literature and travel, are the only other noticeable features of the April number of the Quarterly.

The American Magazine (New York: Bush & Son), successor to the Brooklyn Magazine, opens with a varied list of contents of a popular character. Mr. W. H. Rideing attempts to do for the Boston literati the questionable service lately rendered by Mr. G. P. Lathrop to his brothers of the quill in this city; but the personal element is comparatively slight, while the un-Bohemian literary life of the young Bostonians is naturally the most striking thing about them in the eyes of an émigré from Union Square, as Mr. Rideing is. Mr. J. T. Trowbridge contributes some reminiscences of his early struggles in literature, in the course of which he describes old Major Noah in a very life-like way and much to his honor.

Our friends of the Audubon Society would do well to copy, from the April Auk, portions of Mr. W. E. D. Scott's paper on the "Bird Rookeries of Southern Florida." The writer had been over the ground six years before, when these rookeries were densely populated; but meanwhile the feather fashion for ladies' bonnets at the North had set in, and the result has been little short of extermination. "Birds were killed, and the plumes taken from the back, head, and breast, and the carcass thrown to the buzzards." One man "regularly employed from forty to sixty gunners, furnishing them with all supplies, and giving so much a plume or flat skin, for all the birds most desirable." The prices range from twenty cents to two dollars and a half.

Some very interesting notes on Monachus tropicalis, a rare West Indian seal inhabiting the islands known as the Triangles, a hundred miles northwest of Yucatan, are given by Mr. Henry L. Ward in the March number of the American Naturalist.

In the Canadian Entomologist Dr. H. A. Hagen discusses with characteristic geniality a serious subject—a new library pest, bearing the very innocent name of Lepisma domestica, and which, unlike the Anobium, is very fond of starch. At the same time, Dr. Hagen cannot forbear to renew his warning against the white ant, which both devours the books and brings down the library roof when its attacks on the timbers of a building have gone far enough.

The management of the American Journal of Philology gives notice that only fifty-six complete sets remain in the publisher's hands. The price of the seven volumes (now $19) will be advanced after the present year. Applicants should address Prof. B. L. Gildersleeve, Baltimore.

There lies before us the first number of Dr. Daniel Sanders's monthly Zeitschrift für Deutsche Sprache (Hamburg: J. F. Richter). It gives every promise of being what our lexicographer contemplated, a veritable continuation of his 'Deutsches Stil-Musterbuch.' It opens, after an Introduction, with a reiteration of Dr. Sanders's agreement with Du Bois-Reymond's opinion, that Goethe in the fundamental qualities of style is in general no model; this being prefatory to a reprint, with great fulness of comment, of Goethe's "Der Sammler und die Seinigen"—which space alone prevented Dr. Sanders from inserting in his 'Stil-Musterbuch.' In this and in similar cases he intends to substitute German equivalents for the foreign words and phrases of the original, in order by means of foot-notes to emphasize the sufficiency of the vernacular. Prof. A. Ledebur has an article on the avoidance of foreign words in the industrial vocabulary. Another relates to the grammatical errors often committed by good writers.

The Massachusetts Historical Society has published an Index of the first series of its Proceedings, numbering twenty volumes and including the years 1791-1883. For its accuracy the fact that it has been prepared under the supervision of Mr. C. A. Cutter of the Boston Athenæum is a sufficient guarantee. The chief criticism which we have to make is, that in the endeavor to be exhaustive the compiler has overburdened the index with numerous entries of the most trivial importance, thereby unnecessarily increasing the size of the volume, with a proportionate diminution of the ease of reference to it.

The 'Catalogue of the York Gate Library' (London: Murray) is a sumptuous volume, richly illustrated, of the geographical collection of Mr. S. W. Silver. This library contains about 5,000 volumes, principally in English, and is especially strong in the collections of early voyages and works relating to the British colonies, but has comparatively few books about this country. The titles in the catalogue are arranged chronologically according to subjects, and references are made to all important papers in the various society publications. There are also indexes of subjects and authors, so that the catalogue, though not very scientifically constructed, will prove extremely useful as a bibliographical handbook of geography.

Mr. Bernard Quaritch appears to have a genuine grievance in that, having purchased of Col. Chester's executor his transcript of the Westminster marriage licenses, at a high figure, supposing them to be unique, the executor sells a copy at a reduced figure to the Harleian Society, thereby preventing a sale to the Society on Mr. Quaritch's part, and producing a rival publication.

A new title has been added to Bohn's Classical Library, in a translation in two volumes of Pausanias's Description of Greece, by Arthur Richard Shilleto of Cambridge (Scribner). It is surprising, when one looks over the list of translations in this library, to see how meagre and inadequate it is—apart from the quality of the translations, which, in the earlier volumes, has in many cases ranked very low. The appearance of the present work, which may be assumed to represent the present high standard of Cambridge scholarship, leads us to hope that others of the less known, but none the less indispensable, authors—as Polybius, Dio Cassius, the Scriptores rei rusticæ and historiæ Augustæ—will be in time added. It would have been too much to expect a commentary on Pausanias (a work of enormous labor), but it seems a pity that a moderate number of critical notes were not added; enough at least to show the student in what instances the translator has abandoned the Teubner text and adopted "a reading that seemed preferable from any other source."

A 'Bibliothèque de Carabas' is announced in London by Mr. David Nutt (New York: Scribner & Welford), of which the first volume is to be the 'Marriage of Cupid and Psyche,' from the 'Golden Ass' of Apuleius, Englished by William Adlington (1556), and now reëdited by Mr. Andrew Lang, with a discourse on the fable by the editor, with two full-page plates and various head and tail-pieces, and with introductory verses by Mr. Frederick Locker, Mr. W. H. Pollock, and Mr. Lang himself. The ordinary edition is limited to 550 copies, and there will be also sixty large-paper copies.

In 1879 M. Victor Fournel published a solid and abundantly illustrated volume on 'Les Rues du Vieux Paris' (Paris: Firmin-Didot & Cie.); and he has now issued another book closely akin to this in subject and style, 'Le Vieux Paris: Fêtes, jeux et spectacles' (Tours: Alfred Mame et fils; New York: F. W. Christern). In the fourteen well-illustrated chapters of this substantial work M. Fournel considers the mysteries, fairs, minor theatres, puppet-shows, magicians, acrobats, "freaks," trained animals, and "side-shows" of all sorts, from the Middle Ages to the present time; and in the course of his entertaining rambles he sheds not a little light on many points of minor interest in the history of the French theatre.

A publication interesting to book-lovers, and especially to those who are trying to collect the works of what has been called la génération de 1830, is the 'Causeries d'un ami des livres' (Paris: Édouard Rouveyre). Nine numbers have already appeared, and the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth are promised for next September. It is an anonymous publication, but it is whispered that it is the work of M. Léopold Derome, a frequent contributor to Le Livre. The first five numbers are devoted to 'Les Éditions originales des Romantiques,' poets, prose writers, the petits Romantiques, the Romantic sects and La Bohême, the works of Heine and of Gérard de Nerval. The sixth number is entitled 'Services rendus par Charles Nodier à la conservation des livres,' and the seventh, 'Les Ennemis des livres.' In the eighth the writer discourses very pleasantly about Sainte-Beuve, the man, the apostle of Romanticism, the book-lover. But he cannot forgive him his abjuration of his old literary creed, any more than he can pardon his unchristian burial or that of Victor Hugo. The last number is about the historians of the Romantic school, Mérimée and Augustin Thierry. To be logical, M. Derome would have to include Henri Martin and Michelet, but probably he would think that their abjuration of what he calls "la forme laïque du catholicisme" was of too serious a nature to entitle them to be classed among the true Romantiques.

Hetzel-Quantin (New York: Christern) have published a neat volume, 'L'Œuvre de Victor Hugo.' The first thought that occurs on seeing this title is that it may be the same book that was published just at the time of Hugo's death, under the title 'L'Œuvre complète de Victor Hugo,' but a careful examination shows that this is not the case. Both contain extracts, but the later ones differ materially from the first, and are more numerous. The new volume, by the care with which the selections are made, deserves its name of "Édition des Écoles." Victor Hugo has everything to gain by being presented in extracts skilfully chosen. The present collection shows him at his best, and gives an excellent idea of the broadness and variety of his work, both in prose and verse.

The Report of the Chief Procurator of the Synod upon the Orthodox (Russian) faith, for 1884, has just been published, and furnishes some curious facts. In the Western Governments and Poland, the official religion of the inhabitants is Orthodox, while their real faith is Catholic. Certain privileges were conferred on the Raskolniki (the upholders of the ancient unrevised versions of religious works), by the law of May 3, 1883, and this was accepted as a sign that the authorities were beginning to recognize the legality of the sect. The leaders expect to see the Raskolniki placed on an equality with the State Church before long, and this has emboldened them in some quarters to oppress the members of the authorized faith, while complaining, in many instances, that they are still grievously oppressed. It is not stated in just what their persecution of Orthodox believers consists, but it is principally directed against converts from the sect to the established faith. In consequence, there has arisen a feeling which is unconditionally opposed to every grant of privileges to this overbearing sect.

Applications for the twenty annual scholarships offered by the Johns Hopkins University (worth $500 each, plus free tuition) should be addressed to the President of the Johns Hopkins University —Application for Fellowship; and they must reach the Registrar's office not later than nine o'clock, Monday, May 2, 1887. For the return of manuscripts the requisite postage should be sent. Every candidate is expected to submit his college diploma or other certificate of proficiency from the institution where he has been taught, with recommendations from those who are qualified to speak of his character and attainments. He must also submit, orally or in writing, such evidence of his past success in study and of his plans for the future, together with such examples of his literary or scientific work, as will enable the professors to judge of his fitness for the post.

—The Boston Museum of Fine Arts has published a descriptive catalogue of the casts from Greek and Roman sculpture which belong to the Museum—a small collection, but well chosen and fairly well lighted and shown. Mr. Edward Robinson, the newly appointed curator of classical antiquities, is one of the younger group of archæologists who unite German thoroughness to a wide sympathy for artistic expression of many kinds, which is not so peculiarly German. Much is to be expected of our museums if they are put into such hands, as they will be little by little. We accept with gladness this catalogue and manual as a first-fruit of the season to come. It is a book to study before visiting the collection, and to study more carefully afterwards—a really serious inquiry into the characteristics of each work of sculpture, with a history of it and a memorandum of the restorations that it has undergone. All of this may be done, however, without other originality than that of hard and well-directed work—at least, it is only now and then that a point can be said to be newly made; and therefore we hasten to say that the tone of criticism seems to be just and discriminating throughout. To judge of the quality of this handbook, read the notices of the Hermes of the Belvedere and the Hermes of Andros, Nos. 91 and 92. The student of these statues needs the help of the critic, and the needed help is given here in excellent form. Everywhere in the book perfunctory remarks are extremely rare, and little is said that could be spared. There is an index which seems a good one, though it would be well to have the sculptures mentioned under the places of discovery or places of exhibition; thus, the Apollo (?) of Thera we should like to find under Thera, in case we don't believe it an Apollo and have looked in vain under Athlete, Gravestatue, Tomb-statue, and the like. So of the above-mentioned Belvedere Hermes: travellers of a few years ago knew it as the Belvedere Antinous, absurd as it seems to us now. A mention of it under Belvedere of the Vatican would help such antiquated persons.

—In the goodly brotherhood of American public libraries there are "poor relations" who can hardly maintain the struggle for existence, and again well-housed, well-endowed institutions, entertaining the most benevolent feelings towards the weaker kind. The two classes are sharply discriminated in the rural parts of New England according as the movement to found a library has been more or less spontaneous and feeble, or some wealthy resident or native of the town has suddenly bestowed upon it quite its most beautiful and imposing building, perhaps designed by Richardson, with a sufficient fund to insure its comfortable support and growth. To the latter class belongs the Nevins Memorial Library of Methuen, Mass., an institution founded by the late David Nevins—or, rather, contemplated by him, and actually built and endowed by his widow and sons. They have not only provided a building, after designs by Mr. S. J. F. Thayer, worthy to rank with the best of the minor public libraries, and filled it with 10,000 volumes, but have borne the expense of a catalogue which can hardly have an equal in its degree. This work, in two imperial octavo volumes of about 1,000 pages, with broad margins and open and elegant typography, shows a hand practised in the best modern methods of cataloguing, and is a liberal model of the art. It has been compiled by Miss Harriet Howe Ames, who, moreover, was intrusted with the selection of the books themselves and the entire organization of the library. In all these particulars she shows a very exceptional intelligence and a painstaking and punctilious habit. The literal accuracy of the entries is noticeable throughout, and we have discovered no greater slip than "1630-80" (under Boston Memorial History) for 1630-1880. The catalogue is by author, subject, and class; and headings like Biography, Dictionary, France, Genealogy, Japan, Slavery, etc., reveal the good judgment which has gone to the stocking of the library. What is remarkable is that (so far as we have observed) not a single work wholly in a foreign language is embraced in the collection. From Homer to Dante, from Cæsar to Napoleon, from Horace to Heine, all the classics represented are in translation. Finally, Miss Ames furnishes numerous notes by way of additional cross-reference and as guides to students. It is safe to say that no public library was ever better launched than that over which she presides.

—John Harvard's much-married mother was a Rogers, belonging to one of the first families of Stratford-on-Avon. Her sister Rose furnished a clue to her discovery by Mr. Henry F. Waters; and it was while he was endeavoring to find mention of Rose herself that he went somewhat deeply into the Rogers family, among the Essex wills, and made some notable advances in tracing the connection between the family of the Rev. Nathaniel Rogers of Ipswich, Mass, and their ancestors in the old country. It is well known that the late Col. Chester was drawn into his masterful pursuit of genealogy by a desire to establish his own relationship with John Rogers, the martyr. He succeeded in destroying the common belief in a direct descent from this celebrity on the part of the New England Rogerses, but he in vain sought to go beyond John Rogers, a famous minister of Dedham, England, and father of the above-mentioned Nathaniel. Mr. Waters (and it is a high tribute to his skill) has found both the father and the grandfather of John of Dedham, planting the family in Chelmsford, Essex, twenty-nine miles from London, where he can but think that "the oldest and most noticeable house" in Mulsham (an adjacent hamlet) may be the birthplace of the said John. He died in 1636, and for a hundred years at least the family had been on the spot, as the church register shows. Two elegies on this "minister of god his word, late deceased," were found by Mr. Waters in the British Museum, and are printed with a portion of the Rogers researches in the April number of the New-England Historical and Genealogical Register. We have not space for further details, but may quote Mr. Waters's disposition to think that the New England family may yet establish a kinship with the martyr Rogers through a common ancestor, and that the ancestry of John Harvard's mother may also be traced back to the same source. His researches in this direction are by no means at an end, and the uncommon interest in them makes timely Mr. John T. Hassam's reminder, in the Register, of the necessity of establishing a permanent fund, by means of which we can carry on these investigations on a grander scale than ever before, and with proportionately greater results."

—Besides Mr. Waters's "Gleanings," the Register contains, with a portrait, a biographical sketch of the late Frederic Kidder, a prolific historian and genealogist, and disinterested friend of the Register in its trial hours. There is also a fresh presentation of the lineage of Abraham Lincoln, by Samuel Shackford of Chicago. The chain that leads up to Samuel Lincoln of Hingham, Mass., is nearly complete, but the New Jersey and Massachusetts Lincolns still need to be indisputably connected, and strong probability, rather than certainty, must be alleged of the pedigree as it now stands. Certain it is that the New Jersey ancestors of the emancipator passed on into Virginia, into North Carolina, and finally into Kentucky. On page 222 of the Register mention is made of the forthcoming volume of the Collections of the Virginia Historical Society, with its preface by Mr. Robert A. Brock, consisting of "a carefully prepared and valuable history of the African slave trade, with an account of slavery in Virginia, into which colony, as he shows, its introduction was incidental, and its extension circumstantial and largely involuntary."

—Macmillan's for April is distinguished by Tennyson's Jubilee "Carmen Sæculare," a poem which has a singularly monumental character. In the ordinary run of literature which is all that the remainder of the number can boast of, Mr. George Saintsbury's paper on Hazlitt is very well worth reading. It is undoubtedly a fact that Hazlitt has met with a speedy oblivion that would be scarcely credible to the literary generation that knew him. A good many elderly people still believe in him, and Mr. Saintsbury, speaking as a qualified professional critic, would evidently be pleased if he could bring about a "revival" of his vogue. What he has to say is in a high degree interesting, and he shows a "sweet and commendable" nature in letting the old literary grudges all go, and forgiving the irascible and erotic creature with the fulness of complete absolution. But, in the way of mere criticism, we incline to think he goes further than a sound method warrants in one respect. He finds in Hazlitt a mixture, a kind of primeval and generative chaos, of all styles, out of which, unfortunately, Hazlitt himself brought no single orderly, fixed style to be his own; but he answers Jeffrey's famous question plumply by saying that Macaulay got his style from Hazlitt, and adds, also, that "Hazlitt served as a model to Thackeray, to Dickens, and to many not merely of the most popular, but of the greatest writers of the middle of the century. Indeed, in the 'Spirit of the Age' there are distinct anticipations of Carlyle." And again, "No one who reads the essay on Nicolas Poussin will fail to add Mr. Ruskin to Hazlitt's fair herd of literary children." From all of which substantially we dissent, as an abuse of putative fatherhood in the matter of style, which could be taken seriously only if it were meant humorously. In such remarks as these, coming from men of the professional eminence of Mr. Saintsbury, the unreality which seems more or less to pervade literary criticism at all times becomes painfully apparent.

—Émile Zola periodically brings his name before the Paris public, and when he has done so we may be sure that he is about to issue a new volume of his series of the "Rougon-Macquart." In this case the coming book will be called 'La Terre,' and in it peasant life will be depicted, the action taking place on the confines of La Beauce and La Perche. Previous to its publication, however, M. Zola has been creating quite a stir by his controversy with the dramatic critics in regard to the play taken from 'Le Ventre de Paris.' This goes under the name of M. William Busnach, who has before now played the part of dramatic arranger for the novelist. But M. Zola is even more sensitive to criticism upon his collaborateur than he would be to attacks upon his own work, or at least he feels more at liberty to be violent in defence of another than of himself. That he can be violent he has shown once more by the general slashing he has inflicted upon those who disapproved of the new drama. M. Francisque Sarcey of the Temps is the critic of whom he speaks the most contemptuously. But M. Sarcey is not to be crushed thus, as he has shown in his feuilleton headed "Réponse à M. Émile Zola." In this, with delightful good humor, he answers the "Parisien de Médan qui surgit tout rouge de dépit et crie comme si c'était lui-même que l'on eût écorché." Justice is playfully done to the symbolical galantine, to the symphonic oppositions of fat and lean in the charcuterie of Quenu. A few of the novelist's own slips are maliciously referred to, as when he speaks of catching "little pink shrimps"; which are pink only in the seas "where the lobster is clothed in the purple of the cardinals," adds M. Sarcey. He concludes by seriously advising him to imitate the example of M. Alphonse Daudet, and to give to the world a play wholly written by himself.

—After the publication of 'La Terre,' M. Zola sees five more novels to complete the series he has undertaken. In one, of which a few chapters in 'L'Œuvre' gave a foretaste, he will study the railroad world; in another, the Bourse and journalism in the last days of the Second Empire; in a third, military life, the defeat at Sedan, and the Paris Commune. Another will probably be called 'Le Docteur Pascal.' In this the author will sum up his scientific conclusions about atavism. Pascal Rougon, who figures in what to many is Zola's best novel, 'La Faute de l'abbé Mouret,' is the only wholly genial character he has created. It was formerly his intention to close the series of the "Rougon-Macquart" with the volume of which Pascal was to be the principal figure, but now there floats in his mind a final work, which is to bring together all the scattered and unfinished threads—and there are many in the gigantic series, which will then number twenty volumes.

ROBERT E. LEE.—II.

Memoirs of Robert E. Lee. His Military and Personal History, etc. By A. L. Long, formerly military secretary to Gen. Lee, etc. New York: J. M. Stoddart & Co. 1887.

We have seen that Lee regarded as an accomplished fact the revolution which culminated in the organization of a Confederate States Government. The history of the world gave encouragement to the belief that the chances were largely in favor of the finality of the disruption of the Union. He found himself a citizen under a Government de facto, for the establishment of which he felt no personal responsibility; and to serve it as a soldier in the war which was already begun seemed only the natural sequence of relations and duties which he had already acknowledged. There was no distinguishable line between the defence of Virginia and that of the Confederate States of which she had become a part. This did not imply any change of opinion as to the character of secession or the folly of the revolution. That was all in the past; the flagrant war was the present fact. He was a soldier by profession, and the community from whose fate he could not find it in his heart to separate himself demanded his services. Candid men of all sorts of opinions may agree that it was quite natural to decide so, and may well decline to push casuistry further. We dwell upon it because we think it the key to Lee's subsequent conduct, which, viewed in this way, is reasonably consistent throughout.

One may look in vain for any indication in Lee's military orders and correspondence of a change in his political sentiments or convictions. We shall be surprised if his private letters or writings disclose any, except as the combative spirit grows in time of war by its own exercise. This was plainly seen on both sides, and we do not lack brilliant examples, on the national side, of men who began by solving with difficulty the question whether they would take arms at all, and ended by being zealous, if not radical, supporters of the broadest national claims.

Gen. Long tells how Lee met the suggestion of a prominent Georgian, that the people would make him Davis's successor if the Confederacy should become independent. "'Never, sir,' he replied, with a firm dignity that belonged only to Lee; 'that I will never permit. . . . I shall not do the people the injustice to accept high civil office with whose questions it has not been my business to become familiar.'" This is spoken of as proof of self-abnegation and modesty. It seems to us rather an indication of a continued unwillingness to identify himself with the political doctrines of secession. He was too large a man to doubt his own capacity for executive duties in a time of peace, and his form of expression looks to us only as a modest and allowable waiver of political discussion and of political committal.

When his task as a soldier was over, and he had redeemed to the full his pledge to devote himself to the defence of his home, his conduct was still consistent with the view we have taken. The first bitterness of surrender was intense. The expectation of severity from the successful power was natural. He thought he was likely to realize the foreboding he had expressed before the war began, that his choice involved a sharing of "the miseries of my people." Yet nothing can be clearer than that he accepted the result without reserve. He utters no sentimental lamentations over the "lost cause" as such. No original secessionist had done so much to make it a success, and had it succeeded there can be no doubt that his military skill would have been the cornerstone of Confederate independence. His attitude was one which would have enabled him to say (if he had permitted himself to say anything on the subject), "Your experiment of revolution has failed, and to the extent of my powers I have given you the means of making the test of its wisdom complete. I share the ruin which I advised you not to risk. It is no scheme or theory of mine that has thus collapsed." What he in fact said was, "I think it the duty of every citizen, in the present condition of the country, to do all in his power to aid in the restoration of peace and harmony, and in no way to oppose the policy of the State or general Government directed to that object." He wrote this to the Trustees of Washington College when suggesting doubts as to the propriety of his becoming the President of the College, because the appointment might be in the way of the peace and harmony he desired, on account of his being "an object of censure to a portion of the country." It is a pleasant duty to record the opinion that his administration of the College proved a most powerful help in launching the new South upon the peaceful and loyal course which promises to make its prosperity go hand in hand with the revival of a truly national spirit. To Gov. Letcher he wrote: "The interests of the State are therefore the same as those of the United States. Its prosperity will rise or fall with the welfare of the country. The duty of its citizens, then, appears to me too plain to admit of doubt. All should unite in honest efforts to obliterate the effects of war and to restore the blessings of peace."

The honest and hearty nature of this renewed allegiance cannot be doubted. Lee's convictions concerning the unity of the nation under the Constitution, as he professed them before the war, were not loosely held, but were the matured beliefs of an able man. When, therefore, the attempted revolution had failed, we know that the consistency of his intellect was such that he must have regarded the outcome as the proof of the truth of his original opinions, strengthened by the demonstrative evidence the war itself furnished of the cohesive power in the nation that could resist such a convulsion. It certainly was a noble trait in his character that he seems never to have permitted himself to argue in his own justification, or to deny his share of responsibility with other Southern leaders. As he had accepted the fate of Virginia when it dragged him away from his chosen career and ran counter to his judgment of both the right and the expedient, so he accepted without complaint the losses and the griefs the war had brought to all those with whom he had cast in his lot. He seems to have put the past utterly behind him, and to have made it his cardinal principle for the remainder of his life to think only of the duty of the present hour. If he had erred in not making his Constitutional Unionism more aggressive and more pronounced, he accepted with dignity and meekness the penalty of the mistake, and devoted himself to showing a new generation the way to a hopeful future based upon a broader patriotism.

We have preferred to dwell upon these phases of the personal character of Lee because they have been less discussed than his military career. His rank as a soldier is by common consent a very high one. There is still room for difference of opinion on the question of preëminence over all contemporaries, which is so often claimed for him. So many elements enter into the discussion of the causes of military success or failure that it will be premature to attempt an authoritative decision of the relative rank and abilities of leading officers, on either side, before we are quite sure we have all the light that history can give us. We are only beginning to get access to the official records and the correspondence which will show the inner working of causes and events during the rebellion. Some things, however, in regard to Lee may be taken to be firmly settled. His training as an engineer did not take from him that power of active initiative and prompt aggression in field campaigning which is so often denied to the engineer officer. He could adopt a carefully defensive policy; but he could also drop it suddenly to inflict punishment upon his opponent if the opportunity were given. He could vary his methods according to the known characteristics of his adversary. It must also be admitted that, with an inferiority in numerical force, he was victorious in the greater number of the battles in which he was engaged before the last campaign of the war. He could manœuvre a large army with rapidity, and did not seem to be overweighted by the responsibility of a great command. These things justify his claim to be considered a great soldier, while they leave room for the belief that several commanders were developed by the war for whom a similar claim could be made.

It is in itself probable that had he remained in the United States Army he would have followed Scott in its chief command. Whether the overtures to him made by Mr. Blair were fully authorized by President Lincoln may be doubtful; but whether they were or not, his recognized standing was such that he would, no doubt, have been put in command of the army at Washington had he stayed in the service, and the rest would have followed in natural course. Indeed, his reputation insured him high employment in whichever army he might choose; and if the loss or gain of position was matter of temptation, the temptations might be said to be, in that respect, pretty well balanced. We prefer to believe (and the evidence strongly sustains this view) that he felt a deep and sincere grief at the troubles that had come upon his country, and yielded to family ties and to local and personal influences, which made it seem preferable to suffer any evils with his own family and community rather than war upon them even if he thought them wrong. That it would be regarded a great prize by Mr. Davis and the active secessionists to secure his adhesion, needs no telling. That they would distrust his earnestness in their cause from his known opinions, is equally plain. They were doubtless glad to consent to take his military service under his own theory that he was defending Virginia, without asking him to approve their doctrines or to share the intensity of their feelings. His high sense of military honor and duty when once he had committed himself was the guaranty for the faithfulness of his devotion, and they soon learned to lean upon him with unquestioning trust. We get no trace of even a discussion with him of his political opinions, and such debate would seem to have been deliberately tabooed by him.

We are impressed with the belief that Lee's life was a deeply pathetic one, and that he was conscious, through all this part of it, of being in a false position. Love of home, of family, of friends had come in conflict with his love of country. The leaven of "State-rights" doctrine had worked so far as to make the calls of the State and of the nation neutralize each other, so that private and local affections turned the balance.

He felt that his friends and neighbors were on a wrong path, yet could not separate himself from them. In the clash of arms he could forget other thoughts, and in the intense activity of military life he could find something like exhilaration; but when it was over, and the cause to which he had given his sword had failed, he must have looked back upon it as a tragedy "wondrous pitiful," in which all that he held dearest had been staked and, apparently, lost, while he could not have even the consolation of the enthusiast in believing that the cause itself was noble and worthy of the sacrifice.

OLD ENGLISH LETTER FOUNDRIES.

A History of the Old English Letter Foundries, with Notes, Historical and Bibliographical, on the Rise and Progress of English Typography. By Talbot Baines Reed. London: Elliot Stock; New York: A. C. Armstrong & Son. 1887.

THIS book is welcome. Few bookish men pretend to accurate knowledge of English types or type-founders. The candid collector will admit that he knows more of the outer than of the inner dress of a book. He may, and probably will, point out the differences between the tooling of books of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, but his confidence will desert him should he attempt to define the age or the origin of a peculiar type. For this he has good excuse. English bibliographers of the last century, and even of the last generation, have been unsafe guides when they attempted to describe types. Assuming to talk authoritatively about matters they did not understand, they have warranted their readers in the exercise of similar rashness and similar blunders. Benjamin Franklin, always quick to detect pretence, has told an amusing story of his stultification of an English connoisseur who depreciated Caslon's types, which he professed to admire, in the belief that he was censuring the types of Baskerville. All Franklin had done was to produce indirectly the impression that the Caslon types were Baskerville types. The letter, too long to be quoted, may be found in Bigelow's edition of his Autobiography (Philadelphia, 1874, i, p. 413).

Since 1860 the teachings of the old school of bibliographers (of whom Dibdin may be noted as the last and the worst exemplar) have been brought to naught. William Blades began the work of reclassification admirably with his critical examination of the types of Caxton. The lamented Henry Bradshaw of Cambridge, although he wrote but little, did excellent service in enforcing the lesson that exact knowledge of types cannot be had from the acceptance of opinions, gossip, and tradition; that it must be had only from the study and comparison of the books and the methods of early printers. Mr. Hessels of Cambridge, and Dr. van der Linde of Wiesbaden, also deserve thankful mention for their efforts in destroying the typographical fables that have been palmed off as good history. Now comes Mr. Reed with the results of his researches in the history of English type-making in the shape of a stout quarto of nearly four hundred pages. In this book there is, of course, a good deal that is old and well known, but there is also much that is entirely new and of value to librarians and typographers. His list of authorities consulted shows that he is thoroughly versed in the literature of the subject, but his more important contributions have been derived from study and comparison of the specimen sheets and books of early type-founders, and the reading of the records of the Stationers' Company of London. We do not find in his preface any mention of his personal relation to type-founding, but his knowledge of types is plainly not that of an amateur or a man of letters: he must have known and handled types from boyhood.

His introductory chapter on the types and type-founding of the first printers is a careful, judicial summary of the little exact information we have on this subject. He leans to the opinion of Blades that there was in the beginning a scientific and an unscientific system of typography, and that Caxton was a pupil of the latter school, which was of Flemish origin. Caxton's pupils, De Worde and Pynson, were of French birth or descent, and their preference was for French forms of black letter and for the scientific system of type-founding. The types used by the early English printers may have been cast in England, but the designing of the forms and the cutting of the models were done abroad, most largely at Rouen and Paris, in which cities devotional books in English were largely printed for the English market. The "learned types," the Greeks, Hebrews, and Orientals, of the Oxford University Press were cut abroad. John Day (in business from 1546 to 1584) seems to have been the only English printer of the sixteenth century who was really active in having made for his office new forms of types. How much of this work was done by English, and how much by foreign, workmen, Mr. Reed cannot tell us. The books of the period are evidence of the slenderest ability in engraving. Day's woodcuts, vigorous in design, are rudely cut; the "bloomer" initials of the Oxford University Press and the "pierced" initials of many English printers are of matchless ugliness. Early English printers were dependent on foreign workmen. They had no good reputation abroad either as founders or printers.

Mr. Reed's chapter on the state control of English letter-founding is excellent, but disappointingly brief. In 1483 England allowed free trade in types and books, and printing flourished, although types and books in English were made abroad. Repression began in 1556, when a charter to the Stationers' Company was granted, and patents and monopolies were parcelled out, which did not have the good effect desired. Christopher Barker complained that in 1582 there were twenty-two printing-houses in London. He thought eight or ten enough for the entire kingdom. This restrictive policy culminated in the decree of 1637 made by the Star Chamber. The number of printers and type-founders, of presses and apprentices, was exactly prescribed. It was made unlawful to own a press or types or do any kind of printing without license. This is not the place to show the political consequences of that unwise legislation, but we may pertinently show how great damage it did to typography. Mr. Reed says that there followed—

"a distinct degeneration in the quality of the typographical work executed. A privileged printer, sure of his monopoly and safe from competition, would have little or no inducement to execute his work at more cost or pains than was necessary. Old type would do as well as new, and bad type as well as good. Free trade and open competition were the great evils to be dreaded, because free trade and open competition would demand the best paper and type and workmanship. The typography of the entire Stuart period is a disgrace to English art. Fine printing was an art unknown; and only a few works like Walton's Polyglot, which were produced in an atmosphere untainted by mercenary considerations, stand out to redeem the period from unqualified reproach.

"On the other hand, the removal of the restrictions was the signal for a revival which may be traced in almost every printed work of the early eighteenth century. In the absence of any great English type-founder, the best Dutch types came freely into the English market. Books came to be legible, paper became white, ink black, and presswork respectable" (p. 136).

It does not appear that English skill in type-founding was much greater at the close of the seventeenth century. English printers were dependent on other countries not only for styles of types, but for the very types themselves.

Joseph Moxon, the first English type-founder of note (1659-1683), writes enthusiastically of the beauty of Dutch types, which were then the admiration of English readers. Moxon cast imitations not with much success. Moxon's successors had to go to Holland to buy the materials for making types. Punches (the original letters on steel) were not to be had, for the "sly and jealous" Dutch would not sell them. When the matrices had been bought of Van Dijk or Athias, the English founder was reasonably sure of good types, but the matrices bought of inferior cutters are of sorry workmanship. We have had a recent revival of these shabby types made by unskilled Dutch workmen. Used for the most part in the seventeenth century by printers of ha'penny ballads, they are now paraded in recent imitations of old English typography as characteristic specimens of early English letter. No really good form of roman or italic letter was cut in England before the eighteenth century. The so-called English types of earlier periods are really of French or Dutch design.

William Caslon of London was the first English founder whose types were respectfully mentioned by foreign typographers. They still deserve all the praise they then received. Nichols says of them that "for clearness and uniformity, for the use of the reader and student, it is doubtful whether it [the Caslon form] has been exceeded by any subsequent production." And this must have been the opinion of Whittingham of the Chiswick Press, when in 1843 he persuaded Caslon (fourth of the name) to get the old Caslon matrices out of the vault and make new types of the discarded and almost forgotten face of what we now call Old Style. Caslon may properly be regarded as the founder and the master of a distinctively English school of type-founding. He had able successors in his descendants, and good pupils in Jackson and Cottrell. Baskerville acknowledged his obligation to him in words, as did Alexander Wilson and many others practically, in attempts at imitation. His influence may be seen in the work of Fry and Martin, in Figgins and Miller, in Besley and Reed, all of whom have done good service in maintaining the reputation of English types. Of all these (except the last named), and more, Mr. Reed has given us good description in his handsomely printed book, which we lay down with regret. It is the first time that we have had the pleasure of seeing the records of an artistic industry treated in so exact a manner and with such intelligent method. We wish there was more of it.

Treating his subject as one of history only, Mr. Reed has little to say about the comparative merits of old and new types. We wish that he had more strongly directed attention to the radical differences between the strong and simple types of the Elzevirs, Caslons, and Foulises, and the more carefully made, but more indistinct, types that have been in fashion for fifty years past. He could have told us that the good punch-cutters of the last century were content to keep themselves in the background, not obtruding their own personality, yet never forgetting that the first requisite in types is the simplicity of readableness. The modern punch-cutter seems determined to show more of himself than of his subject; to show how truthfully he can turn a curve or taper a stroke, how invisibly sharp he can make a hair-line, how cunningly he can repeat in every character some pretty mannerism which may testify to his skill, but which makes the types confusing in the combinations of composition. The needs of reader and printer are not considered at all. By men of imperfect or even of ordinary eyesight, these refinements of letter-cutting, which make letters hazy or foggy, will always be regarded as inexcusable impertinences.

Another reflection follows. This history of the slow growth of an artistic industry shows how little government, either of the state or of the trade union, has done or can do for its development. There are lessons in this book to be studied. We live in a time when there is great clamor for legislative interference with trades. We are told that trades must have more protection. There must be penalties for the importation of workmen; practically prohibitory duties on the importation of manufactures. Boys must not be allowed to learn trades unless they have been indentured. Employers shall have only a limited number of apprentices. Workmen shall not practise a trade until they have become members of their trade society. If we do not limit the number of workmen in a trade by the restriction of apprentices, our mechanical arts will die—and much more of the same tenor. Mr. Reed's book shows (but too sketchily) that all these nostrums have been tried, and all have failed. The more Government "protected" typography, the worse its condition. The more the trade-union spirit restricted the teaching of the art, the worse the skill of the workmen. The men who did the most to make England eminent for good type-founding—Moxon, Caslon, Baskerville, Wilson, and Jackson—were self-taught, never apprenticed to the branch of the art in which they became famous; men who made their way, not under the protection of trade unions, but in defiance of their laws.

The Dawn of British Trade to the East Indies, as recorded in the Court Minutes of the East India Company, 1599-1603. Containing an account of the formation of the Company, the first Adventure, and Waymouth's Voyage in search of the Northwest Passage. Now first printed from the original manuscript. By Henry Stevens of Vermont. With an Introduction by Sir George Birdwood, Kt., C.S.I., M.D. London: Henry Stevens & Son. 1886. xxiv and 332 pages.

In no field of human activity to which we may turn our eyes do we see so much to convince us of the unity of history as when we survey the trade of the West with India and the East. As commerce binds nations into peaceful and profitable relations, so it is a strong tie connecting successive generations and centuries. In the earliest civilization of Babylonia the Indian trade is a conspicuous feature, and from that time until the present day the "wealth of Ormus or of Ind" has been at once an immense attraction to the West and a wonderfully effective instrument in promoting its development. The commercial activity of Rome might decline when it ceased to be the capital of the Empire, the Empire itself might stagger and shrink under the irresistible advance of the barbarians, but commerce lived on even in the darkest ages. The people of Narbonne and Marseilles kept up the traditions of their fathers; the founders of Venice, even in the sixth century, were noted for the spatia infinita traversed by their seamen. In Gaul, in the Merovingian age, the Syrian merchants were to be seen in every considerable town, and passing to and fro both on land and sea. So frequent was the intercourse between Syria and Gaul that St. Simeon Stylites at Antioch availed himself of the opportunity to send by the merchants his salutations to St. Genevieve at Paris. So at least we are informed by St. Genevieve's biographer. In the tenth century Amalfi began a career of brief brilliance, soon to be checked by the Normans, but her place was promptly filled by Pisa and Genoa, and not much later Barcelona is to be added to them.

The life of these cities, so different from that of the rest of Europe, so prophetic of the character of the modern age, was darkened by the evil of the time. As dukes, counts, and barons warred among themselves like sovereign princes, so these cities manned navies to destroy each other. The greatest struggle took place between Venice and Genoa. If Venice establishes the Latin Empire, Genoa plans to help the restoration of the Greeks. Together they might have repelled the Turk, but, divided, they smoothed his path. Yet from these fierce contests one may form an idea of the richness of the prize for which they fought. It was the Eastern trade, and the Eastern trade meant the supplying of all Europe with such products as aloes, balsam, sandalwood, Brazil wood, camphor, cinnamon, cardamon, cassia, cloves, cochineal, frankincense, ginger, gum lac, indigo, ivory, ladanum, mastic, musk, mace, nutmegs, nutgalls; pearls, emeralds, turquoises, rubies, sapphires, diamonds; pepper, rhubarb, saffron, raw silk; porcelain, sugar, damask, gold and silver thread, samite, camelet, and other rich cloths. Even such a partial list of the articles of import from the East cannot fail to give one a profound impression of the significance of that commerce. But the Eastern trade led to far greater results than the enrichment of the Mediterranean cities and the diffusion of Oriental luxuries in the West. We might, perhaps, do well to say "necessaries," too, for in the absence of many of the common vegetables which impart variety to our tables, our ancestors endeavored to give zest to their dishes by a lavish use of spices; ginger, cloves, cinnamon, and, above all, pepper, were in great demand. Thorold Rogers tells us that the English put pepper even in pastry.

So general was the market for these Indian products that the prices always ranged high and the profits were immense. There was, in fact, a constant premium for the discovery of some new and cheaper route for this trade. In 1291 Ugolino Vivaldi of Genoa and one of his brothers, in company with Tedisio Doria and some of their fellow-citizens, fitted out two galleys to reach India by the ocean. The two Vivaldis commanded the expedition. One of the ships was wrecked; the fate of the other is shrouded in mystery. To speculate what would have been the effect upon the world's history if the heroic Vivaldi had had the good fortune of Vasco de Gama, would be interesting but fruitless. The temptation to such adventures, however, increased. As the fifteenth century wore on, the Turks enveloped the Levant and gained control over the chief routes of commerce. Heavy passage-tolls and the risk of robbery made spices enormously dear. Visions of infinite wealth set men's minds to thinking more than ever of the possibility of a western route to India. The more learned were familiar with the view of the ancient philosophers, that India could be reached by sailing west, or Spain from India by sailing eastward. The combination of events could have but one issue, and in the last decade of the century two heroic attempts were made to solve the problem. De Gama succeeded, and the news of the arrival of some ships in the Tagus with spices caused a panic in the Venetian market. Machiavelli sent word to Florence that the price of all the Indian products in stock there immediately fell more than one-half. The noonday of Venice was passed. De Gama succeeded, but Columbus, in his desire to seek the land of spices by sailing to the west ("deseo de querer pasar adonde nacen las especerias"), changed the face of the world. The India trade had opened the way for the ultimate creation of a commerce far greater than it had ever been; yet it retained its importance in men's eyes, and nearly four centuries of effort to find a northwest passage illustrates at once the pressure which bore upon Columbus and his contemporaries, and the wonderful part the India trade has played in the history of the world.

The harvest which Spain and Portugal reaped from the discoveries, though rich, was but short-lived; the great and permanent advantages fell into the hands of the English race. It is the last act of this great drama to which the volume at the head of this article directs our attention. This record of the first four years of the activity of "The Governor and Company of Merchants of London trading to the East Indies," as is justly remarked in the introduction, discloses the beginnings of the later triumphs of England in the East. In these pages we discern the thoroughly practical and commercial aims of the Company. Their first minute is dated September 22, 1599, but the act of incorporation was not granted till December 31, 1600. The profit on the early voyages rarely fell below one hundred per cent., and was generally about two hundred per cent. These records, resolutions, and accounts are here "printed as a labor of love, under the direction and at the charge of the late Mr. Henry Stevens" of Vermont, to whose well-directed energy and enthusiasm the cause of American history owes so much. In accordance with his desires, they have been reproduced with the most painstaking accuracy, even "in the minutest particulars of spelling and contractions," so that, apart from its historical value, the volume cannot fail to interest students of the English of that age. Mr. Henry N. Stevens has supplied a most exhaustive and valuable index of forty-five closely-printed pages (the records occupy only 283 pages), which is in fact an analysis of the contents of the volume. For example, the article "Northwest Passage" currently summarizes everything in the book appertaining to this subject. This is certainly a very great convenience for the student.

A very readable introduction has been contributed by Sir George Birdwood of the India Office. One of his notes, however, is rather extraordinary. He refers to the well-known passage, in the preface of Seneca's 'Quæstiones Naturales,' where the philosopher remarks that from Spain to India is "paucissimorum dierum spatium, si navem suus ventus implevit" (a voyage of a very few days with a fair wind), and adds, "This, I believe, is now brought to light for the first time in this connection [i. e., among ancient suggestions of a westward route]." It seems almost incredible that a writer on the history of geography should at this day make an independent discovery of a passage that has been known to every respectable geographer for six hundred years. Hardly less remarkable is it that Sir George Birdwood, after his discovery, could repose in the childlike belief that no one else had called attention to the passage, or that no critical suspicion prompted him to consult some common source of information, like Humboldt's 'Examen Critique de l'histoire de la Géographie du Nouveau Continent.' There he would have discovered that this passage was not only known to Columbus, but had exercised a great influence upon his thinking, and that Roger Bacon, if any one, deserves the credit of having "brought it to light for the first time." Furthermore, Sir George Birdwood seems to take the passage as a statement of knowledge on Seneca's part, whereas it is evidently a philosophical reflection on the smallness of the earth compared with the universe and the realm of the mind. The statement is put absolutely for rhetorical effect.

This volume must not be dismissed, however, without mentioning that it is an elegant specimen of printing, such as one always expects from the Chiswick Press, and that it embodies those sound principles of bookmaking so well laid down by Mr. Stevens in his trenchant little essay, "Who Spoils our New English Books."

Sir Philip Sidney. By J. A. Symonds. [English Men of Letters.] Harper & Bros. 1887.

We have before remarked upon the difficulty Mr. Symonds finds in writing a little book, and in this volume, as in his recent 'Life of Ben Jonson,' one observes the frequent complaint of lack of space, the confused interchange of a general and particular treatment, the ends left loose, and all the signs of a writer too fluent and too much in haste to study out and observe the fit proportions of a small but noble subject. The materials for 'Sidney's Life' are not great, and the substance of them is easily transferred to new pages; this Mr. Symonds has done, and he has expanded the biography proper by extended analysis of the literary works of Sidney, of no special acumen or value, and by some passages of personal criticism. In the earlier portion he betrays a certain dislike for his hero, whom he thinks unpleasantly grave in his precocity, and neglectful of his boyish privilege as a sower of oats; and he disparages his character, as he goes on, by putting an extraordinary and unjust emphasis upon one rash letter which has come down to us, and on a picked line or two here and there from contemporaries, for the purpose of forcing the inference that Sidney had "faults of temper" and other traits of uncompanionableness. He adopts the view that the sonnets to Stella were addressed to Lady Rich after her marriage, and makes the most of this circumstance as a moral delinquency; in fact, throughout the volume, Mr. Symonds is very anxious to assure us that the sun has spots, and he expresses pleasure in finding Sidney peccable because it gives human nature to him. This is in a familiar vein; but the evidence which Mr. Symonds brings forward for the purpose of conferring "human nature" on the youth best beloved in his own time and idealized ever after, strikes us as slight and scanty, and the tone in which it is advanced is distinctly unfriendly. Mr. Symonds felt from the start that Sidney left to posterity an ideality rather than a personal memory, and he says his "renown transcends his achievement."

But what he did he did remarkably well; he won distinction whenever he was put upon his trial, and both the trial and the distinction were beyond his years. In affairs he was as able as he was scholarly in study and perfect in breeding; his prose is marvellous for sweetness, judgment, and dignity; his poetry is so noble in expression that at its best it mates not unworthily with Shakspere's youthful verse; and no act of his life dims the lustre of his death, which is one of the sacred legends of Christendom. So skilled a master of panegyric as Mr. Symonds has not let this opportunity escape him, and he catches the note of eulogy and builds his own hymn to the young knight; at the end his epilogue, as he calls it, is almost just. It is true, no doubt, that Sidney performed no great deeds, and that what made him the ornament of his time was his character; but it was character shown in daily life, in the little unremembered acts, and it must have been of wonderful outward beauty to have so persuaded men of its lovableness and inward honor. So far as one can recover the incidents and perishable works of his days, in his relations with kindred, friends, the court, the counsellors and scholars of England and with foreigners, it was the life of a chosen man, from its beginning in the singularly admirable care of Sir Henry Sidney and his wife, whose characters had merit to adorn their son's biography, to the composure of his untimely death. Until Milton reached the age of manhood there was no figure in England again at all comparable to Sidney. These two were of the same "happy breed of men," and their felicity lay in their virtue in the days of their youth. The charm of both is moral and essentially the same; and notwithstanding the idealization of them, a close view of their lives still reveals such substance of excellence as justifies the national devotion to their memories. It is a pity that Mr. Symonds's book is not better, and especially is it a pity that he has strained the evidence to dispraise his hero; but there is so much of Sidney in the volume that the presence of his biographer is easily forgotten.

Biographical Annals of the Civil Government of the United States. By Charles Lanman. Second edition, revised, enlarged, and completed to date, by Joseph M. Morrison. New York: J. M. Morrison. 1887.

Lanman's 'Dictionary of Congress,' when published in 1858, if it did not fill a long-felt want, at any rate went a long way towards doing so, and its usefulness was greatly increased, in the edition of 1876, through the widening of its field so as to include civil officers who had not been members of Congress. The preparation of both editions involved a vast amount of labor, for the information contained in the sketches had, in most cases, to be sought at first hand. In spite of numerous errors, therefore, the great value of the work has never been disputed. The difficulties in the way of preparation, however, with which Mr. Lanman had to struggle, did not exist for the compiler of the present edition. He says, indeed, that he "was almost overcome by the seemingly innumerable and insurmountable obstacles which constantly appeared in his pathway," but never was such language more uncalled for. All necessary information respecting Congressmen, previous to the last session of the last Congress in which they served, lay ready to his hand in the official 'Congressional Directory,' while, in these days of personal journalism, sketches of all persons appointed to any conspicuous office during the last ten years, written with far more than the requisite detail, could readily have been found in any city newspaper Particularly in the case of the death of a Congressman or other public servant are the details of his previous life accessible not only in the newspapers, but, till recently, in the obituary lists of a work no more unknown than 'Appleton's Annual Cyclopædia,' as well as by means of the Tribune Index. Yet Mr. Morrison, though his work seems to have been printed this year, appears not to have known that Charles Francis Adams was dead, or that he had taken any part in public affairs since 1861. Indeed, the number of persons alive in these pages ("brought down to date"), though not elsewhere, is extraordinary. We have been able to test it in but few instances, yet we find no mention made of the death of L. A. Bingham, representative from New Jersey, 1879 81, died 1885 (not even his name is to be found), or the following: J. A. Ahl of Pennsylvania (1882), J. Bates of Maine (1882), Lorenzo Burrows of New York (1885), W. A. Duncan of Pennsylvania (1884), Reuben Ellwood of Illinois (1885), Edward Gilbert of California, killed in a duel in 1852 by the notorious J. W. Denver, J. Z. Goodrich of Massachusetts (1885), Moses H. Grinnell (1877), R. J. Haldeman of Pennsylvania (1885), Artemas Hale of Massachusetts, who died in 1882 at the age of ninety-eight, Robert B. Hall of Massachusetts (1868), E. Jeffords of Mississippi (1885), G. W. Jones of Tennessee (1884), Edward Kent of Maine (1877), Governor and Judge, whose name became familiar throughout the country in the once famous campaign song, "Have you heard the news from Maine?" Scott Lord of New York (1885), W. P. Lynde of Wisconsin 1885), Robert Mallory of Kentucky (1885), Benjamin Moran (1886), D. J. Morrell of Pennsylvania (1885), J. L. Mosley (1877), Alexander Mouton of Louisiana (1885, not, as here stated, in 1864), T. H. Murch of Maine (1886), A. S. Murray of New York (1885), Eben Newton of Ohio (1885), Robert Dale Owen of Indiana (1877), John Perkins of Louisiana (1885), Horatio Seymour of New York (1886), John Strohm of Pennsylvania (1884), J. T. Stuart of Illinois (1885), Judge T. R. Westbrook of New York (1885), G. C. Woodruff of Connecticut (1885). Alex. Caldwell, Senator from Kansas, 1871-73, is not mentioned. Neither birth nor death is given of Aaron Kitchell of New Jersey (1744-1820).

In bringing information down to date concerning persons not dead, Mr. Morrison is equally negligent. He does not know, apparently, that Mr. McCulloch was again Secretary of the Treasury under Arthur; that Mr. Kasson was envoy to Germany; that John A. Peters of Maine has been Chief-Justice of that State since his retirement; and various other facts equally interesting to compilers of biographical annals "brought down to date." Moreover, from the first edition are omitted some very convenient tables, as of the successive administrations in one glance, the Presidential electors, the electoral and popular vote at each Presidential election, etc., etc. As a partial recompense the new edition gives the members of the several Congresses from the beginning. The illustrations now first inserted do not amount to much.

Les Origines de l'Ancienne France. Par Jacques Flach. Le Régime Seigneurial (x et xi siècles). I. Paris. 1886.

We have here the first volume of what promises to be a most important work on mediæval history, as may be seen from the following brief summary of the author's outline. The first book is on the origin of the feudal system; the second on the causes of the dissolution of society in the tenth and eleventh centuries. These two constitute the present volume. The third book is to treat of the elements of the reconstruction of society; the fourth, of the formation of a national law by the fusion of the Frank and Roman systems under the influence of the canon law and the local customary law; the fifth, of the general conditions of society in the eleventh century and the evils from which it suffered, private wars, famines, etc. The sixth book, which will be one of the most important in the series, will consider the condition of individuals in law and in fact. It will open with a series of local studies, to be followed by a general view, which will include such matters as the proportion of free and serf lands, of free men and serfs, the state of agriculture, industry, and commerce, and the material conditions of life, food, clothing, etc. The seventh book will be devoted to the intellectual and moral condition of society, and the eighth will show how the communal movement of the next following age had its roots in the eleventh century.

A detailed study of this sort, based upon a full examination of the original sources, could hardly fail to be full of valuable suggestions, though written by a novice or even by a blunderer. But the author of this work is neither of these. He has already won for himself a distinguished position as a teacher and historian of law. It is of value, also, that a book like this comes to us just now from France to reinforce the growing number of careful studies on mediæval history which we owe to its scholars. We have been getting to look almost too exclusively to Germany for work of this sort, and it must be admitted that learning has not yet become so cosmopolitan as to have wiped out all national characteristics from its methods or its results. With the German a fact is apt to be the final end of all things, and he often sees it in such a way as to shut out the whole horizon. With the Frenchman, on the other hand, the thing of chief importance is the fact in its relations, and his work is sometimes liable to be a brilliant determination of the relations of a half-known or guessed-at fact. Of the two faults the latter is undoubtedly the worse, but a combination of the two excellences is absolutely necessary to the final product, and any work which combines the two in a marked degree, like this of Prof. Flach's, is to be especially welcomed.

This volume is a very thorough and careful study of the original material, both printed and manuscript. The notes abound in references to these sources, and, what is of especial value to the American student, they contain frequent and full quotations from the texts. The greatest merit of the work is its very fresh and stimulating treatment of old subjects and its occasional new suggestions. The first part, as introductory, treating of the origin of the feudal system in 100 pages, illustrates both merits and defects in perhaps an exaggerated way. The original German mundium is identified much too closely with the clientela of the Roman Empire. That the two melted together after the conquest is, no doubt, true; but that they were the same in origin or in purpose is not possible. The question of the origin of the læti on Roman lands is disposed of, on p. 66, with a suddenness and a decision which take away one's breath who has worried through the lengthy arguments on that subject. It is, again, doubtless possible that the freedom from taxation enjoyed by great estates under the Empire continued after the conquest, and passed from this source into the later immunities; but a book like this, while it should indicate clearly the author's own opinion, should also indicate clearly the degree of uncertainty which the state of the evidence necessarily attaches to any opinion. The same criticism applies, in a somewhat less degree, to the whole treatment of the immunities and the origin of private jurisdiction. It is in this connection, however, that one of the most valuable suggestions of this introductory part is made. It is this, that while the Frank noble acquired the immunity for himself by a gradual process, and the King's charter merely recognized and legalized a completed fact, the Church was so placed that it could not do this, and the immunity had to be created for it by an out-and-out grant, covering both freedom from taxation and from the action of the royal officers within its domains. While it may be reasonably doubted that the lay noble always acquired the immunity in this way, the suggestion is certainly a good one to keep in mind in one's study of the subject. Important, also, is it to remember the fact, to which attention is called, that at the end of the ninth century there existed a strong tendency to change benefices into allodial lands, as well as the tendency in the opposite direction, which is usually assumed to be the only one existing. Of more general interest, perhaps, would be the few paragraphs on the fear of the end of the world in the year 1000, showing how this idea is reflected in the charters as early as the middle of the ninth century, and the vivid conception given us of the lack of general security and the intense desire for peace of those days.

This is by no means a full statement of the new ideas presented or of the points with which one must disagree. The most important point, however, in a book of this sort is not that its conclusions should be indisputable—that is not to be expected from any one at present—but that it should be suggestive and stimulating. It is high praise to say of such a book, as must be said of this, that it will have its greatest value for those already familiar with the literature of the subject.

The Story of Persia. By S. G. W. Benjamin, lately United States Minister to Persia. ["The Story of the Nations."] G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1887.

THIS is a very amusing "story" for young folks, but a rather unsymmetrical history. The chapters devoted to the mythical heroes of prehistoric Persia, such as Feridoon, Djemsheed, Zohâk, Minoutchehr, Keï Kaoos, or Siawusch—as our author names them in his medley of English, French, and German spellings—fill eighty pages; all the history of Persia from the Mohammedan conquest in the middle of the seventh century to this day is told in nine pages; the events of the hundred years intervening between the death of Nadir Shah, in 1747, and the accession of Nasred-Din, the present ruler, are narrated in twenty-five lines. Of the latter Shah's long reign not a single event is mentioned, but we are assured that "the progressive tendencies of the present dynasty," combined with the advantages of climate and soil—if we forget deserts and famines—"indicate conditions that promise a renewal of the greatness of Persia when she has emerged from the transitionary period through which she is now passing."

Mr. Benjamin is an enthusiastic believer in the vitality and intellectual eminence of the Persian nation. "Great empires have risen and fallen since the day of Salamis," he correctly tells us in the chapter devoted to Xerxes, "and yet Persia lives." And in order to make this fact the more striking he says, though somewhat less correctly (p. 121): "The battle of Salamis occurred 430 years B. C., or two thousand three hundred and sixteen years ago; and Persia still exists as an independent nation, even though shorn of some of her vast dominions." The wonder is the greater if we consider that the paleness of a figure in the book before him, or some similar defect, made our historian read "430" for 480, and that the battle of Salamis really occurred two thousand three hundred and sixty-six years before he penned his admiring sentence. It is a real calamity, from a chronological point of view, that 3 and 8, and also 5, so resemble each other in print and copy that they are apt to play havoc in the pages of authors with short memories for dates and little inclination for research and revision. The blunder would have been avoided had Mr. Benjamin thought of telling his young readers when the battle of Thermopylæ was fought, or that of Platæa: but he did not. A little examination would also have taught him that Xerxes's father, Darius I., did not die "in 479 B. C., in the fortieth year of his reign" (p. 111), but six years earlier, and in the thirty-sixth of his reign. Greater attention to proof or copy would have prevented the statement (p. 102) that the name of that King "is in the original Persian . . . spelled Darayavalm" (Darayavush is meant), or the comparison (p. 105) of the failure of the same monarch's expedition to the "vast wastes now called Russia in Europe" with the failures, in the same regions, of Napoleon and "Charles IX."—which stands for Charles XII. of Sweden. Nor would he have called the Scythians Saccæ (pp. 84, 96), Pasargadæ "Passargadæ" (pp. 96, 97), Eran "Erâu" (p. 83), or Bactria "the Bactria" (p. 88). "The Bactria," is, of course, a translation of la Bactrie, and there are other indications that our author often relied on French texts—by the by, of pre-Assyriological times; but he does not name any of his authorities, for the following rather facetious reason, stated in the preface:

"It is scarcely worth while to present a list of them here. Those writers who are dead will not be disturbed by any departure from their opinions or any new presentation of the facts they recorded; while living authorities can see for themselves whether the author has agreed or disagreed with their conclusions."

Agriculture in Some of Its Relations with Chemistry. By F. H. Storer, Professor of Agricultural Chemistry in Harvard University. Charles Scribner's Sons. 2 vols., 12mo.

THIS interesting work is a valuable addition to the literature of agriculture. It is a revision of the author's lectures during the last sixteen years to students, young men who are preparing to engage in farming, gardening, etc., and to those who, while purposing to embark in other business, desire to fit themselves for the rational direction and management of a home in the country. It is eminently practical upon the subjects of tillage and fertilization, and it fills a gap which has been open a long time. The works of Prof. Johnson upon 'How Crops Grow' and 'How Crops Feed,' of Prof. Armsby upon 'Cattle-Feeding,' and of Prof. Stewart on 'Feeding Animals' are standard works, and now this one of Prof. Storer comes in to round out the series. The agricultural press of the country holds a most important and useful place in the instruction of those who are now in the field. Farmers who have the confidence which comes from experience and familiarity with their surroundings, can easily select from the miscellaneous matter of their periodicals and enjoy and profit by them. For the beginner, however, systematic books are better, and these very readable and authoritative volumes offer themselves to his need.

Microscopy for Beginners; or, Common Objects from the Ponds and Ditches. By Alfred C. Stokes, M.D. Small 8vo, illustrated. Harpers. 1887.

THIS is a primer for beginners with the microscope, designed to give them some fundamental ideas in regard to handling the instrument, obtaining the minute living objects which it serves to study, and identifying in a general way the commoner forms of microscopic plants and animals most available to the American microscopist. It is intended to take a place in this country which in England, France, and Germany is filled by a variety of well-written and illustrated little handbooks. It makes no pretensions on the scientific side, yet we have observed no serious slips in such matters, and our opinion, after a careful perusal, is that Dr. Stokes has done his work exceedingly well, and that the book should be heartily recommended to those for whom it was prepared. There are rude but sufficiently accurate figures of many microscopic objects most likely to be met with in collecting; references to the literature by use of which the beginner may become a student, if he desires to investigate more seriously; and plenty of convenient and useful hints on all sorts of subjects connected with the microscope and its use.

A series of such primers for the different groups of invertebrates would be very useful, and it is to be hoped may eventually appear. There is no doubt that each book of the kind would do far more to promote a general interest in field natural history than collegiate instruction in the histology of the frog and physiology of the mud-turtle will accomplish in half a century.

"The 'Young Folks' Cyclopædia' should be in every juvenile library."—From a Report of the Connecticut Board of Education.

CREATION OR EVOLUTION?

A Philosophical Inquiry.

BY GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS.

"The positions of Mr. Curtis may be briefly stated thus: 1. The facts adduced by the evolutionists are not sufficient to prove their theory, since their chain of proofs always wants some links, which they seek to supply by inference, conjecture, or the expectation that the missing parts will hereafter be discovered. 2. All the facts are consistent with the hypothesis of special creations. 3. The doctrine of special creation furnishes the simplest and most satisfactory explanation of the universe. 4. The existence and attributes of God are deducible from phenomena by the human reason irrespective of revelation."—The Tribune.

"He is never betrayed into special pleading, and even legitimate arts are ignored in his determination to reach his conclusions in a dispassionate and philosophic spirit. His calmness might easily be mistaken for apathy or indifference, until the resistless pressure of his slow-moving argument forces recognition."—The Churchman.

"Mr. Curtis has done in this work what a controversial writer rarely does—he has stated the position which he attacks as fairly and strongly as either of his famous opponents could do. The reader who reads for truth's sake, and not for the purpose of confirming his own belief or prejudices, will find the book rarely suggestive and instructive."—Boston Transcript.

"The style in which Mr. Curtis writes is so clear and so attractive, that one finds his book, especially as compared with most works on scientific subjects, positively fascinating."—The Standard, Chicago.

"He shows that the arguments of the evolutionists are flecked throughout with such conjectures, guesses, inferences from inferences, and bald assumptions, as an intelligent juryman would not listen to for a moment."—Religious Herald, Richmond.

Anne Gilchrist ;

HER LIFE AND WRITINGS.

Edited by Herbert Harlakenden Gilchrist.

Twelve illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, $6.00.

Not the least interesting part of her life is that which details her intimate friendship with Walt Whitman.

"A biography of a good and clever woman. . . . Mrs. Gilchrist knew many of the foremost literary people of her day, and their little revelations of themselves, published as a rule with sufficient discretion, help to correct some other estimates formed on other authorities. Here we find a kind, friendly, and humorous, if splenetic, Carlyle; a helpful and merry Mrs. Carlyle, and a friendly and unaffected Dante Gabriel Rossetti. These characteristics, so unlike the Carlyle of the too copious memoirs, so unlike the Mrs. Carlyle, the femme incomprise, so unlike the Rossetti of myth, are extremely welcome."—Daily News, London.

"The purchase of this first edition will be wise. It is one of those books that are sure to rise in price."—British Weekly.

"The glimpses she affords us of Carlyle are entirely pleasant."—Scottish Leader, leader.

"This memoir of 'Anne Gilchrist' is one of the most interesting books of the season."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Two Royal Lives.

Gleanings at Berlin from the Lives of their Imperial Highnesses the Crown Prince and Princess of Germany.

BY DOROTHEA ROBERTS.

With numerous Portraits and Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth, bevelled boards, gilt tops, $2.25.

"A very interesting volume. . . . A perusal of this work will prove a capital tonic to any dyspeptic democrat who has an idea that all kings and scions of royalty do is to indulge in a round of frivolous festivities and careless pleasures. . . . The reader will find in this volume an abundance of attractive and interesting information, which will do much to abate many popular prejudices, and prove that where duty is the ruling motive of action, the members of a royal family can do much to elevate a people and exalt a state."—The Nottingham Journal.

"The respectable and sometimes excellent translations of Bohn's Library have done for Literature what railroads have done for international intercourse."—R. W. Emerson.

"I may say in regard to all manner of books, Bohn's Publication Series is the usefullest thing I know."—Thomas Carlyle.

Dr. Sevier.

By GEORGE W. CABLE. A New and Cheaper Edition, uniform with 'Old Creole Days' and 'The Grandissimes.' 1 vol., 12mo, $1.25; also in Paper, 50 cts.

"Dr. Sevier deepens and broadens and lightens, with an indescribable charm over its deep study of human nature."—The Critic.

"In Mr. Cable we recognize the 'innocence of eye' which marks the true limner; the fineness of ear which catches every whisper of the forest and every intonation of the human voice; and with these the fire of real genius, which fuses all the thoughts of the artist into one living entity."—Boston Advertiser.

SECOND PART NOW READY.

The Buchholz Family.

Sketches of Berlin Life. By JULIUS STINDE. Translated from the German. In two Parts. Each 12mo, $1.25.

The second part of this already famous book is now introduced to American readers; and its pictures of social life in Berlin will be found as entertaining and amusing as those which have made the first part so popular.

"We cannot recall another work, fictitious or other, in which the middle class is viewed from the inside. The author does not, as an outsider, satirize the class he describes; he merely laughs at such follies or absurdities of individual members of it as, in life, their friends would see and smile over."—The Nation.

The Essentials of Perspective.

With numerous Illustrations drawn by the author. By L. W. MILLER, Principal of the School of Industrial Art of the Pennsylvania Museum. 1 vol., oblong 8vo, $1.50.

This book is such a manual as has long been desired for the guidance of art students and for self-instruction. The point of view throughout is that of the artist rather than the mere scientific theorist. The instructions are clearly set forth, free from all unessential or merely theoretical discussion, and the principles are vividly enforced by a large number of attractive drawings by the author, which illustrate every phase of his teachings.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

Chronicle OF THE Coach.

CHARING CROSS TO ILFRACOMBE.

By JOHN DENISON CHAMPLIN, JR. Illustrated by EDWARD L. CHICHESTER. 12mo, $1.25.

The fascinating story of the ride through suburban England, enjoyed by Andrew Carnegie, Matthew Arnold, William Black, Edwin Abbey, and others, is here delightfully told by Mr. Champlin, who was himself one of the party.

"Even Englishmen, who fancy that they know their own country well, may find here how inexhaustible are the beauties and associations of towns through which so many travellers rush by train in order to seek the more fashionable cities of the continent as quickly as possible. Whether as a guide-book to travellers along the same route, or as an amusing account of home travel, this Chronicle cannot but please."—London Academy.

FORCED ACQUAINTANCES. A Story for Girls. By Edith Robinson. $1.50.

"The tale it tells is charming; every girl will revel in it, and parents have this inducement to put it into the hands of their children—it erects such a high standard for the ordinary duties of life that the lesson it teaches is commensurate with the degree of entertainment it affords. No book for girls, women, boys, or men could do more."—Philadelphia Press.

SONS & DAUGHTERS. By the author of 'The Story of Margaret Kent.' 1 vol. 12mo, $1.50.

"The author's style is as clear-cut as an intaglio, and the story is worth a whole wilderness of that fiction which analyzes and dissects and converts life into a vast clinic."—Record.

"This novel will be found more attractive than any society novel which has been published for years. We have in mind in saying this both Mr. Howells and Mr. James. From the first chapter to the last the fascination of the story grows upon the reader, and one lays the book down with the feeling that here is a novel bright, intellectual, amusing."—Providence Journal.

AGNES SURRIAGE. By Edwin Lassetter Bynner. $1.50. A romance of Colonial Massachusetts.

"Bynner has in this romance begun a work for our lovely sea coast such as Scott did for the islands and glens of Scotland, covering them with the glamour of poetic associations."

THE BALKAN PENINSULA. Narrative of a Sojourn in Croatia, Bosnia, Servia, Roumania, Bulgaria, Roumelia, and Turkey. With a study of the peoples of these countries, their resources, and their probable future, by Emile de Laveleye, author of 'Primitive Property,' 'Elements of Political Economy,' etc., etc. Translated by Mrs. Thorpe, revised and edited for the English public by the author, with an introductory chapter upon the most recent events and a letter from Mr. Gladstone. Octavo, with Map, cloth extra, gilt top, $4.50. (Limited letter-press edition.)

"No work at once so important, so timely, and so readable as this has appeared the present season. The pivotal of European politics just now is the Balkan Peninsula; the question of questions with Austria, Russia, and Turkey, and, therefore, with the remoter nations looking on, is, what shall be done finally with Croatia and Slavonia, Bosnia and Servia, Roumania, Bulgaria, and Roumelia, that assembly of dismembered principalities on the border between Europe and Asia, essentially European and of the West, but so long ground under by the heel of Turkey?"—Literary World.

SCOTLAND AS IT WAS AND AS IT IS. By the Duke of Argyll, author of 'The Unity of Nature,' etc. With eleven Illustrations engraved on wood from designs by the author. Two volumes, octavo, cloth extra, gilt top, $8. (Limited letter-press edition.)

"In the most interesting contribution to the history of Scottish civilization—perhaps we should say, to the philosophy of Scottish history—that has been published since the conclusion of Dr. Hill Burton's history. No more eloquent book on the subject with which it deals—for, among other things, it is a contribution to the literature of the general agrarian problem—has lately appeared; none more earnest, none more transparently, almost fiercely, sincere. . . . The book, as it is, is a contribution to a burning controversy of the day, as well as to Scottish social-economical history. It would be difficult to say in which respect it is the more praiseworthy."—London Spectator.

FRANCE UNDER RICHELIEU AND MAZARIN. By James Breck Perkins. THIRD AND CHEAPER EDITION. 2 volumes, large octavo, with portraits, $4.00.

"Our pleasure in reading it has been so great that we fear only that we shall use language that seems too laudatory. . . . 'France under Richelieu and Mazarin' will introduce its author into the ranks of the first living historians of our land. He is never dry, he never lags, he is never prolix; but, from the first to the last, his narrative is recorded currente calamo, as of a man who has a firm grasp upon his materials."—New York Christian Union.

"A brilliant and fascinating period that has been skipped, slighted, or abused by the ignorance, favoritism, or prejudice of other writers is here subjected to the closest scrutiny of an apparently judicial and candid student. . . . His style is fluent, forcible, dignified, and good."—Boston Literary World.

"We have very little but praise for the work before us. The style is for the most part excellent, serious, and perspicuous in discussion and in delineation of character, animated in narration."—The Nation.

The Blueberry is a valuable fruit, and is a reliable fruit to grow in the Northern States, where the more tender varieties winter kills. It is perfectly hardy, will stand 40 degrees below zero without showing any injury to the most tender buds. Fruit ripens in this latitude about the first of July. Color, a bluish black, when fully ripened. The flavor is equal to the raspberry, a very mild, rich sub-acid, pronounced by most people delicious. The fruit is excellent for pies, or canned for winter use. It grows very stocky; the shining dark-green leaves and the blue fruit make a pleasing contrast. It seems to flourish in all soils and is a prolific bearer. One dozen plants by mail, carefully packed in oil paper, 60 cts.; two dozen by mail, $1.00; 100 by express, $2.50; 1,000, $15.00.

HOMŒOPATHY HAS 10,000 PHYSI- cians in this country, 16 colleges, 57 hospitals, 20 journals, and 36 pharmacies. Sixty-two years ago one friendless physician was its sole representative; but he, by Nature's Law and a free country, began a blood-saving revolution, and to-day the lancet, blood-bowl, and slimy leech have gone and the sick-room is no more a chamber of horrors and the visit of the physician is no longer dreaded, but welcomed. Established almost contemporaneously with Homœopathy, our pharmacy has, we believe, aided the good work by the steadfast purity and excellence of its remedies furnished physicians and the public. Not the least interesting part of her life is that which details her intimate friendship with Walt Whitman.

"A biography of a good and clever woman. . . . Mrs. Gilchrist knew many of the foremost literary people of her day, and their little revelations of themselves, published as a rule with sufficient discretion, help to correct some other estimates formed on other authorities. Here we find a kind, friendly, and humorous, if splenetic, Carlyle; a helpful and merry Mrs. Carlyle, and a friendly and unaffected Dante Gabriel Rossetti. These characteristics, so unlike the Carlyle of the too copious memoirs, so unlike the Mrs. Carlyle, the femme incomprise, so unlike the Rossetti of myth, are extremely welcome."—Daily News, London.

SCRIBNER & WELFORD, 743-745 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE May number of Scribner's Magazine contains the second instalment of the Thackeray letters, which have excited so much interest and enthusiasm among the novelist's admirers. The London Daily News says, in a long editorial entitled "Treasure Trove":

"The most charming letters that ever were printed. . . . No admirer of Thackeray—that is to say, nobody who has the faintest tincture of letters—will be content until he has read all these, a welcome pleasure after the scraps from a waste-paper basket which have been offered to the world lately."

Among the important papers in the May number are: "THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE STEAMSHIP," by Commander F. E. Chadwick, U. S. N., copiously illustrated; "FORESTS OF NORTH AMERICA," by Prof N. S. Shaler, with 13 illustrations; "AN OCEAN GRAVEYARD," by J. Macdonald Oxley, with illustrations; two delightful short stories, "MARSE ARCHIE'S FIGHT," by Maria Blunt, and "AN ISLANDER," by Margaret Crosby, and contributions by Robert Louis Stevenson, H. C. Bunner, J. S. of Dale, Arlo Bates, Philip Bourke Marston, Sarah M. B. Piatt, Susan Coolidge, and others. Readers who have not yet had Scribner's Magazine should send 25 cents to the publishers for this number. Subscription, $3.00 a year. Charles Scribner's Sons, 743 Broadway, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, APRIL 28, 1887.

The Week.

THE Springfield Republican draws attention to the agricultural industry of New England, and its relation to the Inter-State Commerce Law, showing how the Eastern farmer has been compelled to abandon one crop after another by low freights from the West and South, until agricultural land has ceased to have any value as such. It instances a rich valley in Vermont, in the town of Ludlow, where twelve farms have gone out of cultivation. One of the petitions to the last Legislature was that anybody who would occupy these farms might be exempted from taxation for a term of years. The total agricultural wealth of New England declined five per cent. in the decade 1870-80. The long and short haul clause, the Republican thinks, will have the effect, if properly enforced, to arrest this decline of agricultural prosperity in New England, and to give the Eastern farmer a chance to make a living off his land. We wonder that the state of things described by the Republican has never arrested the attention of Mr. Henry George, the Rev. Dr. McGlynn, and the other philosophers who find all the ills of society in the private ownership of land, and who would cure them by taxing land up to its full rental value. Why do they not organize a small colony by way of example, and settle on these twelve farms in Ludlow, Vermont, which have been abandoned by their grasping, blood-sucking owners? They can have the land rent free, and even if the Legislature should not exempt them from all taxation, they would have the satisfaction of knowing that they were solving for future generations the great problem of human misery.

The usefulness of the Inter-State Commerce Act as an inter-State protective tariff is recognized by the State Register of Des Moines, Ia., which publishes an article of two columns under the general heading "Stand by Our Own State," with nine sub-heads, all in the approved protectionist jargon, urging the patriotic citizens of Iowa to insist stoutly that the law be maintained in the interest of home manufacturers. Chicago, St. Louis, and New York are pointed out by the Register as the great monopolists and oppressors, whose undue facilities in shipping goods have inundated Iowa heretofore, and kept her from developing herself as a manufacturing and wholesaling State. Under the long and short-haul clause the Register looks forward to the time when "there will not be a bushel of grain or food product of any kind shipped out of the State," since it will all be wanted to feed manufacturing operatives at home. This will be the realization in Iowa of Mr. Wm. Walter Phelps's dream, but what will happen to the manufacturers of New Jersey? Where will be the market for their goods? On the other hand, we are privately informed that the Commerce Law has led to a good deal of inquiry abroad for certain grades of iron, called "softeners," that have been supplied to the Atlantic seaboard from the interior of this country at very low rates of freight. Under the long and short-haul clause these rates can no longer be given. So the Eastern manufacturer is looking to England for "softeners" to be used in general foundry work and light hardware in connection with the tougher domestic irons. We shall probably hear from the Iron and Steel Association on this subject before long.

The Prohibition campaign which has just opened in Texas, and which culminates in an election on August 4, to decide whether the Constitution shall be amended so as to forbid the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, is not only interesting in itself, but must prove in the nature of a revelation to most people at the North. The Northern idea of Texas has too often been that of a community given over to whiskey and ignorance. It is therefore a great surprise to the average reader to find that so many leading members of the dominant party, including United States Senator Reagan, are outspoken in favor of the amendment that its opponents are evidently alarmed over the danger of its adoption. The current Northern idea about the condition of education in Texas is equally at fault. A New Hampshire paper, for example, in commenting upon the large school attendance reported in Texas, remarks: "The term 'attending school' means in Texas going to school for a few days or weeks in a year, while in New England it means going the year round, with the exception of a few vacations." The truth is, as the latest reports of the Superintendents of Instruction in the two States show, that the average length of the school year in the various counties of New Hampshire is but 101 days, while in the various counties of Texas it is 110 days. Texas already has a decided sprinkling of Yankees in her population, nearly a thousand natives of Maine alone being found in the State in 1880; and the New England idea about common schools is so generally accepted that the last census showed a smaller percentage of illiteracy than in any other Southern State. It would be odd if she should also accept the Down East idea about prohibition, regarding which the suggestion of a Maine paper, the Portland Advertiser, appears quite to the point: "If the law cannot be enforced in Maine, it is difficult to see how it could be carried out any better in a State of the vast area and sparse population of Texas."

Louisiana is the latest Southern State to be attacked by the Prohibitionists, and no State stands in greater need of temperance work. Official figures which were cited at a meeting of Prohibitionists in New Orleans the other day make a most disgraceful showing. At the date of the last national census Louisiana had 939,946 inhabitants, which her moderate growth since 1880 has probably increased to a million now, while the much more rapid growth of Texas has brought her 1,591,749 of 1880 up to two millions now. Yet the last report of the Internal Revenue Bureau shows that in Louisiana 5,659 persons hold United States licenses for the liquor traffic, against only 3,292 in Texas; in other words, with half the population of Texas, Louisiana has 70 per cent. more liquor-dealers. This is only one of many illustrations of the demoralizing effects of the lottery system which Louisiana fosters, and which, of course, extends its ramifications into the liquor business. There is something really appalling about the consequences of this lottery system. A recent report indicated that illiteracy is on the increase in Louisiana, and the reason is simply because the political ring which controls the State refuses to appropriate money enough to maintain decent schools. Florida had less than one-fifth the valuation of Louisiana in 1880, and yet last year Florida expended $400,000 upon her schools, and Louisiana only $450,000. The truth is, that the State is to-day really retrograding in all that makes a community civilized. There are happily some signs that respectable people are becoming aroused to the disgrace of the situation, and there is talk in New Orleans of a determined movement to overthrow the ring, but it is firmly entrenched, with the lottery infamy actually embodied in the Constitution of the State, and the fight will be a long and hard one.

The fourth annual report of the Bureau of Labor Statistics of Illinois discusses the question of convict labor to the extent of 142 pages. The messages and public deliverances of the Hon. David B. Hill on the labor question may contain more cant to the square inch, but this report contains more square inches than all of Gov. Hill's speeches and messages together, and must be awarded the highest marking in any competitive examination in this department of scholarship. "The labor organizations do not ask that convicts be kept in idleness," say these Commissioners with all the gravity of italics. "They do ask," the report continues, "that penal institutions be so conducted as to reduce competition with free industries to a minimum." How this is to be done it is the high privilege of the Bureau of Labor Statistics of Illinois to have discovered. Their plan is to discard all existing systems, including the State-account system in so far as this involves the use of machinery, and to employ convicts on hand labor exclusively, but not such hand labor as competes with hand labor outside of the prisons. The plan is, for example, to employ a certain number of convicts in making barrels by hand exclusively, as against barrels made in part by machinery outside, and another lot in making shoes in the old-fashioned way, and so on. The advantage of this arrangement is, that when the convict has served his time out he will be a thorough workman, and not a mere manager of a machine. He will be no superficial workman. He will know all the points of a good barrel or of a good shoe. He will be in some sort a master mechanic, capable of taking the lead in his calling. Thus the penal institutions of the State will become a kind of normal school. The only objection to the plan from the standpoint of Labor would seem to be, that the prisons, by imparting a superior instruction, would furnish too much competition when the convicts have served their time out. This might be counteracted, however, by treating them as "scabs," and striking whenever any of them should get any honest employment.

The public-account system was tried in Illinois during four years 1867-71, and resulted in a loss to the State of $314,212, even with the help of machinery. This was the sum paid by honest labor to stop the clamors of Labor demagogues. Then the contract system was adopted, and the Joliet penitentiary became at once self-supporting, and has continued so to the present time. But the Legislature two years ago submitted a Constitutional amendment to the people abolishing the contract system, and the labor demagogues prevailed upon both political parties to print their tickets with affirmative votes only, instead of affirmative and negative, as the Constitution itself contemplates and requires. In this way the amendment was ratified. The existing contracts are now expiring, and it is necessary to return to the public-account system in some form. To decide upon the form, the Board of Commissioners have made this remarkable investigation and report. We commend it to the Legislature of New York as worthy of their profound study before they make any more appropriations for machinery.

The news that Consul Lewis promptly upon his arrival had liberated the poor wretches who were languishing in the prisons of Tangier under trumped-up charges preferred by protégés of the late Consul, falsely claiming to be American citizens, is very gratifying. All accounts which we had given of the loathsomeness of the dungeons, the piteous sufferings of the debtors, and the widespread deception of the usurers who claimed and obtained consular protection, have been sustained by the recent despatches. But the most gratifying piece of news is the last, which speaks of the Consul's great unpopularity. This indicates more clearly than any detailed report of reforms could indicate, how thoroughly Mr. Lewis is breaking up the infamous system which so long has disgraced the Government of Morocco and the countries whose representatives have countenanced it. This being the case, we should love him for the enemies he has made, and give him all possible support. Without this support, however courageous he may be, his efforts to abolish the abuses will prove abortive. It must be remembered that those who will be injured by the destruction of these consular collecting agencies are the powerful and wealthy, and that those who are sought to be relieved from their oppression are such feeble folk, are so downtrodden and spiritless, that no active, grateful assistance can be expected from them. The former class, we have no doubt, will spread with great assiduity stories of the Consul's over-officious zeal, and endeavor to make it appear that he is an irresponsible crank. The former Consul is, we learn, still in Tangier. He has, of course, immense "influence," and he has every motive to use it to discredit his successor, who, in exposing the iniquitous practices which he found prevailing, must needs cover him with confusion. Mr. Bayard has one clear duty to perform as respects the Tangier Consulate, and we believe that he will perform it. It is either to abolish it at once, or to sustain with all the force at his command the efforts of a strong, determined agent to cleanse it.

The practice, authorized by the Consolidation Act, of calling the heads of the various city departments together to compare views and make suggestions touching the management of city business, has never borne much fruit until now. Under Mayor Hewitt it is really resulting in the production of something like a genuine "Common Council"—that is, an assemblage of responsible men, thoroughly acquainted with the affairs of the city, and desirous, as far as human nature will permit, of promoting its welfare. An approach to this was made when it was found that the elected "legislative branch" of the city government could not be safely intrusted with the control of the taxes, and the Mayor, Comptroller, President of the Board of Taxes and Assessments, and President of the Board of Aldermen were made into "the Board of Apportionment," and intrusted with complete care of the city expenses—that is, with the duty of deciding how much city revenue should be raised over and above the fixed charges, and in what manner it should be spent. It is a curious fact that very few people outside New York know that the Board of Aldermen have absolutely nothing to do with the raising or spending of the city revenues, beyond the power of criticising, if they choose, the estimates of the Board of Apportionment. In fact, we believe a large proportion of the citizens of New York are equally ignorant of this interesting anomaly. We doubt if there is anything quite like it in any other large cities. The nearest approach to it is perhaps to be found in Paris, where the Municipal Council deal with the taxes, but the Prefect of the Department possesses an absolute veto on their votes.

It is in New York partly the result of the election of Aldermen by small districts, and partly of the subordination of municipal to State and national politics. Out of these two things what is called "the "Aldermanic business" grew up—that is, the practice of considering a place in the legislative branch simply a chance for a good worker in State or national politics to make some money in any way that offered itself. To allow such a body to raise the revenues of a great commercial capital was clearly out of the question. So, after the State Legislature was induced to relinquish the privilege of approving of the city tax levy, the work was handed over to the Board of Apportionment as at present constituted. Some of its members are elected, to be sure, but they are, as the Board of Aldermen ought always to have been, elected on a general ticket, and it is composed of men whose sense of responsibility is constantly quickened by the daily performance of very important administrative work. The Board of Apportionment undoubtedly contains the germ of what a reformed city government ought to be. The direction in which the process of evolution should go on is shown in the meetings of what is now called "the Mayor's Cabinet," composed of the various heads of departments, which are held at his office every week or so.

"A long-felt want" has been again supplied. Since the tornado became recognized as a Western institution, some insurance companies have begun to extend their business so as to cover risks of this sort, and a Burlington (Iowa) corporation some months ago offered a $200 prize for the best design for a tornado cave. No less than 121 competitors appeared, and the award has been made to Lieut. Finley of the United States Signal Service at Washington, who is considered the leading "tornado sharp" in the country. The Burlington Hawkeye publishes sketches of the cave from various points of view, with estimates of its cost, which vary from $154 to $345, according as it is to be used independently of any building or is connected with a house having a cellar. The Hawkeye also publishes seventeen "hints" as to the location, construction, and equipment of a tornado cave, like the suggestion that "during the season when tornadoes are most likely to occur, the cave should be provided with all things necessary to place it in readiness for occupation at any moment of the night or day." A glance at the pictures and text of the article gives one a vivid idea of the perils of life in what may be called the tornado zone.

The "vestibule train" brought out by the Pullman Company is a remarkable advance in the appliances of railway travel, but its chief merit is not in the soft seats and beds, nor in the plush upholstery, the mirror-like woodwork, the library, the barber's room, nor even in the vestibule feature, which gives to a whole train the appearance of a suite of apartments having no connection with the outside world. These features merely carry pre-existing art to a little higher range, but do not essentially change it. The chief value of the improvement consists in the practical consolidation of the whole train into one piece, so that, when no separation of the several cars is necessary, they shall move as a single elongated car, and so that when any separation is necessary, as in going around short curves, there shall be no more than is necessary and the whole shall come together again automatically. This is accomplished by extending the principle of the tight platform to the whole front of the car, including the roof, by means of a steel plate in the shape of an ox-bow, backed by steel springs. The steel plate serves also as a further and effectual preventive of "telescoping" in case of collision. Indeed, it is impossible that one of these cars should be telescoped by any blow short of annihilation. The joining together of all the cars as one piece of course minimizes the lateral motion of each car by distributing it along the whole train.

The Irish "outrages" are playing precisely the same part in British politics to day which the Southern outrages for some years played in American politics. They furnish precisely the same kind of reason for keeping the Tories in power which the Southern outrages used to furnish for keeping the Republicans in power. What the Tories have done or can or will do to prevent outrages in Ireland, does not appear, any more than what the Republicans did or could do to prevent outrages at the South. The Tories, therefore, ask to be kept in power as a sign that Englishmen abhor outrages, just as the Republicans asked to be kept in power as a sign that the Northern people abhorred outrages. The air in England is full, too, of terrible stories of what the Irish would do if they were let alone, in the way of plots against the empire, and schemes for the persecution of minorities, just as the air here used to be full of stories about the capers the ex-rebels would cut if the Republican party went out of power. Moreover, a large portion of the Irish outrages are reported in the form of "anecdotes," as Mr. Gladstone said, instead of statistics, just as the Southern outrages here were largely "stories" sent to the newspapers. In England, too, the names of the victims of the outrages and of the localities in which they occurred are frequently withheld in order to prevent fresh and more dreadful cruelties. In like manner, the names of the authors of the Southern "stories" were withheld, lest they should be made to suffer for blabbing. In both cases undoubtedly there were and are outrages, but if outrages once get into party politics, it is folly to prefer one party over another on account of them. If it once be made clearly to appear that capital can be made out of them, the supply becomes unlimited, and any attempt to distinguish the real from the sham becomes useless. In one of the recent debates in the House of Commons no less a person than the Irish Attorney-General, by way of showing the timidity or unfairness of Irish juries, told of one jury's acquitting a "moonlighter" on the spot, though he offered no evidence in his defence. It turned out on inquiry that the judge had directed an acquittal, owing to the nothingness of the case for the prosecution, without calling on the prisoner's counsel to produce his witnesses.

Some twenty years ago England was thrown into a state of agitation by a discussion started by Prof. Jevons regarding the probable duration of her coal supply. All the existing surveys of the coal measures were overhauled, the opinions of all the geologists were collected, and the most careful estimates of the present rate of consumption and the annual increment of consumption collated. As is usual in cases where the data are largely conjectural, the conclusions reached were widely variant, some authorities putting the duration of the effective coal supply as low as 250 years, and others as high as 800 years. By effective supply was meant such a supply as would preserve to England her superiority as a manufacturing and commercial power. Many remedies for the apprehended exhaustion of coal were suggested, such as greater economy in its use, the prohibition of exportation, the employment of tidal power, etc. Mr. Gladstone made the wise suggestion that whether the duration of the coal supply should be greater or less, and whether any substitute for coal should be discovered or not, the period of its duration should be employed as far as possible in paying off the national debt. He was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he carried his idea into effect. The revival of the sinking fund was due chiefly to his influence. It was to be expected, therefore, that when Mr. Goschen's budget proposed to reduce the sinking fund from £7,000,000 to £5,000,000 in order to save the payers of the income tax a penny in the pound, Mr. Gladstone would oppose it. The speech which he made in the House of Commons on Monday seems to have been tentative, rather a warning against an erroneous policy than an attack on the Government. If Mr. Goschen persists in his plan, as he probably will, we may look for an important debate, in which Mr. Gladstone's unrivalled abilities as a financier will show to the best advantage.

The obscurity which has surrounded the origin of the British quarrel with the Republic of Hayti is not surprising when one sees the facts. It appears that in 1870 an English widow named Maunders got a concession from the Haytian Government, permitting her to exploit the valuable forests of a small island, called Tortoise Island, in return for a fixed rent. She exploited the forests successfully enough, but she never paid her rent, and was accordingly sued for it before the Haytian courts, and her concession withdrawn. She thereupon fled to Jamaica, and claimed damages through her own Government to the amount of $710,000, and the British Minister backed up her claim, and, it is said, has even threatened to seize the island as security. The Haytians produced a provision of the Maunders contract that, in case of dispute, recourse should be had to arbitration, and on this proposed to refer the matter to the French Court of Cassation. On this offer being declined, they offered to leave it to President Grévy, but Mrs. Maunders rejected this also. The negotiations have thus far been in the hands of the Minister, Mr. Clement Hill, but it is not believed that the home Government will support his pretensions to the full extent. It would be a monstrous violation of international usage to give the Widow Maunders the use of the British Navy to enable her to resist the decree of the courts of a friendly, even if insignificant, power.

The French Republic grows wiser as she advances in years, and more moderate in her international temper as she gains in strength. At no time since the peace of 1871 had France less reason to be afraid of Germany than now—such is the relative condition of her army and armaments—and at no time has she exhibited such calmness of demeanor on provocation as she shows now at the insult offered to her feelings and dignity in the Schnaebelé affair. The Government acts with prudence, the press, with few exceptions, advises coolness, and the people follow the advice. It will probably turn out that Bismarck intended neither to provoke war nor to wound the honor of the Republic—in order to revenge the affront suffered at the late elections in Alsace-Lorraine—and that there was no breach of international propriety either; and everybody will be the gainer by tranquilly waiting for diplomatic explanations, which ill-tempered demonstrations would have either prevented or rendered less satisfactory. On many occasions the German Chancellor has proved that he can act like a lion at the beginning of an imbroglio, and like a lamb at the end of it. The Carolinas affair is a striking instance. It does not always clearly appear, even when everything is quieted down, what the terrifying roar was intended for, but the nations, and among them France, have learned that it is more often a harmless reminder of lordly power than an expression of a desire for fresh prey. It is, in fact, time that the notion to which Prince Meshtcherski, in his Grazhdanin, lately gave such loud utterance, that Bismarck is a kind of bloodthirsty Attila or Timour, ready to devour nation after nation, was given up completely. Sixteen years have elapsed since the Treaty of Frankfort ended Germany's grapple with France, and many have been the complications in European affairs, but in none of them has Bismarck sacrificed "a single Pomeranian grenadier." And he has in the meanwhile reached the age of seventy-two, an age at which even warriors think fondly of living and dying in peace.

The organ of the Mexican Government has spoken at last on the absorbing question of re-election, but in such tones as not to relieve at all the strain and uncertainty of the political situation. The Opposition papers have for weeks been vehemently interrogating the Diario, though without drawing its fire. They have now succeeded, however, and the result is to leave the Diario in a mortifying position. It loftily replied to that part of the press which charged Gen. Diaz with a lack of frankness in not having referred to the matter of the Presidential succession in his recent message, by saying that the whole affair was in the hands of Congress, and that it would not be dignified for the President to express himself upon it. To which the opposition journals have retorted, in the first place, by pointing to the action of President Blanco of Venezuela, who recently repudiated a movement to amend the Constitution of his country so as to give him a second term; and further, and triumphantly, by adducing the action and words of Diaz himself in 1879. In that year the Legislature of the State of Morelos proposed the same constitutional amendment which is now urged, and the President, in his message to the Congress of the time, explicitly denounced the project, and furthermore said, in so many words: "I solemnly declare that I will never be a candidate for reëlection, even if this were not forbidden by our Constitution, since I will always be a champion of the principles upon which the revolution of Tuxtepec [his own revolution of '76] was based." In a country where Talleyrand was not the great political oracle that he is in Mexico, the unearthing of this utterance of Gen. Diaz would put an end to the whole question; it has not done so there, however, nor will it do so. Nor is the matter settled by Gen. Diaz's declaration on Saturday that he is not a candidate for another term.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, April 20, to TUESDAY, April 26, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

THE President on April 21 appointed Edward F. Bingham of Ohio to be Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in place of the late Chief-Justice Carter. Judge Bingham has for fifteen years been Judge of the Court of Common Pleas for the Columbus District, and in 1881 was the Democratic candidate for Supreme Court Judge of the State.

There has been much talk in political circles for a week about the probability of President Cleveland's renomination. Mr. George William Curtis said in an interview published in the Evening Post on April 22: "There is no doubt that Mr. Cleveland is a great deal more popular now than he was in 1884. The only chance of salvation for the Democratic party is to nominate him. Unless they do so, I think their chances will be nil."

The Inter State Commerce Commission on April 22 made an order suspending the long and short-haul section of the law for seventy-five days, subject to revocation, and with a proviso that intermediate rates shall not be raised above those in force on April 20, for the benefit of the Northern Pacific, Southern Pacific, Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé, and St. Louis and San Francisco Railway lines. The monotony of the early petitions for the suspension of this clause was broken on the same day by the receipt of petitions from manufacturers in San Francisco asking for the enforcement of the whole law. The Commissioners on April 25 left Washington to hold sessions in the chief Southern cities.

The Prohibition campaign in Texas is so earnestly conducted that the National Protective Association of Distillers and Wholesale Liquor-Dealers have thought it worth their attention. At a meeting of the Association at Cincinnati on April 21, it is reported a large sum of money was raised to aid the anti-Prohibitionists.

The Chickasaw Indians have had a claim against the United States for more than $600,000 with interest for improper disbursements of Cnickasaw funds held in trust by the United States. The case arose from the transfer of the tribe in 1837 and succeeding years from Mississippi to the Indian Territory, and involved a decision upon the legality, under treaty stipulations, of payments made in aid of the emigration. The Court of Claims decided April 25 that the Indians should have credit on their accounts for the sum of $240,168.58.

A plan has been formed by prominent citizens of St. Paul, Minn., to celebrate on July 4 the centennial of the passage of the Ordinance of 1787 organizing the territory northwest of the Ohio River. The intention is to invite, among other distinguished people, the Governors of all the States included in the original Northwest Territory.

A bill has passed the New York Legislature to permit Hong Yen Chang, a Chinaman, to be admitted to the bar.

The trial of Jacob Sharp, against whom twenty-one indictments have been brought for giving bribes to the New York Aldermen of 1884 to grant the franchise for the Broadway Railroad, has been set for May 11.

James H. Hamlin and Henry Heintzerting, judges at the last election in Baltimore, have been found guilty of permitting fraudulent ballots to be put in the box, and of certifying before the Grand Jury that the election was conducted legally.

A letter, which is considered genuine in Chicago, has been received there from Rudolph Schnaubelt, the Anarchist, who, it is thought, threw the bomb at the Haymarket massacre of policemen. It is dated "Christiania, Norway, March, 1887." It is supposed that he reached Norway by way of China.

The Red International Association, a Socialistic organization of the West, has caused it to be announced through one of its organs that it will instigate a "general uprising" in 1889 to seize the Government of the United States and to establish society on a Socialistic basis.

The familiar tactics of the labor organizations have again been pronounced unconstitutional, this time by the Supreme Court of Vermont. A decision was handed down April 26, in the case of the Ryegate stonecutters' conspiracy, growing out of the attempt of the workmen to prevent the employment of other workmen and to deter them from working by denouncing them as "scabs" and threatening to make them publicly odious as such, that a conspiracy among workmen to prevent others from working or being hired is a crime at common law, and punishable under the statutes of the State.

This year's edition of 'Rowell's Newspaper Directory' shows that the number of papers published in the United States, Territories (including Alaska), and Canada is 15,420, an increase of 581 in one year. In Kansas the increase in number is 89, in Nebraska 64, in Pennsylvania 35, in Ohio 30. Pennsylvania shows the largest increase in dailies, 17; Kansas in weeklies, 81; and New York in monthlies, 42. Seven States show a decrease, the most prominent instances being New Hampshire and Virginia, 6 each.

Two women, sisters, have been arrested in this city for making counterfeit silver dollars. They were not assisted in the work by any male accomplices.

Miss Mary Garrett of Baltimore, the only daughter of the late John W. Garrett, has offered to give the Johns Hopkins University permanently the annual sum of $35,000 to sustain a scientific school, if, according to her father's wishes, the institution be removed to Clifton, the country seat of the founder, the late Johns Hopkins.

A year ago the firm of Norton Brothers of Chicago adopted a profit-sharing system with their employees who should work at least six months, and should not go out of their employment without the firm's consent, and should not be dismissed for good cause. On April 21 the firm divided $13,275 among the 250 employees, every one receiving nearly 7¾ per cent. on his earnings. John Mundell & Co., manufacturers of shoes in Philadelphia, who employ about 500 persons, are maturing a somewhat similar plan.

Queen Kapiolani of the Hawaiian Kingdom arrived with her suite at San Francisco April 20, on her way to London, to be present at Queen Victoria's jubilee celebration in June. The royal party will visit Washington, and, before returning to Honolulu, they will see the principal cities of the world. Simultaneously Prince Leopold of Prussia and Prince Louis Esterhazy of Austria were in San Francisco, having arrived from Asia on their tour around the world.

A statue of John C. Calhoun was unveiled at Charleston, S. C., April 26, with impressive ceremonies. Secretary Lamar delivered an oration.

The Logan memorial fund, raised by private subscriptions, to be given to Mrs. John A. Logan, amounts to nearly $63,000, and the custodian has prepared a report to the subscribers.

Services in memory of the late ex-President Arthur were conducted in the Capitol at Albany April 20. Ex-Attorney-General Brewster and Mr. Chauncey M. Depew delivered orations.

Lieut. John W. Danenhower of the navy committed suicide, in a period of despondency, at Annapolis April 20. It was he who was in command of the whaleboat which contained the only part of the crew of the Jeannette that survived the Arctic expedition under Commander De Long. James H. Marr, chief clerk to the First Assistant Postmaster-General, died April 25. He had served nearly fifty-six years continuously in the Post-office Department. He entered it during the Administration of President Jackson, and had served under twenty-six Postmasters-General. In 1881 Congress increased the salary of his office $500 per annum during his incumbency.

FOREIGN.

Mr. Goschen, Chancellor of the British Exchequer, introduced the budget in the House of Commons on April 21. Last year the revenues of the Government amounted to about £90,000,000, and the expenses to nearly the same sum. There has been a saving of £263,000 in the army estimates, and of £347,000 in the estimates for the civil service. The revenue from taxes on alcoholic liquors had decreased £190,000, that from the beer tax had increased £45,000, that from the wine taxes had fallen off £93,000, and that from the tax on tea had largely increased. Sir William Harcourt had estimated that the surplus for the year would be £259,000, while it really reached £776,000. The budget estimates the revenue for the coming year at £91,155,000, and the expenditures at £90,180,000. It is proposed to raise £100,000 by charging 10s. transfer duty on each 100 debentures of stock, which has hitherto almost escaped duty. To clear the budget of local loans, it is intended to cancel £37,000,000 of other portions of the public debt and create the same amount of local loan stock, charging the local loan budget with an annuity of £100,000. It is also proposed to take 1d. per £1 off the income tax, and 4d. per £1 off the tobacco tax, and to reduce the taxation on marine policies. Many of the proposals in the budget, notably those relating to national-debt charges, will be vigorously opposed in the House of Commons.

On the 26th Mr. Gladstone criticised the budget, contending that its main proposals were at variance with sound financial principles. The proposals to change stamp duties would facilitate business upon local loans. He would give no unfavorable opinion, except to say that the concurrent creation of new per cent. stock would be a great disadvantage. Regarding the tobacco duty, it was easier to reduce it than to get rid of it. The manufacturers of tobacco would certainly be benefited, but the reduction would never reach the consumer. The reduction of the income tax was against sound financial principles, because such a reduction should arise from a rigid system of public economy, not at the expense of the sinking fund. The House had been asked to reduce the fund from £7,000,000 to £5,000,000. Serious reflection could not warrant a proceeding so opposed to the traditions, so contrary to the interests of the British nation. Lord Randolph Churchill also criticised the budget, and Mr. Goschen defended it.

Mr. Gladstone has written that he attaches very high value to the manifestations of American sympathy with the Irish people in the crisis created by the causeless, insulting, and insidious bill at present before Parliament, and has asked that an endeavor be made to present some estimate of the aggregate numbers of persons by whom recent meetings in America to express sympathy with Ireland have been attended, and especially an estimate of the numbers of Governors, Mayors, Senators, Representatives, clergymen, and other official or highly responsible persons by whom such meetings have been countenanced. Mr. Fitzgerald, the President of the American Branch of the Land League, is making an effort to collect this information.

Continued expressions have been reported daily of the popular disapproval in the United Kingdom of the Coercion Bill, and many of the leaders of both parties have found occasions for more speeches. Lord Salisbury, in an address before the Primrose League on the sixth anniversary of the death of the Earl of Beaconsfield, said the hollow agitation carried on during the Easter holidays by the Opposition had failed, and that the Government's cause was the country's. Mr. Gladstone's imagination deceived him when he attempted to prove that his party's prospects were very bright. He criticised the Liberals for association with men with blood-stained hands and for dependence on murderous organizations. Mr. John Morley, addressing an audience at Wolverhampton, declared that no other great leader than Gladstone had ever launched a great issue or fought for a great cause with a spirit so entirely forgetful of its own personality, and so entirely shutting out the mean and ignoble considerations which seemed to affect ignoble minds. Sir William Harcourt, in a speech at East London, endorsed Earl Spencer's recent assertion that there was no evidence which showed that the Parnellites had ever associated with criminals. He said that, in view of Mr. Parnell's denial of the accusations made against him, it remained for his accusers to substantiate their charges. Mr. Gladstone has written that he does not desire a general election to Parliament until the English mind is as ripe on the Irish question as the Welsh and Scotch minds are, but that time is rapidly advancing. "Anyhow," he says, "I am prepared to face anything to defeat coercion. I continue to hope for much from vigorous action on the part of the constituencies whose representatives in Parliament have the decisive votes on the issue."

Of the 203 amendments to the Crimes Bill, the Parnellites have contributed 88, Gladstonians 69, Conservatives 38, and Unionists 8. It is thought that 100 more amendments will be added before the final vote on the bill is taken.

John Bright, advocating a continuance of free trade in England, has written a letter in which he says that the reason other nations maintain high tariffs is, that those who are protected are an organized army, while the consumers are merely a mob. The United States, under a system of protection, he declares, are burdened with a large surplus revenue, yet refuse to lessen duties, thus promoting a system of corruption unequalled in any other country.

It was published in London on April 20 that Lord Salisbury had offered to the United States Government to revert to the fishery clauses of the Washington Treaty without compensation. No statement concerning such a despatch has been made by Secretary Bayard. The London Times's comment is that the offer is "generous, almost Quixotic." "To do more," it says, "would be weakness."

A "multicycle" for military use has been invented and constructed, and is soon to be tested at Aldershot, England. It is a vehicle, shaped like a long racing boat, on which a dozen soldiers can sit in single file and propel it at the rate of sixteen miles an hour, and can draw eight baggage wagons after them. It is steered by one man, will travel over rough roads, and turns in less space than an ordinary hansom. It is an English invention and is not to be offered abroad.

The English racing cutter Thistle, which is to come to America to compete for the America's cup, was launched April 26 on the Clyde.

The Government's Ecclesiastical Bill, having passed the Upper House of the Prussian Diet, was the subject of a warm debate in the Lower House. National-Liberal leaders spoke against it, and on the 21st Prince Bismarck spoke in favor of it for more than an hour, declaring that the bill must be accepted in the shape in which it passed the Upper House, as had been agreed upon between Prussia and the Vatican, because peace with the Church was desirable both for internal and external reasons. In conclusion he said that if the bill was not accepted unchanged, he must resign, so far as his authority in Prussia was concerned. The bill passed the Lower House April 26, on the second reading, in the form in which the Upper House approved it. The German Government has introduced a bill in the Reichstag for a loan of 172,000,000 marks for the completion of the army equipment.

The Volks-Zeitung (Berlin) brought an action for libel against Prince Bismarck for an attack upon that paper made by him in a speech in the Reichstag, and the court has decided that it has no jurisdiction in the matter, as the Prince, being a German general, is amenable only to a military tribunal.

An official report on German emigration presented to the Reichstag shows that the number of emigrants from Germany who passed through Hamburg, Bremen, and Stettin during the year 1886 was 66,671, a decrease of 22,000 from the previous year. The emigration from Austria-Hungary, Russia, Sweden, and Norway through the same ports in 1886 was largely in excess of that of 1885. Most of the German emigrants were from the farming districts of Prussia.

Many Polish peasants, possessors of small estates, are emigrating from Posen and western Prussia to the United States; and a movement to America of Fins is reported.

It was reported from Rome by way of London on April 21 that the Vatican is renewing its efforts to induce the Rev. Dr. McGlynn of New York to go to Rome, and that the Pope's decision of the controversy about the Church's attitude to the Knights of Labor has displeased many of the reactionary Cardinals, who have signed a remonstrance addressed to the Holy See, maintaining that the Knights' organization contains all the elements of Socialism, and that the case ought to be reconsidered. The Pope has ordered the Catholic press to avoid discussion of the matter.

In the Italian Chamber of Deputies April 25 Gen. Viale, Minister of War, on the passage of the bill calling out 17,000 reserves for active service, announced that fresh reinforcements were required for the Massowah garrison. It is stated that 32,000,000 francs will be required to meet the extra military expenditures.

On April 21 a French commissary named Schnaebelé, who was stationed at Pagny-sur-Moselle, was arrested by German police and imprisoned at Metz. This incident has ever since been the absorbing topic of discusston in Europe, and the French and German Governments are conducting correspondence, and their Ministers are holding conferences about it. Cabinet councils have been held at both capitals. On April 26 a long despatch was received at Paris from M. Herbette, the French Ambassador at Berlin, describing an interview he had had with Count Herbert Bismarck, the German Foreign Minister, and it was reported that the German Minister of Justice for Alsace-Lorraine had been instructed to make an entirely fresh investigation of the affair. The circumstances of the arrest have not yet been made entirely clear. Schnaebelé was probably arrested on German soil; but it is asserted and denied both that he was decoyed and that he was a spy. The German Government expects to prove that he was arrested on German ground, and that he is guilty of complicity in a system of espionage of anti-German agitation. A rumor has gained circulation that Bismarck expects to implicate Gen. Boulanger in Schnaebelé's treason. While the incident has not yet really made war imminent, the situation is sufficiently serious for the Pope to have offered his mediation and for the French newspapers to be congratulating France that 200,000 men are under arms. The stock markets, especially at Paris, have been depressed. The latest report is that, if an arbitrator has to be chosen, France will prefer the King of the Belgians.

Victor Hugo's will, which has just been admitted to probate, shows that he had property in England valued at £92,000. His daughter and grandchildren are the sole heirs. An annuity of £400 is left to the widow of his son Charles.

The Russian Government has prevented Russian admirers of Gen. Boulanger from sending him a sword of honor, because such an act would create erroneous impressions in regard to Russia's foreign policy.

Reports of the discovery of more Nihilistic plots come from Russia. A chorister in the Military Academy church at St. Petersburg committed suicide April 21, and his house was discovered to be a Nihilist rendezvous. A quantity of dynamite, arms, and revolutionary documents were found. The Czar has given up his plan of staying several weeks in St. Petersburg, and has returned to Gatchina, because, it is said, of the arrests of a number of persons who had taken positions along one of the thoroughfares to kill him.

Russia has issued a 4 per cent. internal loan amounting to 100,000,000 rubles at 84 per cent. The Government will accept the bonds at their face value as security from contractors employed on public works.

A fresh pro-Russian conspiracy has been discovered at Sofia. Several men who formerly were officers in the Bulgarian Army have been arrested for participation in it.

Emperor Francis Joseph has written a letter to Archduke Albrecht congratulating him upon the sixtieth anniversary of his entry into the Austrian Army. Numerous fêtes and receptions have been given in his honor.

Two Englishmen displaying the American flag recently imprisoned a Hebrew merchant of Alcazar, Morocco, for debt. They took him in chains to Tangier, parading him through three towns on the way. The outrage was aggravated by the fact that it was inflicted during the period of the Passover. The principal Hebrews of Tangier have joined in an appeal to the French, Portuguese, and British Consuls for assistance in an attempt to have all the governments unite in an effort to suppress the system of consular abuses under which these outrages are perpetrated.

Advices from Stanley, dated March 25, have been received from Matadi, on the Congo River. When his expedition reached Boma, the seat of the general administration of the Congo Free State, a cordial reception was given to it. Mr. Stanley was confident of the success of his enterprise, and hoped that by June he should be able to render effectual assistance to Emin Bey by surprising the enemies that hedge him. The English and French mission stations of the Upper Congo have been asked to place their two steamers at his service. The appointment of Tippu Tib to the Governorship of Stanley Falls is regarded as a master stroke of Mr. Stanley's.

The conference of representatives of the five Central American States which recently met in Guatemala drew up a comprehensive plan to further the establishment of a permanent confederation, and to "provide for their final fusion into one country." The agreement provides that differences between any two of the States shall be decided by arbitration. All the republics bind themselves to respect the independence of every one of them, and to prohibit the preparation in any one of armed expeditions against any other. Citizens of any State shall enjoy similar privileges and rights throughout them all. The constitutions of the States which do not contain this proviso are to be amended. An international Congress is to assemble every two years, and the Congress which shall convene in 1890 is empowered to perfect the confederation, if present obstacles shall be removed.

The Mexican Chamber of Deputies has passed the bill to amend the Constitution which makes the President ineligible for two successive terms. This is interpreted as a preparation for the reëlection of President Diaz, in spite of his assertion that he is not seeking a renomination.

The Canadian Department of Agriculture reports that the tide of immigration to Manitoba and the Northwest promises to be unprecedented this spring and summer, especially from England.

Resolutions against the Coercion Bill were passed in the Canadian House of Commons April 26 by a vote of 135 to 47.

THE ONE THING NEEDFUL.

EVERYBODY who pays any attention to such Democratic expressions of opinion as come from representative newspapers and politicians all over the country, knows very well that the talk of President Cleveland's not being renominated is simply what Beaconsfield called "the harebrained chatter of irresponsible frivolity." The two Democratic newspapers which have been foremost in disputing his claim on the party for a second term, the New York Sun and the Louisville Courier-Journal, do not, as far as we have been able to observe, exert the smallest influence on any serious subject on the opinions of any rational human being. Lovers of small fun read the political articles of the one; lovers of blatherskite read the political articles of the other; but party nominations are neither made nor hindered by the funny people or the blatherskites. With all the sober-minded men of the party Mr. Cleveland's renomination is a foregone conclusion, for two reasons. One is, as we pointed out some weeks ago, that the arguments against renominating him cannot be revealed. They are arguments which politicians whisper to each other in hotel corridors, or communicate to reporters, on condition that their names are not to be mentioned. But they are not arguments which sober-minded newspapers can embody in articles, or sober-minded orators produce on the stump.

The other reason, and the greatest one of all—the reason, in fact, which includes or swallows up all others—is that Mr. Cleveland is the only candidate the Democratic party has got. This fact, of course, did not come out prominently until the chatter about rejecting him began. Then, when those who were disposed to consider the possibility of doing without him began to look about for a substitute, they were appalled by finding that they were looking into an aching void. The party, they saw, has got to take Cleveland once more—first, because it has nobody else, and, secondly, because he is the only man it can possibly elect. All the Democratic newspapers which are worth considering, as we have said, acknowledge this. All the leading Democratic politicians recognize it. Everybody of note in the party is making haste to repudiate or contradict all stories connecting him in any manner with arguments against Mr. Cleveland's renomination, or reports that for any reason whatever, including his refusal, he would not be renominated.

If all this be true, and we do not believe it can be successfully gainsaid, the activity displayed by some of his subordinates in getting ready for the nominating convention, by making and filling vacancies in the public service, shoving Republicans out without cause, and shoving Democrats in, making bargains and promises, and dickering and dealing about offices, becomes perfectly incomprehensible. This sort of work enables managers to control conventions, we admit, but the day has gone by when it enabled them to control elections, for the simple reason that no nomination on either side is nowadays sufficient to carry with certainty the full party vote. We venture to assert that it is in the States in which the President has permitted most of this dickering and dealing, that he would be to-day weakest at the polls, however faithful to him the delegations from these States might be in the Convention. Nay, we will go further, and say that the only thing which to-day would put his chances in peril at the polls in any State carried by him in 1884, are those departures from the programme traced in his letter to the National Reform League, which some of his followers have made in the insane delusion that they would thereby "strengthen the party"—as if the party had or could gain strength from any source except the promise of improved administration which it was able to make to the country by and through Mr. Cleveland. In short, it is the election and not the renomination which all true friends, both of the President and of the Democratic party, now need to look to.

If it be asked what the things are which will make for his reëlection, we answer that they are the very things which have made his renomination inevitable, namely, the good he has done and the enemies he has made. When one considers the hold on the intelligent and industrious voters which such acts as the rescue of the New York Post office from politics, the veto of the Pension Bill, the appointment of Mr. Fairchild to the Treasury, and, above all, the manner in which he has filled the Inter-State Commerce Commission, have given him—when one considers the weight which such acts have as arguments with everybody in the United States who labors and saves, loves his country and desires to see the Government in safe hands—one is amazed at the want of confidence indicated by the license or encouragement given to the trumpery activity of the office-brokers, every one of whose tricks alienates probably fifty voters for the one drone whom it placates, or for whom it provides a livelihood.

THE KNIGHTS AND THE TRADES.

THE process of reducing the Order of Knights of Labor to an absurdity goes on slowly but very surely. Almost every day now produces some incident illustrating the impracticability and folly of trying to give the whole community a voice in settling the affairs of each individual. This is really what the organization aims at. It proposes to make up boards or assemblies composed of men of all callings except bankers, brokers, gamblers, and liquor-dealers, and give them the right to meddle in the private concerns of everybody within a certain district who lives by wages. The result, thus far, has been that we have seen a cigarmaker from Albany telling silk-weavers in New Jersey when to quit work; bookbinders and hackmen and coopers meddling in the disputes of coal-heavers and 'longshoremen and freight-handlers; and 'longshoremen, freight-handlers, and coal-heavers trying to get stationary engineers to leave their work.

We are witnessing probably the most curious illustration of all this in the case of the silver-chasers who are now locked out. These men follow a trade which is on the very verge of art, if it be not really art itself. They are and have to be a highly intelligent body of men. Some of them receive as much as $50 a week, or in other words, much more than most clergymen, or professors, or lawyers, or doctors, or clerks. It appears that a large proportion of them have joined the Knights of Labor. Now, what do they gain by this? Simply the right to take a hand in managing the business of handicraftsmen of a much lower grade, about which they know absolutely nothing. And what do they concede in exchange for it? Neither more nor less than the right of 'longshoremen, hackmen, car-drivers, and coal-heavers to decide how the business of chasing silver should be conducted and paid. And what is the origin of this extraordinary arrangement? Simply a curious delusion, largely circulated by the aid of dreamy social speculators, that the men who work with their hands have interests separate from and even opposed to the rest of the community, and can make themselves rich and happy by uniting to wage war on everybody who works with his head, or has saved money and is living on it; and that the capitalists have somewhere a vast treasure which, if the manual laborers could get hold of the Government, would be distributed in annual dividends, that would give everybody abundance of leisure and lots of fun.

The complaint of the employers in the case of the silver-chasers is two-fold: first, that the men deny their right to decide how many apprentices they shall keep, although it is not maintained that the number has been so great as to deprive any skilled workmen of full work. The trouble about apprentices has mainly arisen out of the charge that they were used to do work which would otherwise have to be done by a journeyman. In the case of the chasers it is acknowledged that there are not enough competent men to do the work which offers itself. Consequently the objection to apprentices in this case is simply due to the old-fashioned desire to keep down the number of persons in the trade, or, in other words, to make silver-chasing as much of a monopoly as possible. All the skilled trades, we believe, share in this feeling. They therefore seek to deny to all but a very small number of youths the privilege of learning their art. We have read and heard a great many expositions of the views of "Labor" on the constitution of society, but we have never come across a defence of this denial which was anything more than an expression of selfishness in its most brutal form. To say that a youth shall not learn one of the arts of civilization simply because he would become a competitor of those who already practise it, is tyranny of the coarsest kind. The nearest approach to it the modern world has seen is the denial to the slaves at the South of the privilege of learning to read. We can understand and sympathize with the desire to exact the very highest tests of skill and proficiency from any one seeking to enter a trade, no matter how difficult the entrance to it might thus be made; but to refuse to allow a young man to acquire the skill and proficiency if he can, is the act of a barbarian. Any man, whether employer or not, who prescribes, encourages, or connives at such a prohibition is, so far, an enemy of civi-zation, and, we may add, no friend of his fellow-men.

The second complaint of the employers of the silver-chasers is, that they found that District Assembly 49, or, in other words, the hackmen and coal-heavers and car-drivers, were being called in to decide how the business of silver-chasing should be carried on. This is, on its face, a condition to which no rational man could submit a large capital such as most dealers in silverware are obliged to possess. The great objection to such an arrangement is that it is not a human arrangement—that is, it is totally opposed to the plans and principles by which the affairs of sane men in all callings have been successfully conducted since the dawn of civilization. If men had always acted on this plan to the fullest extent, we never should have had any civilization at all, and in so far as they have acted on it civilization has been retarded.

Mr. Alexander, the Secretary of the Executive Board of Brass and Silver-Workers, has written a letter to the Times, for the most part very temperate, in which he complains of the employers' locking out all the silver-chasers as a "boycott." If he will change his point of view very slightly, we think he will see that what the employers have done is simply to retire from the silver-chasing business until they see their way to carrying it on on what they consider favorable conditions. They are no more bound to carry it on under any and all conditions than the silver-chasers are to continue in it. The trouble with those who organize sympathetic strikes is, that they do not recognize in other men the right they claim for themselves, to suspend their industry on general considerations. No capitalist is bound to go into or stay in any business, in any country, under circumstances which he thinks would put it in danger or make it unprofitable. What Labor needs of all things to learn in this country is the timidity and fugaciousness of capital.

AN AMERICAN APPLICATION OF ENGLISH ELECTION METHODS.

A VERY interesting bill is pending in the Michigan Legislature, which is notable as the first attempt that has been made to apply some of the principles of the English election laws to our system of balloting. It is properly entitled a "bill to preserve the purity of elections and guard against abuses of the elective franchise." The first section makes the provision which is the foundation of all reform in this direction, namely, that "all ballots hereafter voted at any election in the State of Michigan, held in any incorporated city thereof containing over 10,000 inhabitants, shall be printed by the State." The ballots are to be of three different colors. Constitutional amendments and candidates for Presidential electors and State officers are to be voted for upon a white ballot. Candidates for Congress, circuit judge, probate judge, sheriff, county clerk, county treasurer, prosecuting attorney, and a few other offices, mainly county, are to be voted for upon a blue ballot. Candidates for the Legislature and city and ward offices are to be voted for upon a red ballot. The white ballots are to be printed by the Secretary of State and bound in blocks of 400 ballots each, the expense to be defrayed from the State Treasury. The blue ballots are to be printed and bound in the same way by the county clerk, and the expense defrayed from the county treasury. The red ballots are to be printed and bound in the same way by the city clerk, and the expense defrayed from the city treasury.

Any person can have his name as a candidate placed upon the ballots by presenting to the officers in charge of the printing of the different ballots a certificate of his nomination by any assembly, gathering, or convention of citizens qualified to vote for any candidate for such office, provided he present his name thirty days before election if he be a candidate for a State office, twenty days if for a county office, and ten days if for a city office, and on payment of a fee of $50 for a State, $25 for a county, and $10 for a city office. The ballots are to be of uniform size, and to have the name of State, county, or city and ward printed at the top. The names of candidates are to be printed after the name of the office and in the order in which they are handed in. After each candidate's name, his politics shall be designated. Opposite to each candidate's name in the margin of the ballot there shall be a vacant space in which the voter shall designate his choice by a cross (X). The form of the ballot for Governor would be as follows:

STATE BALLOT.

		Vote for one
Governor — CYRUS G. LUCE — Republican.	X
Governor — GEORGE L. YAPLE — Fusion.
Governor — SAMUEL DICKIE — Prohibition.
Governor —

The blank space at the bottom is required on each ticket, and the voter can write in it the name of any person for whom he desires to vote, whose name is not printed on the ballot. Any State, county, or city clerk failing to perform his duties as prescribed shall be punished by a fine not less than $100, nor more than $1,000, or imprisoned not less than thirty days, nor more than two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Elections are to be held in districts each containing not more than 300 voters. At each polling place there shall be provided boxes for voting, as many in number as the kinds of ballots voted, one box painted white, one red, and one blue. In the room in which the board of election sits, or immediately adjoining it, there shall be a number of compartments so constructed that a voter can retire into them and be free from observation. When a voter presents himself, an inspector of election, after ascertaining that he is entitled to vote, shall tear from the blocks a ballot of each kind that is to be voted, and, placing his (the inspector's) initials upon the back of each, shall hand them to the voter. The latter shall then retire to a compartment and there indicate by a cross in the margin the candidate for each office for whom he wishes to vote. He shall then fold the ballots so that their faces shall be concealed, but so that the initials of the inspector may be seen upon the backs, and then he shall offer them to the inspectors, who will put them in their proper boxes. No person shall be allowed to remain in the voting-room except the officers of election and policemen, and the number of voters admitted at one time shall in no case exceed the number of compartments by more than two. The inspectors may limit the time during which a voter may remain while preparing and depositing his ballots, but such limitation shall not be less than five nor more than fifteen minutes.

If an elector inadvertently spoils a ballot, he may return it and obtain another, but the inspector must preserve the spoiled one and return it to the proper clerk, together with all unused ballots, no more of which must be torn from the block than are required in the voting. No ballot can be deposited without the inspector's initials. No ballots can be distributed except in the voting-room, and any person removing any of the ballots from that room shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to fine or imprisonment or both. When a voter makes oath that he cannot read, or for any reason cannot mark his ballot, one inspector, in presence of all the others, shall mark it as he designates, and any inspector who discloses how such an elector has voted, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to the penalty therefor. It is made unlawful for any election officer or any person in the voting-room or compartments to persuade or endeavor to persuade any person to vote for any particular candidate, and the penalty is a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding sixty days.

The different coloring for the ballots strikes us as entirely unnecessary, though there is no objection to it. The divisions into State, county, and city could be made just as effectively by having the titles to that effect printed upon the backs where the inspectors' initials are put. The printing of his politics after each candidate's name is a defect which ought not to be allowed to remain in the law. It is allowed in many States, but in New York it is expressly forbidden to indicate in any way upon the ticket the political party to which the candidates upon it belong. If we are to have a perfectly free and untrammelled ballot, the voter, when he goes into the seclusion of the compartment to mark his ballot, ought to have no political designation to guide him. He ought to be free to choose his candidates upon their merits. The only proper guidance for him to follow would be the information required to be put on the ballots by the English laws, namely, the address and occupation of each candidate.

In general, this Michigan proposal is an admirable one, and is a distinct sign of progress. Like the Wisconsin law, which is to go into force on June 1 of this year, it provides for the abolition of some of the most pernicious and corrupting influences about the polls. It takes the distribution of ballots out of the hands of political "heelers" and "strikers"; it makes it impossible for those agents of corruption and intimidation to get near the polls, and it removes the polling places themselves from the liquor-saloons, where it has come to be the custom to locate the greater part of them in all our large cities. These are reforms of the greatest moment, which ought to be secured without delay in every city in the land.

THE ITALIAN ARMY.—1887.

FLORENCE, March 26, 1887.

"EVERY citizen is a soldier," may now be truly said in Italy, for, indeed, every male citizen between the ages of eighteen and thirty-nine, capable of bearing arms, is bound to do so at his country's call. The formation of the Italian Army since 1860 has been the constant care of King, Government, Parliament, and of the few veterans left from the old revolutionary campaigns. The method adopted is simple, and as merciful as the barbarous institution of a standing army can be. This army is divided into three categories: (1) the permanent army, composed of men in active service—varying from eighteen to twenty-eight years of age; (2) the mobile militia destined to support the active army, protect its operations, insure its communications and provision, garrison fortresses, etc., and liable to be called to perform the same service as the first category in cases of necessity; (3) the territorial militia, destined for defence of the State and for coöperation with the mobile militia when required. These divisions correspond pretty closely to the permanent army, the Landwehr, and the Landsturm in Austria and Germany, to the active, territorial, and territorial-reserve army in France.

Taking the recruiting law and the population merely, you would say Italy has over 3,000,000 of soldiers; but death, sickness, disability, avoidance, exemption reduce this number considerably, so that the figures for the 1st of January, 1887, stand thus:

First category, active service...	802,687	Permanent army.
Mobile militia at their homes, but liable to be called out at any moment	365,717
Territorial militia.....	1,128,928
In the navy, for which service fishermen, coasting traders, and sailors of the merchant service are drawn in the seaboard cities.....	16,061
Total.....	2,403,393

On the 1st of January the syndic of each commune informs every youth who will that year be eighteen, that he must enter his name on the levy rolls of his commune. From the 1st to the 15th of February the lists of all who have or ought to have inscribed their names are published, rectified, and sent to the prefect or sub-prefect. Every year the Minister of War proposes the number of men to be called to arms—i. e., the contingent for the first category. When Parliament has approved, increased, or decreased the numbers, they are sent to the prefect, who is also the president of the levy council, a body composed of two provincial counsellors, two officers of or above the rank of captain, an officer of the carbineers, and a surgeon-doctor. On the day fixed for the conscription, a member of the prefecture, an officer of the carbineers, and the syndics meet at the chief town of the district; the lists are again diligently scrutinized to erase the dead, those who figure in other communes, etc. Then the lots are drawn. Excluded from the "lottery" are any who did not present themselves at former levies, or who this time did not voluntarily inscribe their names, or who were rejected "provisionally" in other years; all the others take their chance. Say, for instance, that the year's contingent for the first category is 75,000 men, that the total number of youths of eighteen in that year is 260,000, that the military district A offers 3,500 conscripts, the proportion stands thus: Enrolled in all Italy, 260,000; contingent required, 76,000; inscribed in district A, 3,500; soldiers taken, 1,023. Hence the heart-burning and suspense of the 3,500 till cruel fate has dealt out the numbers from 1 to 1,023. But even then the misery of those who have drawn higher numbers is not ended. The cripples, hunchbacks, deaf and dumb, and idiots are excluded, of course, but then there are men below regulation height (one metre fifty-four centimetres), sickly, weakly, and otherwise afflicted, only sons, or eldest sons with brothers twelve years younger, or whose father is seventy, eldest sons of a widow, only nephew of a childless uncle of seventy or of a widowed aunt, eldest brothers of orphans, one who has already a brother in active service, or who has volunteered, or has died or been disabled on the field! As all these are exempted from the first and second and passed into the third or territorial militia category, the others do not feel safe till the examining commission of officers and doctors has reported, and, their report being accepted, the actual lists have been published. Then comes the destination of the new conscripts, to be settled by the commanders of the district, who is guided by the necessities of the corps and the special adaptations of the conscripts. The strong, sun-burnt peasants generally get sent to the artillery and engineers, the mountaineers to the Alpine regiments, etc., care being taken to recruit the regiments with men from all the five zones into which military Italy is divided.

Once their destination settled, the infantry are dressed at the depots, the others at their respective corps. The dress of the soldier is his own, and at the end of his term he may sell it at its estimated value to the contractors, so that he keeps his clothes as tidy as he can. The time of service for those of the first category is twelve years in the permanent army, i. e., three under arms, six in congedo illimitato (on furlough), but liable to be recalled at any moment, then three in the mobile militia; afterwards they pass into the territorial militia, subject to so many days' instruction every year; finally, at the age of forty, they secure their congedo assoluto, and can only be called on in case of a levy in mass. The second category pass eight years as complementary troops of the permanent army, and are reckoned on to fill up the blanks caused by death, sickness, desertion, or prisoners of war; then these too pass into the territorial militia. The cavalry soldiers pass four years under arms, five on furlough, then pass into the territorial militia. The royal carbineers, chosen from the finest, strongest, best-conducted youth, pass five years under arms, five on furlough, attached the whole time of service to the permanent army.

Perfect equality there is not, as any youth whose parents or guardians consent, may, in his seventeenth year, inscribe himself as a volunteer of one year on payment of a sum (varying from $1,200 to $1,500 for infantry, $1,500 to $2,000 for cavalry) into the military treasury, where it serves to pay such soldiers as choose, after their compulsory term is over, to remain in the ranks. Also, volunteers must produce a certificate of having passed an examination in the superior elementary schools; these pass one year under arms, seven on provisional furlough, four in the mobile militia, and need not complete their term of service until twenty-six years of age, and this facility may be extended to the university students of the first category by special permit of the Minister of War in time of peace. Of these volunteers such as have passed an examination for the first year in a lyceum or technical school may be made corporals after six, and sergeants after twelve months' service. Again, if they choose to remain another six months and pass a fresh examination, with the consent of their superior officers, they pass lieutenants, and after still another six months are licensed remaining complementary officers. Or a sergeant of one year's service may pass to the military school in Modena, and, after two years, issue lieutenant. At Turin there is a war school for the officers destined for the staff, etc., a school for artillery and engineers, a military academy. Four military colleges, at Milan, Florence, Messina, and Rome, prepare boys to pass into the academy. There is a normal cavalry school at Pinerolo; three battalions of instruction for the infantry sub-officers and the sanitary corps, and other depots in various cities; a national institute for the sons of officers and soldiers; a military orphanage at Naples.

Save in cases of special promotion on the battle-field, an officer must serve two years as second lieutenant to pass to first lieutenant, another two to become captain, another four to become major, three as major to become lieutenant-colonel, two to become colonel. This is the minimum, but many pass years and years without promotion. No lieutenant can marry without a deposit of 40,000 francs, a captain of 30,000, a major of 20,000. Soldiers, on the other hand, are free to marry before or after their three-years' term is over.

The sanitary corps has special regulations, and they are deemed especially hard. Rarely does a medical student who has served as a one-year volunteer complete his expensive medical education and obtain his degree until he is twenty-six years of age. Then he must pass seven months in the military sanitary institution in Florence, where he passes three in purely manual military exercise. Then promotion in the army for the sanitary corps is slow and rare, so that the greater portion prefer to seek a condotta (become parish doctors), or a position in the universities and hospitals, or to practise on their own account. Competent writers admit unwillingly that, if Italy were to engage in war, the sanitary department would be found in a somewhat unsatisfactory condition. The question has been brought before Parliament; the Military Review, an excellent periodical, is taking up the question. This would be a sad mischance, as the medical corps during the revolutionary wars distinguished itself. Garibaldi's "surgeon soldiers" were famous for their courage in picking up and tending the wounded under fire, and this when no providential red-cross international neutrality protected them.

To conclude, military Italy stands thus: Out of a population of thirty millions (the census of '85 gave 29,699,785), the following numbers compose the three categories of the national army: Permanent army, first category, 802,687; permanent army, second category, mobile militia, 365,717; territorial militia, 1,128,928; navy, 16,061; total, 2,403,393.

When first united Italy called on all her citizens to become soldiers, great was the aversion in the provinces hitherto free from conscription. The peasants especially shirked, and the priests assisted in hiding them. But as soon as the registers were in proper hands, the missing ones were sought for, found, and punished. Now the renitents are few, the deserters fewer. The fact that all, rich and poor, must serve as soldiers, and cannot provide substitutes save in certain cases of one brother for another, has done much to diminish the repugnance of the peasants and artisans. Target shooting has popularized the use of arms. The regional "target" is under the direction of the Minister of War. All the districts may found a society when one hundred citizens are inscribed. To-day in 2,300 districts there are 611 societies. The council is elected partly by the members, partly by Government officers; the members are composed of students, soldiers, and men who have served their time. All who can, pay 3 francs annually, the poor nothing, and receive the cartridges gratis; those who can, pay 8 centimes a shot. The carbines are provided by the Government, which, with the province and the commune, supplies the necessary funds. Every year there is a shooting match; the emulation is great, and the prizes highly esteemed.

Grievous is it to think that so large a portion of the population should spend their youth and strength in learning the art of killing; but, all things considered, the methods employed for the formation of the army and for keeping it up to the regulation standard are as fair and equal as can be. A standing army is, alas, a costly affair. At the best, Italy's income is, for the present year, to be 1,719,027,139 francs. Of this the army consumes for ordinary and extraordinary expenses 257,000,000, the navy 85,000,000; whereas for public instruction only 37,000,000 are expended.

J. W. M.

THE CATHEDRAL OF ORVIETO.

Rome, April 6, 1887.

Looking over the various objects preserved in the Archivio of Orvieto, the architect in charge of the restorations, Sig. Zampi, one of the thoughtful and faithful restorers who, I believe, can be found nowhere but in Italy, pointed out a worm-eaten and faded drawing on parchment of a façade, evidently a scheme of that of the Cathedral, differing essentially from the actual façade of Maitani, but with so many features in common that it was clearly an earlier scheme, abandoned for that actually carried out. What had directed the conjectures of Zampi to the probable authorship of the earlier plan was the fact that the famous pilasters of the façade, containing the Bible history in a series of bas reliefs known to have been made by the pupils of Niccolò Pisano, were given in the elevation as they now are, in a series of designs on so small a scale as to be scarcely distinguishable except with a lens. This to Zampi pointed to the identity of the designer of the bas-relief and the façade; and, in his opinion, this could be no other than Arnolfo di Lapo, who was, in fact, designated by the most ancient records as one of those who executed the reliefs.

As I had brief time to give to the question there, I got the documents concerning the Cathedral and set myself to work out the problem of which I was convinced that Zampi had indicated the solution, leaving only the demonstration to me. The study of the design in question side by side with that known to be by Maitani, and signed by him, which is also in the Archivio, gave me satisfactory internal evidence that the anonymous design was earlier, and inspired by a finer taste, than that on which the façade had been finished—the differences, which were not inconsiderable, being mostly variations of the original ideas in the direction of heaviness and elaboration; and I was satisfied that the man who was capable of designing the abandoned one would never have adopted that actually executed. The lower part of the façade is the same, but above the side doors in the original the tympanum springs lightly up to near the level of the eaves of the church like an inspiration, while the executed design has a double tympanum, totally devoid of the airy grace of the other. The original is basilical, with a graceful fall of the line of the cornice from the central compartment to the eaves, the central alone preserving the triangular tympanum, while the actual front is tricuspidal. One must see the two side by side to judge of the immense superiority in lightness and variety in composition of line of the original. The tricuspidal termination had always distressed me somewhat, but I could not tell why until I saw the other plan, and then I was convinced without argument that the original plan had been to build the façade with a basilical termination. The central square window is in both, but the frame is enlarged by the addition of the double row of statues around, and the gallery beneath is added. In the original plan, designs fill every space reserved for mosaics, as well as all the surface of the broad pilasters which divide and flank the doorways.

The study of the documents disclosed the following facts. In 1285 the Bishop and Council of Orvieto decided to build a new and more magnificent church in honor of the miracle of Bolsena and under the dedication of the Madonna. The minute in the archives says: "In nomine Domini, Amen. Anno 1285, Indictione XIV, Tempore Martini PP. IV, die tertia Martii. Cum in nova Ecclesia construenda ad honorem B. M. V. sicut tractatum est per Ven. D. Franciscum Episcopum Urbevetanum et stabilitum per consilium Civitatis oportet destrui cameras quasi omnes Archipresbiteri et Capituli, &c., &c., &c., pro solo ubi dicta Ecclesia construi debet, &c." In February, 1288, three pounds and twelve soldi are paid for the carriage of 143 stones for the work on S. Maria, and July 16 of the same year Giovanni Scrimario is paid three pounds for work done beyond the time which had been stipulated and probably paid for. In 1290 Nicholas IV. laid the corner-stone with magnificent festivities. In 1292 a tax was laid on all the towns, castles, etc., then subject to Orvieto, whose rule extended from Empoli to Orbetello, to hasten the construction of the church, which it was intended to make the most magnificent in Italy. Up to 1293 the contributions amounted to 3,362 pounds, a much larger sum relatively than would be that figure in sterling to-day. In 1295 Fra Benvegnate was called in as master builder to superintend the work, and in 1300 he was given full authority over the under-masters and workmen, in the selection of whom Orvieto people were to be preferred, other things being equal. The Captain and seven consuls ordered "quod F. Benvegnate sit operarius [superintendent] Ecclesiae S. Marie sicut fuit antea, cum salario sibi ordinato per litteras olim Episcopi Urbev." In June, 1310, the Council and Captain decided that it was necessary to get the marble for the façade, "quod necessarium sit facere deportari marmora de contrata Montis Pisi et a Civitate Ortana et aliis contratis pro edificandis in pariete anteriore dicte Ecclesie."

In 1309 Boniface VIII. (not Guido Farnese) said the first mass, and in September, 1310, the Council proposes to call in Lorenzo Maitani, "quod magister Laurentius olim magistri Vitalis de Senis, universalis caput magister ad fabricam supradictam; pro parte comunis [sic] Urbevetani multoties requisitus, venit ad civitatem Urbevetanam ad reparandam ipsam fabricam, que quasi minabatur ruinam, et ad hedificandam eandem" (Documenti raccolti dal Dott. Milanesi, Siena, 1854, Tom. I. p. 172.) The church was going to ruin, and he was called in to repair it, which does not indicate that he had been the original architect, since, had that been the case, there would hardly have been the confidence in his ability which was shown by the Orvietans. "Multoties requisitus" does not mean had come many times, but had been called many times; and, with all the cataloguing of the sculptors and workmen employed on the church from 1285 down to 1310, no mention has ever been made of Maitani.

But who was Maitani? Milanesi, in his 'Documenti, &c.,' says, after quoting the above-mentioned document: "Here we have Lorenzo Maitani, the celebrated architect of the Duomo of Orvieto, whose fame we may say began about 1310, as we know not from an earlier date what work he did. In Siena he is scarcely known [ricordato], and though I have with great diligence and love searched the records for news of him, I have found very little before he went to Orvieto." He was by this search shown to be the son of a master mason and builder, Vitale di Lorenzo, and beyond this and his coming to Orvieto we know nothing. The assumption that he was the first architect of the Orvieto Cathedral is without any other basis than I have given—too little to overcome the arguments against it, of which the two designs and their relation to each other are chief as internal, and the total absence of mention of him conclusive, taken in connection with the other. I cannot, in the space the Nation can afford, go in detail over the whole ground, but this is the general solution I suggest.

We know that Arnolfo was at work in Orvieto between 1280 and 1288, and left the monument of Cardinal de Bray, still in the Church of S. Domenico, as a testimony of his presence and abilities. The good folks of Orvieto had been disposed in the first place to make the Cathedral a copy of S. Maria Maggiore, then the typical basilica of the Church, less splendid, but probably (its glories are now hidden by a barocco shell of late incrustation) far more pleasing to the thirteenth century taste than St. Paul-beyond-the walls; and commissions were sent to Rome to get the plans to build by. But the façade is not borrowed from anything Roman If, however, one will compare its motive of decoration with that of the tomb of Cardinal de Bray, he will be struck with the similarity of the decorative feeling to that of the façade, and the architectural character of the tomb. With the intervention of Arnolfo for the design of the façade, and the known participation of the pupils of Niccolò Pisano in the execution of the bas-reliefs, the Urbevetani thought, not without reason, that they could trust a master builder to build the body of the church on the proportions of S. Maria Maggiore. In 1295 Fra Benvegnate, who was pretty certainly the same who had been engaged with Niccolò Pisano and his pupils in Perugia, and was superintendent of the construction of the Duomo there, was called in; and since, in 1298, Arnolfo was definitely and more honorably employed in Florence, he probably abandoned Orvieto altogether, and then Benvegnate was made master builder with a control over all subordinates, masters, and laborers—which was absolutely inconsistent with any authority or participation of Maitani. Benvegnate, if superintendent of Perugia with old Niccolò of Pisa, must have been an old man, and probably gave out ere long, as Niccolò is supposed to have died about 1290. I conclude, then, that Maitani was called in only when, after Benvegnate's death or retirement, the work began to decay from neglect and want of authority to direct the workmen and secure the quality of construction considered necessary. The people made their festivity when the church was finished, and forgot who had begun it half a century before. This is how history was then written.

THE AMERICAN ARCHÆOLOGICAL EXPEDITION TO ITALY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have just read in the Nation of April 21 a letter from Mr. Joseph Thacher Clarke, of the American archæological expedition to Italy. This letter refers to certain excavations undertaken by the above-named gentleman on the site of the Temple of Juno Lacinia at Croton, and to the alleged interference of the Italian authorities against the success of the enterprise. The Italian authorities are denounced by Mr. Clarke as "vandals," as "having done their utmost to prevent the examination of any site in Magna Græcia," as directed not by love of science, but by "temper"; in fact (as he wrote a few weeks ago to a common friend), Mr. Clarke thinks that, as regards archæological interests, the Turkish Government is far above the level of the Italian.

In my official capacity of director of excavations in central Italy, and as a person fully and minutely acquainted with Mr. Clarke's doings from the beginning to the end, allow me to declare that in all his statements there is not a particle of truth, and that the whole affair seems to me misrepresented so as to throw on the Italian Government the responsibility of the failure, which rests exclusively on Mr. Clarke's rebellion against the laws of the country of which he was the guest.

No country in the world has a more liberal and generous legislation on archæological matters than Italy has. No distinction is made between Italians and foreigners; everybody has the right of excavating the ground for scientific purposes; the discoverer has the absolute property of his findings. The only condition imposed in exchange for so many advantages and liberalities is, that the Government at Rome should be notified in advance of the nature of the explorations and the place selected for them, and should be notified periodically of their scientific and material results. As regards the exportation of antiquities from the kingdom, the Government has simply the right of buying what it considers to be of national interest, at a price determined by common consent.

In consequence of this liberality in our legislation, every year some great undertaking is started by foreign enterprise, individual or collective as it may be. To mention one instance only, Sir John Savile Lumley was able to excavate in 1886 the whole extent of the Temple of Diana Nemorensis, and to send over to England about four thousand objects of archæological interest. Frenchmen, Germans, Austrians, are at work in various points of the country, with the sanction and assistance of the Italian Government.

To come back, however, to Mr. Clarke's case. In June or July, 1886, Prof. Norton of Harvard and Prof. Frothingham of Princeton wrote to me on the subject of a proposed expedition in southern Italy, under the auspices of the American Archæological Society, asking advice and information to insure its scientific and material success. I hastened to give the advice and the information required, to the best of my knowledge. I pointed out plainly the necessity, the condition sine qua non, of notifying the Government of the intentions of the Society. I expressed my opinion as to the place which would most likely yield a good archæological harvest. I recommended the matter to the Department of Rome. I actually placed at the disposal of Mr. Clarke my own best and cleverest officer, Auselmo Gasparini, and, on my way through London, I had a personal interview with the gentleman, repeating by word of mouth what I had already fully explained and recommended in writing.

What was the stand taken by Mr. Clarke, the minute he found himself on the spot intended for his explorations? To rebel against the rules of the country which was favoring him with a liberal hospitality. He went to work on the site of the Temple of Juno Lacinia, with the consent of the owner of the ground, but with no permission whatever, either from the local authorities (who, after all, have no power in the matter of excavations) or from the central Government at Rome. He was warned many times to stop his illegal proceedings; he did not pay the slightest attention to the warning. Finally, the Government was compelled to resort to the last argument in its power—the direct interference of the police.

I do not complain of the total and absolute want of consideration which the leader of this unfortunate expedition has shown to me—to me who had acted as his sponsor and guarantor before the Government; I want simply to show how unjust and groundless are the charges contained in his letter to the Nation.

As regards the thrilling description of "the gable sculptures of the temple flung [sic] into the trenches," it is our constant practice (when we choose to renounce our rights of sequestration) to protect and insure the preservation of antique marbles by covering them up again with earth until their fate is decided.

To end this official statement of mine with the same words with which Mr. Clarke ends his own, "the want of the most elementary principles of international and personal courtesy on the part of Mr. Clarke requires no comment."—Yours obediently,

RODOLFO LANCIANI.

THE PROGRESS OF FEMALE SUFFRAGE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will you give, as far as they are accessible, the statistics as to female suffrage in the United States with regard to the following particulars: (a) Names of States and Territories where women vote, and since when; (b) States and Territories where women have full suffrage, and where they have limited suffrage, and the limitations; (c) number of women registered in each State or Territory, and number actually voting therein for the past five years, severally; (d) percentages of votes to registrations; (e) total number of registrations of women in the United States, and total number of women actually voting during the last five years; (f) percentage of total votes to total registrations for the five years; (g) percentage of total votes to total registrations for first year, the same for the fifth year?

Perhaps your correspondents in different States could supply lack of collected statistics.

Respectfully yours, T.

ROANOKE COUNTY, VA.

[Not being able of ourselves to answer these interrogatories, we have referred them to an eminent advocate of woman suffrage, whose reply we subjoin.—ED. NATION.]

Women have suffrage on terms and for purposes more or less restricted, upon questions connected with the public schools, in thirteen States, viz.: New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, New York, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, Kentucky, Wisconsin, Oregon, Indiana, and New Jersey; also in three Territories, viz.: Idaho, Dakota, and Wyoming. In Utah and Washington Territories they have exercised it until recently, but have lost it within the present year—in Utah, by the passage of the Edmunds bill; in Washington, by a decision of the Territorial Supreme Court on a technicality.

A number of States which do not allow women to vote on school matters nevertheless allow them to hold school offices. Among these are Illinois, Iowa, Louisiana, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island. In California women are eligible to all educational offices except those from which they are excluded by the State Constitution. In Wisconsin they are eligible to any office but that of State Superintendent. In Maine they are eligible to "certain" school offices; in Connecticut they may be school visitors; in Tennessee they may hold school offices, etc.

School suffrage, however, does not always mean suffrage on all questions or on any questions on equal terms with men. In Massachusetts the right is limited to a vote for school committee. In Michigan, Vermont, and (until recently) in New York, the right is limited to tax-paying women; in Oregon, to widows having taxable property and children to educate; in Indiana, to women, not married nor minors, who pay taxes, and are listed as parents, guardians, or heads of families, etc., etc.

Women have full suffrage in one Territory—Wyoming. There they have exercised it on the same terms as men since 1869, and they now habitually vote in somewhat larger proportion to their numbers than do the men. Women also have a right to vote "by petition" on the granting of liquor licenses in Arkansas and Mississippi. In Kansas women have this winter been made voters in all cities of first, second, and third class, which last includes incorporated towns and villages containing only 300 inhabitants. The Kansas women have just taken a very active part in the April elections, generally in the interest of the Republican party and of the enforcement of the Prohibition Law.

No complete and reliable statistics have ever been obtained of the number of women who register and vote on school questions. This varies greatly in different localities, and in the same localities in different years. With women, as with men, the questions connected with the schools do not suffice to bring out many voters as a rule. Those few who have voted hitherto have been of more than average character and ability, and influenced wholly by public spirit. But comparatively few, even of suffragists, have as yet availed themselves of the privilege. To secure any general participation of women in elections, a wider range of subjects must be thrown open to them. Wherever, as in Kansas, party issues and moral questions are involved, the women show a greater interest. In several States, as in Kansas, Iowa, and Rhode Island, prohibition amendments are said to have been carried by the efforts of women-workers at the polls, although not themselves voters.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE IN KANSAS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your discussion of woman suffrage in Kansas in the Nation of April 14, you give the population of Wichita as 4,911. As a correct statement of the population will add force to the facts concerning the voting of women, it is well to bear in mind that seven years have made a substantial change in nearly all of the towns in Kansas. A count of the population of Wichita made in June, 1886, gave this city about 22,000. There were over 4,000 voters registered at the last election. There were probably not less than 3,500 women qualified to vote at that time. About 200 of them voted. The incidents of the canvass were such as to cause the sober-minded to regret that this new element had been introduced into politics. The evils of the universal suffrage of men are certain to be many times multiplied, with no counterbalancing good.

EDWIN WHITE MOORE.

WICHITA, KAN., April 18, 1887.

WOLSELEY AND LEE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Col. Allan's argument, that Lord Wolseley's opinions are entitled to great consideration on account of his high position in the British Army, would be more convincing but for the immediate presence of the fact that the forces of France, a far more military nation than England, are at this moment in the hands of Gen. Boulanger.

(2.) Col. Allan misunderstands me in supposing that I hold the opinion that the Seven Days' fighting was anything other or anything less than a defeat for McClellan. It was a distinct defeat; and the theory of a "change of base" ought not to have imposed upon anybody. But in order to accomplish that defeat, Gen. Lee was obliged, both on the 27th and again on the 30th of June, to place the wings of his army far out of supporting distance. Moreover, on the 29th of June, the unexpected detention of Jackson at the bridges left Magruder's force in the presence of largely superior numbers. It was these facts which caused me to write, in my former letter, that Lee's army was on several occasions more at the mercy of McClellan than the Potomac Army was, on any one occasion, at the mercy of the Confederate leader.

(3.) I do not see that Col. Allan's citation of a few contemporary opinions, to the effect that Lee might advantageously have attacked McClellan at Harrison's Landing, justifies Lord Wolseley's assertion that the Army of the Potomac was there "at his mercy." We know how fallacious and even foolish contemporary opinion often was during the war. What I complained of was, that Lord Wolseley should, twenty-five years after the occurrences in question, repeat the most mistaken of the judgments of the time.

Col. Allan is not fortunate in his citations. The Committee on the Conduct of the War entertained an unrelenting hostility to McClellan, and gave a cordial welcome to every complaint against him. Gen. Casey was not in command of his division during the Seven Days' battles, and cherished a deep and probably a well-founded sense of injustice in McClellan's treatment of him after Fair Oaks. Hooker's noisy and insubordinate abuse of his superior officers was long one of the worst scandals of the army.

I can hardly believe that Col. Allan himself entertains the opinion that Lee could advantageously have attacked McClellan at Harrison's Landing. The net result of the mere fighting of the 29th and 30th of June and the 1st of July had not been unfavorable to the Union arms. The 2d of July found the Army of the Potomac in a defensible position, its flanks covered by the fire of the fleet. Not a brigade had been captured or destroyed during the retreat; of the eleven divisions not more than four had in any sense been shattered in the fighting of the preceding week.

But even if sufficient military reasons would have justified Lee in attacking on the 2d of July, what excuse is there for saying that he had the Army of the Potomac "at his mercy"? Such an expression could only properly be used when the opposing army had not a fair fighting chance. That any one can now believe that the Army of the Potomac had not such a chance on the very day following the great victory of Malvern Hill, seems inconceivable.

(4.) Regarding the situation after the battle of Fredericksburg, I scarcely know how to express myself. With the Army of the Potomac still in largely superior numbers; with courage and temper unbroken, as the desperate charges made at dusk on the 13th of December abundantly testified; with the whole front of the Union Army completely swept by the almost superabundant artillery on the commanding Stafford Heights—that it was at Gen. Lee's "mercy," in such a sense that it could have been run over by columns emerging from the Confederate works, still seems to me, in spite of the opinion of the unknown "Line officer" of the British Army whom Col. Allan cites, a judgment "silly, empty, and vain." The subsequent history of the war justifies no such disparaging opinion of either of the two great contending armies.

(5.) In neither this nor my former letter have I sought to set up any grounds for challenging Col. Allan's estimate of Gen. Lee; nor have I written in any spirit of disparagement regarding the Confederate forces. I believe it to be the duty of the former soldiers of both armies equally to resent such contemptuous views of the valor, discipline, and endurance of our American soldiers, North or South, as underlie the two military judgments of Lord Wolseley on which I have commented with what seems to Col. Allan undue severity. FRANCIS A. WALKER.

GEN. LEE'S "COUNTRYMEN."

To the Editor of The Nation:

SIR: It has been my good fortune to have occasion to visit portions of the South from time to time, and the result of these visits has been to make me a sincere admirer and warm friend of the people in that section of our country. But one thing has often surprised, and sometimes irritated, me while among them; and that is, the way they have of talking about "our country" and "our countrymen," in distinction from "your [my] country" and "your [my] countrymen," meaning the North and the people of the North.

I was reminded of this, and experienced a little of the old irritation, when I read Mr. Allan's letter in last week's Nation apropos of Gen. Walker's criticism of Lord Wolseley's "silly, empty, and vain" article on Gen. Lee. Mr. Allan says: "His countrymen have admired, loved, venerated him [Lee] not so much," etc., and the connection makes it plain that Mr. Allan uses the term "his countrymen" in a sense which would exclude from that number Gen. Walker, for example. Mr. Allan, it seems, lives in Maryland. Does he consider himself one of "his countrymen"? If so, in what sense is a man who lives in Maryland any more Gen. Lee's countryman than a man living in Massachusetts? Now, it never occurs to a Northern man to speak and act as if he were abroad on foreign shores the moment he crosses the Ohio River. New Orleans is a part of his country just as much as Boston; and to him the countrymen of Gen. Grant are also the countrymen of Gen. Lee. From Mr. Allan's letter, however, one would never suppose that Lee surrendered at Appomattox, and that Mahone had, until recently, represented Virginia in the Senate of the United States. Does Mr. Allan suppose that there is a single man in the North who is not, as an American, proud of Gen. Lee's splendid talents and still more splendid virtues, and who does not glory in the reflection that his fame is the immortal possession of his country? E. O.

A LOCAL-OPTION VILLAGE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

SIR: The following facts may throw some light on the prohibition question. This is a village of about 3,000 inhabitants in a town of about 7,000, chiefly engaged in agriculture. We have a branch of the Women's Christian Temperance Union and a flourishing lodge of Good Templars. The temperance sentiment is fairly strong. The following table of the majorities in the town for license and no license respectively since the passage of the local-option law indicates the drift of public opinion on the subject:

1875	For license	150 majority
1876	For no license	21 "
1877	"	254 "
1878	"	54 "
1879	"	3 "
1880	For license	221 "
1881	"	274 "
1882	"	18 "
1883	For no license	108 "
1884	"	118 "
1885	For license	258 "
1886	"	313 "
1887	For no license	179 "

There are in the village three licensed hotels, five licensed drug-stores, and three or four licensed saloons, one of which, whose proprietor boasts of three beds, is euphemistically styled a hotel, and enjoys corresponding privileges.

In March of this year one Huntress was convicted in a court of special sessions of selling whiskey under an ale-and-beer license and fined fifty dollars. Chapter 549 of the laws of 1873 provides that any conviction for a violation of the excise law by a person holding a license shall forfeit and annul such license. The Court of Appeals has decided, in People vs. Meyers, 95 N. Y. 223, that a conviction operates ipso facto to annul the license. After his conviction Huntress continued to sell ale and beer. He was complained of and prosecuted for selling without a license. Upon the trials there was no dispute as to the facts. He admitted the former conviction, that he was then told that such conviction annulled his license, and the subsequent selling. His counsel claimed that his license was not forfeited until the Board of Excise formally revoked and cancelled it. The case was tried three times. Each time the district attorney cited the Myers case, dwelt on it, and expounded it to the jury, and the magistrate charged that such is the law. Yet the jury on each of the first two trials failed to agree, in both instances standing three for conviction and three for acquittal, and on the third trial rendered a verdict of acquittal. The juries were fairly representative of the usual country jury in justice's court. The district attorney, who was thoroughly in earnest in conducting the prosecution, said that he was satisfied with them and considered them good men. The magistrate certainly did not lean in favor of the defendant. When asked how they could so disregard the law as to overrule the Court of Appeals, one of the last jurors said that they thought that the defendant had been punished enough on the former conviction.

From the almost periodical alternation between the license and no-license majorities in the table, it might be argued that neither free rum nor absolute prohibition gives permanent satisfaction to our good people, and that high license might prove to be a golden mean. But my purpose is to give facts, not to draw inferences. * * * * *

VERSIFYING MADE EASY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

SIR: On looking over the April number of the Brooklyn Magazine I discovered a piece of verse entitled "A Bachelor's Reverie," purporting to have been written by F. M. Cooper.

As this poem, under a slightly different heading and with an additional verse, was contributed by myself to the January number of the Trinity Tablet of Trinity College in 1884, I was somewhat surprised at seeing it here. I claim no merit for the verse, it being merely a typical college effusion, but I do think that the world should know how Mr. Cooper writes his poetry.—Yours respectfully, CHARLES M. ANDREWS.

THE VERSATILE PLASTOUNOFF.

To the Editor of The Nation:

SIR: Although enough has already been said in your columns about the eminent literary character, Roman Plastounoff of Kieff, to prevent any of your readers falling into his trap, one more tribute to the catholicity of his taste and the ingenuity of his methods may not be out of place. One would suppose that a man who professed to be anxious to obtain American books for the purpose of translating them into Russian would have spared a translator of Russian into English. But the clever way in which he has ignored the problem and baited the hook for me arouses my enthusiastic admiration. He has "accidentally heard of my translations," and "most humbly" begs me to send him a specimen, as it will be impossible for him to procure one without my "amiable assistance." In return, he does not offer me his own famous work on Embryology, but says that he has "already made arrangements" to have a certain book sent me on its publication, "a month hence or so."

I have reason to suppose that if the book (which is attributed to an actual author) ever reached me, it would be worth, including postage, about ten cents. But the thoroughness of his method is displayed in still another manner. Whereas he wrote to his other American correspondents in pigeon English on paper with a French heading, he has tickled my vanity by writing in Russian on paper with a Russian heading, which is much more elaborate than the one which you have already reported. The concluding words, "I am, madam, yours most obedient servant," gently hint that he will be able to read the volume or volumes which I may send. This carefully prepared Russian heading to his paper would also seem to intimate that he plies his artistic begging scheme in his native land as well as abroad. The interesting question then arises: What does he say in the letter corresponding to the second one reported by Prof. Laughlin (February 10), when he is within reach of the deluded and wrathful author?—Yours truly,

ISABEL F. HAPGOOD.

Notes.

THE success of their uniform Hamilton and Franklin series has induced G. P. Putnam's Sons to project a corresponding edition of the writings of Washington, probably in twelve volumes. It will contain the diaries, addresses, and correspondence, together with a number of papers never before printed. The name of the editor is not announced.

Prof. Skeat has consented to be treasurer and secretary of an organization, separate from the English Dialect Society, but in harmony with it, for the publication of an English Dialect Dictionary. The editor will be the Rev. A. Smythe Palmer, and the Syndics of the Cambridge University will undertake the publication of the work, which will be a fit companion to the Philological Society's Dictionary now appearing under the auspices of Oxford.

Thomas Whittaker will shortly issue Prof. Warfield's 'Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament,' and a Hebrew Grammar by the Rev. W. H. Lowe.

Mr. J. G. Cupples, senior member of the well-known Boston firm of booksellers, has withdrawn in order to devote himself entirely to the publishing business. If it has been his taste that has marked the manufacture of the books hitherto bearing the imprint of Cupples, Upham & Co., the reading public is to be congratulated on his larger scope in this direction.

Mr. John Morley's address "On the Study of Literature," delivered in February before the students of the London Society for the Extension of University Teaching, has been printed in tract form by Macmillan, and also as a shapely little book for permanent preservation, which it well merits. It is explicit, sensible, and practical throughout, and will act as a deterrent to the making of poor "literature" as well as a guide to the cultivation of the genuine sort. Mr. Morley estimates what one may achieve in a year by reading for a fragment of an hour daily; and incidentally reveals his own power of rapid assimilation when he fancies that "in half an hour . . . you can read fifteen or twenty pages of Burke." He is a hearty disbeliever in the culture derivable from "the hundred best books." Style he rightly subordinates to clearness and precision of statement, and to purity of language, which, by the way, he regards as more in danger from our American innovations than from any other source.

Mr. Morley has some wholesome remarks on the general incapacity both to read and to write, concluding that much time is wasted on themes and compositions. One may find exemplifications of the truth of this in 'English as She is Taught' (Cassell & Co.), which consists, as readers of the April Century know, of genuine answers to examination questions in our public schools. It is, indeed, such a commentary on the little wit of teachers that one finds it difficult to laugh at the mass of absurdities like—"Milton's principal work is the exclusion of bad angels out of heaven," or "Julius Cæsar wrote a book for beginners in Latin."

Teachers of Latin will be glad to have an English paraphrase, by Messrs. Bond and Walpole, of the Kraner-Dittenberger edition of Cæsar's Commentaries on the Gallic War (Macmillan). The Introduction, showing what led up to the conquest of Gaul, and displaying the military organization in Cæsar's time, is well calculated to stimulate the learner's curiosity and to make his progress intelligent. The apparatus of running-titles, numberings of paragraphs and lines, notes, geographical and grammatical indexes, etc., is uncommonly helpful. There is no vocabulary.

Gertrude Strohm's 'Universal Cookery Book' (White, Stokes & Allen) is an avowed compilation from the many that have gone before it, due credit being given in every instance of borrowing. What is again unusual is a garnishing of the text with "literary selections and quotations," which are apt enough, and have their separate index.

Mr. William M. Ivins's recent luminous writings on 'Machine Politics and Money in Elections in New York City' have been gathered into a volume for Harper's Handy Series (No. 127), and deserve the very widest circulation. In the fourth appendix it is shown in detail how the Corrupt Practices Act has worked in England.

'Two Royal Lives: Gleanings at Berlin and from the Lives of their Imperial Highnesses the Crown Prince and Princess of Germany,' by Dorothea Roberts (Scribner & Welford), may fairly fall under the category of "Jubilee" literature, though having an independent design. It is the work of an unpractised hand, but it serves to give some idea of the simple, kindly, and charitably useful lives of the future ruler of Germany, his English wife, and their family. Numerous photographic portraits increase the value of the volume, and there are even domestic groups of the children, practically employed.

Few of us are aware of the extent to which American authors are reprinted in England in the collections vaguely corresponding to the "Seaside Library." A recent number of the Athenæum contained a full-page advertisement of one firm publishing several "Popular Series of Standard Books." The first of these was the "Royal Library of Choice Books by Famous Authors," 101 volumes, of which nearly twenty were of American origin. A second series of the same publishers is "The People's Standard Library of English Classics," in ninety-seven volumes, of which eighteen were written by Americans. The third of their series is a "Popular Library of Literary Treasures" (at threepence each); this extends to some twenty-five numbers, of which five are by Emerson and Longfellow.

We record the appearance on our table of the first number of the Writer—"a monthly magazine for literary workers" (P. O. Box 1905, Boston). Its aim is practical, and this has been well attained at the start. The editors are Messrs. Wm. H. Hills and Robert Luce, members of the editorial staff of the Boston Globe.

A writer in the Toronto Week for April 21 bases an interesting article concerning "Slavery in Canada" on an appendix to the third volume of the Abbé Tanguay's 'Dictionaire Généalogique des Familles Canadiennes.' The subject is so novel to most readers that the very collocation of words is a surprise, like "slavery in Vermont" or "slavery in Idaho." Fugitive slaves in Canada we know abounded.

The most striking article in the February Antiquary is an illustrated paper upon "the development of fencing" by Monté. It is somewhat technical, but describes with sufficient clearness the history of this modern art—called into existence by the abandonment of defensive armor in the sixteenth century—as worked out by the Spanish, Italian, and French schools. The April number has several articles of considerable interest. The first is "The Cromwells of America," by James Waylen, with a cut of a house in Cecil County, Maryland, and a portrait of Oliver Cromwell of Kentucky. "The Folk-lore of Guillim," by Mrs. Damant, contains much very curious matter, and the second paper on "Old Storied Houses" is devoted to Compton-Wynyates in Warwickshire, in which it is believed that Charles II. was concealed (and nearly roasted alive by Cromwell's soldiers) after the battle of Worcester. The article on the "Roman Baths at Bath" calls attention to "some atrocious work" committed at Bath in spite of the vigilance of the Society of Antiquaries." It seems that the necessities of the modern baths are likely not to destroy, but very much to obscure the interesting Roman remains, and make them difficult of access and study.

Walford's Antiquarian for March contains the first of a series of papers upon "Cromwell and the Saddle Letter of Charles I." This letter, said to have been intercepted by Cromwell and Ireton in a stable of the Blue Boar Inn, Holborn, is believed to have afforded, in its contents, the occasion for Cromwell's dropping negotiations with the King, and taking up the plan of placing him on trial. This first article contains the various accounts of the affair by Ashburnham, Disraeli, Dugdale, and others. The paper is not continued in the April number, which contains several articles—"The Curiosities of Ale" (illustrated), "How to Trace a Pedigree," "Words, Idioms, etc., of the Vulgar"—all of which well deserve consideration. Under the title "The Romans in Cambria," the Rev. Samuel Barber contributes a pleasant article on the antiquities of Seascale and its neighborhood.

The Siberian Compendium, a periodical scientific and literary publication, which forms a supplement to the Eastern Review, has issued Parts II. and III., under the editorship of N. M. Yadrintzeff, and furnishes valuable material in various directions for those who are desirous of studying that almost unknown land. It contains historical studies, sketches of the life of to-day in various parts of the country, and miscellaneous information, which will assist the reader to form an idea of the subject as a whole. One of the notable articles in the present issue is "A Trip to the Monastery of Atchun-kanuzun of the Urdzhanisi," by Mr. Potanin, consisting of an episode of travel from the experience of this unwearied explorer, who has now completed his expedition, which has lasted for many years, and from whom important information is expected, with regard to Mongolia and China, that will serve as a supplement to the explorations of Przhvalsky.

The April Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society contains a condensed account of Gen. Przhvalsky's discoveries in Central Asia, as well as a short notice of Potanin's journey in northwestern China, both by Mr. Delmar Morgan. In addition to these and the usual notes, there is also an interesting paper descriptive of an extensive journey by three Englishmen through Mantchuria. They report the country to be extremely rich in gold, silver, iron, coal, furs, silk, and opium (the cultivation of which last has greatly increased, so that the drug is now exported to all parts of China), but to be suffering terribly from the fact that, through the weakness of the Mantchu Government, the land has become a prey to organized bands of robbers.

The Scottish Geographical Magazine for April has a very suggestive article, packed full of facts, by Mr. J. T. Wills, on the rainfall in Australia, accompanied by two carefully shaded maps, and a description of the Sierra Nevada de Santa Marta in the South American State of Magdalena, by J. T. Bealey. There is also given the concluding part of the very instructive and suggestive lecture, by School Inspector Jolly, on a "Realistic and Dramatic Method of Teaching Geography."

The Illustrirte Zeitung for April 9 has an article on the German possessions in East Africa, accompanied by a map so shaded as to show the territory claimed by the German East-African Association, as delimited at the recent London Conference. Out of this enormous tract, covering nearly twelve degrees of latitude and ten of longitude, and including the larger part of the great lakes, only a comparatively small portion, consisting of the country to the west of Zanzibar, is actually under the protection of the German Government and can properly be regarded as a part of the empire. There are now twelve German stations in East Africa.

The Portfolio for April (Macmillan) is a capital number. Mr. Hamerton discourses on "Vitality in Portraits," contrasting the old (and not yet extinct) manner of careful posing against dark and meaningless backgrounds with the treatment exemplified by William Hole in his etchings, from life sketches, of the High Officers and Professors of the Edinburgh University at the time of its recent Tercentenary Festival. Here the background indicates the specialty of each professor, and helps explain his characteristic attitude. Some excellent instances of the old-style portraits are copied in the same number after Raeburn, to accompany Mr. Walter Armstrong's second paper on Scottish painters One of those "processed" is of the artist himself; another is a striking full-page photogravure of Lord Newton in his robes. Mr. Lawrence continues his interesting papers on "The Skirts of London a Hundred Years Ago,"; with copies of old prints. There is a cheerful etching after a seashore painting by Philip Wouverman. Much the best full-page illustration, however, to our thinking, is the photogravure of the late William Hull's view of the Blea Tarn Valley, a fine composition, whose mountains in mass and line possess a singular beauty. Some agreeable letters from the English Lakes, written by this artist during his studies in that region, attend the print, and are illustrated by pen sketches of Helvellyn, Skiddaw, Rydal Water, Thirlmere, etc.

The Studio has a good many notable picture sales in this city to record, and gives samples from the canvases in the Probasco collection, including a Millet, a Rousseau, and a Fromentin. An accurate photographic copy of Trumbull's pencil portrait of Gen. Israel Putnam (the only authentic one) also adorns the Studio for April.

If this journal makes itself a medium for exhibiting the good qualities of Mr. Kurtz's "process" engraving, the Art Review renders the same service to the Photogravure Company of this city—to the benefit of the public in both cases. The March number of the Review has three plates—one after Mr. O. L. Warner's "Diana," a statue which one would like to have had pictured in several aspects; another after Mr. Edwin H. Blashfield's painting, "The Tiger Lily"; and the third after a woodland scene by George Inness. Add to these a genuine etching, a marine, "Honfleur," by Mr. C. A. Platt. Mr Warner's career as a sculptor is told admiringly by Mr. Ripley Hitchcock.

In the Courrier de l'Art for March 11 we read of the formation of a Franco-American Artistic Society composed of the most eminent artists and amateurs, and having its headquarters on the corner of the Rues Laffitte and Le Peletier (the former gallery of the water-colorists). Besides a permanent exhibition hall, there will be reading-rooms and other conveniences for the direct intercourse of the two nationalities concerned in the foundation.

Lebrun's list of the 'Etchings and Other Prints of Jean François Millet,' translated and annotated by Frederick Keppel, with a sketch of the artist's life (F. Keppel & Co.), makes a pretty little square volume in parchment covers, and is illustrated with a portrait of Millet by himself, and photogravures (some at scale) of etchings, a wood-cut, and a unique lithograph by this master. Mr. Keppel has made his work interesting to the general reader as well as useful to the collector. The edition is limited.

The fortunate owners of the prints of the Society for Photographing Relics of Old London are familiar with the two which show the present state of the White Hart Inn, Southwark. The inner court of this famous hostelry has been etched by Mr. Percy Thomas as it was in 1882, on a plate 14 by 11, and published by S. Drewett, at 1 Northumberland Avenue, Trafalgar Square, S. W., London. A comparison of this print with the corresponding autotype in the series above mentioned is very favorable to the etching, which grasps all the picturesqueness of the scene, while revealing even more of the architectural details than the camera has done—at least at first glance. This inn, we believe, is still standing, and it has a literary association with Dickens and Sam Weller. The Tabard Inn, however, the successor (on the same spot) of Chaucer's, has been demolished, and Mr. Thomas's companion etching of it, which also comes to us from Mr. Drewett, is already a valuable memorandum of the building. Of the two it makes rather the more interesting design. Being an exterior view, it is the proper complement of the White Hart etching. We commend both to the lovers of what is ancient as well as what is artistic. An historical letter-press description goes with each.

M. Georges Monval, the archivist of the Comédie-Française and the editor of the Moliériste, has recently worked out most ingeniously and thoroughly one of the minor problems of the biography of Molière. Who was the body-servant of Molière to whom Grimarest refers as though he were well known? In his pretty little book, 'Le Laquais de Molière' (Paris: Tresse & Stock; New York: F. W. Christern) M. Monval proves beyond question that this vague personage was Du Périer, who was first Molière's servant, then for twenty years a useful second-rate actor at the Théâtre-Français, and then the founder of the Parisian fire department, and as such of great assistance in the saving of the Tuileries from a fire which broke out in 1704. M. Monval gives all the documents in the case.

Alfred de Musset has been until very lately practically excluded from the class-room. But now an ancien professeur has made a selection from his works, à l'usage de la jeunesse, under the title 'L'Œuvre de Alfred de Musset' (Paris: Charpentier; Boston: Schoenhof). This makes a thick volume of nearly 600 pages, in which almost every work of importance of Musset's is represented to a greater or less extent. There are long scenes from all the plays, and some of the tales are given in full. There are even thirty-six pages picked out of 'La Confession d'un enfant du siècle.' The poetry is fairly represented, and the extracts are preceded by a biographical notice of the poet by his brother, Paul de Musset. The volume is disfigured by a hideous reproduction of the well known portrait of Musset by Ch. Landelle.

An authoritative work from the Roman Catholic standpoint on the history of European civilization which should be abreast with the best scholarship of its time, has long been a desideratum. 'Les Origines de la Civilisation Moderne,' by Godefroid Kurth of the University of Liège, published a few months since, seems to promise us a work of that kind. The two volumes which have appeared extend from the Christian era through the age of Charlemagne. The ecclesiastical bias is very evident, and occasionally the influence of such a suggestive writer on the same period as Wilhelm Arnold is to be seen. But these things are too manifest to be of the slightest injury; indeed, a strong, decided, but thoroughly scholarly presentation of the Roman Catholic view of the history of civilization is exactly what is wanted. It is to be hoped that these two volumes may be only the beginning of a work on the whole course of European history. The author's treatment of the Reformation period will be awaited with special interest; and if it shall fulfil the promise of this beginning, it will be without doubt greatly superior to anything yet produced from a Catholic source on that age—beyond all comparison, for instance, above the much talked of, we may almost say notorious, work of Janssen.

V. Shenrok has published a sketch of Gogol's school life. One of the most urgent needs for the history of Russian literature is a proper biography of Gogol. Since the publication, nearly thirty years ago, of Kulish's book on this author, the subject has not received the requisite broad and thorough study, based on the materials at hand, which it demands, and Kulish's work is unsatisfactory in many respects. Gogol's inner life and his views of the world have formed the subject of acrid dispute up to a very recent period. Mr. Shenrok begins the work which is demanded with this study of Gogol's life during his school years and up to the date of his departure for Petersburg and his entrance into the service in 1831. The contents are: (1.) Ancestors; parents; the personality and influence of his mother. (2.) A brief sketch of his childhood up to his entrance at school; correspondence with his mother; his relations to his mother during his school years; the style of his letters. (3.) School life; his passion for reading and the theatre; his relations to his comrade Vuisotzky; his dissatisfaction with life in Nyezhin, and with his surroundings; his dreams of Petersburg, and life abroad. (4.) Conclusion of his course in Nyezhin, and change to Petersburg; his idyl of "Hans Kuchelgarten." (5.) First impressions in Petersburg, and first productions. (6.) A short review of his letters to his mother from 1829 31. (7.) His efforts to find a definite career in Petersburg. Further studies are suggested.

While, as we lately noticed, the Italian Government has put its hand to a complete edition of the works of Galileo, the firm known as the Successori Le Monnier will bring out at the same time a cheap but elegant edition which will be within the reach of every student.

The American Economic Association and the American Historical Association will hold their annual meetings in connection in Boston on May 21-25, mostly at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; but one session will be held at Harvard, and on the last day there will be an excursion to Plymouth, Mass. The Brunswick Hotel will be the common headquarters. Members intending to be present should address the Secretary of the Economic Association, Dr. Richard T. Ely, Baltimore.

—The Harvard Law Review, of which the first number appeared on April 15, and the 'Report of the Organization and First General Meeting of the Harvard Law School Association,' just published, evidence the deep interest which the students and the alumni of that excellent school take in its welfare. The Harvard Law Review is to appear monthly during the academic year. It is undertaken by the undergraduates, but the professors and several of the alumni of the school are among its promised contributors. The editors of the Review state that it is not intended to enter into competition with the established law journals, and that its primary object is to furnish news of interest to those who have studied at the Cambridge Law School, and to give all who are interested in legal education some idea of what is being done under the Harvard system of instruction. If the high standard of the first number is maintained, the editors will accomplish this and more. The article of Prof. James B. Ames on "Purchases for Value without Notice," is a scholarly treatment of one branch of that important subject. The article on "Tickets," by Joseph H. Beale, jr , one of the undergraduates, is a well-reasoned and thorough discussion which cannot fail to be of assistance to the practitioner. A publication which shall give to the profession the result of the careful work now being done by the professors of the Harvard Law School must be of substantial service to the bar; and we venture to predict that many of the contributions from the undergraduates will prove to be of permanent value. Mr. Morawetz's work, the 'Law of Private Corporation,' which was undertaken almost immediately upon his graduation from that school, shows what can be accomplished in the field of legal literature by able young men who have had the opportunity of acquiring proper methods of study and investigation. From the "Notes" we learn that a bequest of $50,000 (subject to a life estate) has been made to the Harvard Law School, to establish a professorship of international law. We also find there the following extract from President Eliot's last report, which will be of interest to law students: "It is good evidence of the value of the full three years' course (at the Law School), that for several summers past the school has been unable to fill all the places in lawyers' offices which have been offered it for its third-year students just graduating. There have been more places offered, with salaries sufficient to live on, than there were graduates to take them."

—The 'Report of the Organization, etc,' an excellently printed pamphlet of ninety-nine pages, will be read by many besides the members of the Association. Our readers will remember that the celebration of the 250th anniversary of the founding of Harvard College was opened by the "Law School Day." Judge O. W. Holmes, jr., delivered an oration at Sanders Theatre, and then some four hundred of the former members of the school dined together in Hemenway Gymnasium. Judge Holmes's oration and Prof. Langdell's address, which was delivered after the dinner, have been published already in the English Law Quarterly and several American periodicals, but it is a pleasure to read them again in their new dress. They, as also the address by Mr. James C. Carter, should be read by all who are interested in the subject of legal education. Prof. Langdell has given a clear exposition of the method of instruction now prevailing at the Harvard Law School, and both Judge Holmes and Mr. Carter, while approaching the subject from very different points of view, give strong testimony as to its value. Indeed, one feels, in reading these addresses and the other after-dinner speeches, that Prof. Langdell had, on November 5, 1886, quite as much a celebration as Harvard College. The picture of "Austin Hall" (the new Law School building) serves as a frontispiece, and the address of Prof. James B. Thayer, on the introduction of the study of the law at Cambridge, which was delivered at the dinner of the alumni of Harvard College on the Monday following, is found in the appendix. Both add to the interest and value of the Report.

—Mr. Aldrich is the poet of the May Atlantic. His piece is curiously compounded of three sonnets and an epilogue, and is written with unusual elevation and with a width of view that place it almost in the class of reflective poetry; but when one remembers how exact is the Parisian local color, and in what clear-cut swift pictures the scenes of the last Napoleonic régime are passed before the reader in preparation for the twilight soliloquy in the early autumn in the garden of the Tuileries, one must describe it as primarily imaginative. In other words, it is reflective without being didactic; while in compass of meaning and closeness of execution it is not rivalled by any recent contributions from our poets of distinction. It is in a vein seldom worked by its author, who is known too exclusively as a writer of lyrics; but work of this sort is nobler, and is, besides, perfectly modern and contemporary. We have so frequently remarked on the very instructive papers by Mr. Hamerton, in his comparative study of France and England, that it is hardly needful to call attention to his latest, in which he points out the great variety of each nation within its own limits. It is the sort of information most difficult to obtain for one's self, and, coming from one whose faculty of observation is so extraordinary in fineness and range, and whose judgment seems perfectly temperate, it is of quite inestimable value to the student of nations or of classes of men. One acquires from Mr. Hamerton not only information, but modes of looking at things, and hence one in search of culture can find no better modern books to bring out the mind than those he writes upon human life. The first chapter of the Emerson biography, which is here published in advance, is a sample of the work which will make readers impatient for the remainder. The period of boyhood only is dealt with, but the scene takes in much of New England life and character, and the hardships of the Emerson household and the bringing up of the boys are told with admirable directness. A plain New England home of the old time does not bear tampering with in the interest of a mistaken respectability, and that Mr. Cabot has shown such excellent sense and judgment is a good sign for the rest of the work.

—A memoir of great interest, on "Pictographs of the North American Indians," which is to form part of the forthcoming Annual Report of the Bureau of Ethnology, has been printed in a separate form for distribution among expected collaborators, as a means of obtaining further information on the subject. The memoir, though modestly entitled "a preliminary essay," is an elaborate work of more than 250 pages. The author, Col. Garrick Mallery, has undertaken to do for the subject of picture-writing what he has already accomplished for that of "sign-language." The two modes of expression have, in fact, as he points out, much in common, and are mutually illustrative. The nucleus of the present work is a very remarkable product of Dakota intelligence, which Col. Mallery had the good fortune to discover some ten years ago. It was published in 1877, under the title of "A Calendar of the Dakota Nation," in a bulletin of the United States Geological and Geographical Survey. The present reissue comprises many additional facts and explanations concerning this notable production. It is a pictorial chart, originally painted on a buffalo skin, in a peculiar spiral order, in which every year, beginning with the first year of the present century, is denoted by the picture of an object recalling to mind some remarkable event which occurred in that year. Though not precisely a history, it presents the primary elements of the annals from which history is made. The existence among these wild nomads of the West of such an ingenious method of preserving the knowledge of dates and events is a novel fact which will be a surprise to most persons. It has been confirmed by the discovery of several similar and perhaps still more important calendars, one of which (discovered by Dr. Wm. A. Corbusier, U. S. A) actually professes to go back to A. D. 900. The earlier portion of this remarkable chart is not given in the present work, on account of the expense of printing so many colored illustrations, but may be looked for in a future publication.

—These calendars—or "winter-counts," as the Indians style them—are supplemented by two very curious pictorial "rosters" or native censuses of Dakota bands, in which each family is ingeniously represented by some object recalling the name of its head. Many other illustrations are given, some now first published, and others added, for comparison, from the works of well-known authorities. The author refrains from theories in this tentative publication, but the conclusions to which the facts thus presented necessarily lead are clearly set forth. He finds that these pictographs, which represent the earliest stage of written language, are for the most part purely objective, or mere pictures denoting the objects depicted, or some person named from these objects. A smaller number are ideographic, suggestive of an abstract or generic meaning; and a very few are symbolic, involving a mystic interpretation. The latest stage of all, which had been attained by the Egyptians, and to some extent by the Mexicans—that in which the pictures express words or parts of words—had not been reached by these northern Indians. Their system, however, is shown to be much more elaborate and useful than had been supposed, and its study, on many accounts, is highly important. It is easy to foresee that Col. Mallery's work, even in its present form, will be a storehouse from which writers discussing the subjects to which it relates will draw freely for illustrations. It must rank among the best of the many valuable contributions to science by which our Ethnological Bureau has gained a reputation honorable to the country.

—In looking over the lately published volume of E. P. Whipple's essays on 'American Literature,' we come across a curious bit of unsympathetic hypercriticism. "Dwight," he says, "as a Latin scholar, occasionally felt called on to show his learning in his rhymes. Thus, in one of his poems he characterizes one of the most delightful of Roman lyrists as 'desipient' Horace. After a diligent exploration of the dictionary the reader finds that desipient comes from a Latin word signifying 'to be wise,' and that its English meaning is 'trifling, foolish, playful.' It might be supposed that in the whole range of English poetry there was no descriptive epithet so ludicrously pedantic; but, fortunately for our patriotism, we can convict Dryden of a still greater sin against good taste. In Dryden's first ode (1687) for St. Cecilia's Day we find the following lines:

> "'Orpheus could lead the savage race,
> And trees uprooted left their place,
> Sequacious of the lyre.'"

If Mr. Whipple had known his "delightful

lyrist" a little better, he would have recognized in the obnoxious epithet a playful allusion (a desipient allusion, let us say) to dulce est desipere in loco, and would have been less emphatic in his denunciation; but be evidently missed the point entirely. Dryden's sequacious, too, one might suppose, from the manner of quoting it, to be a ἅπαξ λεγόμενον, but it is to be found often enough in English prose, of the learned sort to be sure, and is not unexampled in poetry, as witness Thomson's "sequacious herd" and Smart's "sequacious earth." With Dryden it was no doubt a reminiscence of Virgil, who was fond of the word, and it is not out of place in treating a classical subject in the elevated style.

—The extracts from the 'Journal intime' of Benjamin Constant are continued in the Revue Internationale for March 10, and concluded in that for March 25. There is an interval of several years between the earliest of these extracts and those immediately preceding them in the number for February 25. Those now given begin May 15, 1811, with Constant's final departure from Switzerland and his subsequent residence with his wife in Germany until early in 1814. We hear only the last dying echoes of the tempests which agitated those early years of his marriage, and the references to Mme. de Staël gradually cease. From this time onward to the close of the Journal, the great interest and occupation of Constant's life was a political one, which nothing breaks in upon after the episode of Mme. Récamier. From this episode the editor gives comparatively few extracts, four or five pages in all from the daily entries extending over almost a year. These give the tone of the whole, however; and a comparison of them with Constant's letters to Mme. Récamier, written at the same time and published in part many years ago, is extremely interesting. So is the picture of Mme. Récamier herself, and the glimpses we have of Mme. de Krüdener. The public life of Benjamin Constant during the Hundred Days is the portion of his political career which has been most severely criticised. For this reason the passages in the Revue for March 25 have a greater value and even a greater interest than any others which have been selected. They extend from the return of Napoleon from Elba to September 26, 1815, when Constant, who had taken refuge in England at the second restoration of the Bourbons, finally returned to France. Here the Journal closes. The editor, M. Adrien Constant de Rebecque, has, however, added a short account of the last years of his relative, when he filled so large a place in the political world as a leader of the Liberal opposition to the Government of the Restoration, and, as he has been called, "the father of the Revolution of July." The impression made by those portions of the 'Journal intime' which have been given in the Revue is, upon the whole, favorable to Benjamin Constant, as compared with that produced by the articles of Sainte-Beuve published in 1840 and 1841 ('Portraits littéraires,' iii; 'Portraits contemporains,' v). The spirit of these articles is well represented by one of the comprehensive judgments of the great critic in "Un dernier mot sur Benjamin Constant." (Port. cont., v, 279), where he calls him "Celui que la popularité proclama un grand citoyen, et qui fut seulement un esprit supérieur et fin, uni à un caractère faible et à une sensibilité maladive." The Journal certainly shows anything but "une sensibilité maladive" in Benjamin Constant.

—The pleasantest feature of Prof. A. F. Pott's 'Allgemeine Sprachwissenschaft und Carl Abels Aegyptische Sprachstudien' is the evidence it brings that the veteran philologist still lives and interests himself with the old-time ardor in the science to which he has devoted his life. Pott is now eighty-four years old. His 'Etymologische Forschungen,' with which the history of scientific etymology may be said to begin, was published in 1833. For more than half a century he has been Professor of General Linguistic Science at Halle, and claims the honor of having been the first to bear that title. He has seen his science grow and change in remarkable ways. He has seen it outlive the contempt with which it was at first treated by the older classical philologists, and acquire the dignity of an indispensable branch of modern inquiry. He has witnessed the coming and going of schools and scholars and doctrines, and is now, perhaps, the only living representative of the original band of pioneers. Naturally enough, he looks out to-day upon kings who know not Joseph. At any rate, there are few philologists of distinction at the present time who would think it worth while to trouble themselves long about matters of the kind to which Prof. Pott devotes the above-named pamphlet. The publisher (W. Friedrich, Leipzig) announces that this work is the first of a series which is to appear under the name "Einzelbeiträge zur allgemeinen und vergleichenden Sprachwissenschaft." "Specialists have long regretted," he observes, "that manuscripts which exceed somewhat the usual length of an essay in one of the periodicals often cannot get into print," or the printing of them is delayed until they have become antiquated, and in any case they must be bought, if bought at all, in connection with other matter which is perhaps not wanted. So Herr Friedrich proposes to come to the rescue of the philological fraternity.

—Such an enterprise would seem to deserve success, but we fear it has not made a very auspicious beginning. Prof. Pott's pamphlet shows indubitable signs of old age. The first half of it is taken up with statements of, and reflections upon, various matters which have long been familiar to everybody who could possibly be interested in them. The latter half is devoted to some recent productions of Carl Abel, notably an essay, 'Gegensinn,' in which an attempt is made to rehabilitate the old lucus-a-non-lucendo theory in etymology; and a second opusculum, entitled 'Einleitung in ein Aegyptisch-Semitisch-Indoeuropäisches Wurzelwörterbuch.' Pott criticises Abel in the tone of one who is himself more than half in doubt whether he is not dealing with genuine and highly important discoveries. It does not seem to strike him that Abel's methods and theories are essentially identical with those that were in vogue before there was any such thing as a science of language. The world had often heard before of "Semitico-Aryan roots," and had made up its mind about them. Abel metamorphoses the old Centaur into a new Cerberus, and sets about those very feats of etymological prestidigitation at which Voltaire aimed his famous epigram.

BANCROFT'S BRITISH COLUMBIA.

History of the Pacific States of North America. By Hubert Howe Bancroft. Vol. XXVII.—British Columbia. 1792-1887. San Francisco: The History Co. 1887. 8vo, pp. xxi, 791.

THE indefatigable energy with which Mr. Bancroft pursues his important historical undertaking, in spite of serious disaster, is worthy of all respect. His latest volume exhibits the careful research, the candor, and the just intentions which have distinguished others of the series, and which, in a history, are certainly cardinal merits. It is unfortunate that they are accompanied and marred by some provoking drawbacks. One of these is inherent in the plan and proportions of the work. It seems to be considered necessary that the history of each separate State and province shall have at least one volume of a certain size devoted to it. In this instance, more than eight hundred solid octavo pages are given to a territory of little note, with the population of a fifth-rate American city, and with annals embracing nominally but ninety-five years, and in reality barely forty. The events of its history—if history such a loose collection of petty incidents can be called—are of the most insignificant character. No foreign or Indian war, no political revolution, no eventful enterprise falls to the historian to record. Any county of the Eastern States, settled in ante-Revolutionary times, would probably supply materials for a far more exciting narrative. Unluckily, also, the most interesting, as well as the largest, portion of the population—the Indian tribes—had to be in great part excluded from the volume, having been comprised in a former portion of the series. The same may be said of some of the most notable incidents of discovery, for which we are referred to the author's 'History of the Northwest Coast'; and for others still, the histories of Oregon, of California, and of Alaska are needed. Thus the purchaser of this ponderous book, unless he possesses the whole series, finds that, in spite of its huge dimensions, he has, after all, only half a history.

To fill out the allotted space, under these conditions, has been a task requiring all the compiler's ingenuity. A great part of the book is occupied with trifling occurrences and long-drawn narratives, which do not rise above the level of village gossip. The account of the gold discoveries, which fills nearly a third part of the volume, chronicles with wearisome minuteness the story of every "creek" and "branch" on which the adventurers made their temporary camps. With the same tedious particularity, the biography and traits of every person of any local prominence are discussed. The characters of two Hudson Bay traders—Dr. McLoughlin, the Company's jovial, hard-headed, and free-handed manager in Oregon, and Mr. (afterwards Sir James) Douglas, their shrewd, grasping, and unscrupulous agent in the Vancouver colony—are compared and contrasted with an elaboration and at a length (twelve pages) which an ordinary historian would not think of devoting to a comparison of Bismarck and Cavour.

As a work of literature, the history is almost beneath criticism. Short, jerky sentences, tawdry rhetoric, intolerable attempts at humor, with surprising faults of grammar which any ordinary proof-reader should have corrected, make it singularly unpleasant reading. The following passage, describing the intercourse of the English and Spanish captains, Vancouver and Bodega y Quadra, who were jointly surveying the coast, affords a really favorable specimen. A few unimportant sentences are omitted:

"Grace, mercy, and peace continue the order of the day. Vancouver offers to salute the Spanish flag, if Bodega y Quadra will return the compliment, which offer is gracefully accepted, and so from either side thirteen guns bellow forth honors.—The representatives of the august rival powers now eat much together, and talk in genuflections.—Letters pass, and deep diplomatism is in order. To whom shall belong the several shanties on this barbarous coast, is of primary importance to civilization. It is unnecessary to follow here the subtile logic of these ship-captains; the subject is exhausted in another place. Suffice it to say, in aught save urbanity and obeisance, they cannot agree. Bodega y Quadra is ready to draw the line on this shore between Spain and England; Vancouver's orders extend only to taking possession of his Majesty's huts. Jointly to glorify themselves, and likewise to make immortal the brotherly love which swells the breast of both commandants in their distinguished disagreements, Vancouver proposes, and Bodega y Quadra serenely smiles acquiescence, that the great island whereon they now sit shall for ever be known as Quadra and Vancouver Island."

To this is added, in a foot-note, what may probably claim the distinction of being the worst English sentence—if English it can be called—that has ever appeared in any history:

"Both commanders were well aware that in thus giving so large a body of land their joint names, and so recording it in the text and on the maps of the expeditions of Vancouver and of Galiano and Valdés, one, and but one, would remain, and that would depend entirely as to which nation the territory fell."

Mr. Bancroft himself can do much better than this, as his other volumes show; but if he chooses, in his peculiar method of book-making, to assume all the credit of the successes of his collaborators, he must be content to accept the responsibility of their failures.

Passing from these ungrateful topics, it is a pleasure to be able to commend the general spirit and temper in which the work is composed. As it treats of a foreign community, the author has very properly put himself on the side of the colonists, and has looked at their affairs in the light in which the people most concerned may be supposed to regard them. In some respects, indeed, he is more British Columbian than the British Columbians themselves. The disparaging criticisms with which some disappointed English emigrants have assailed the country are resented with as much warmth as might be shown by a resident of Victoria or New Westminster; and his anticipations of the future of the colony are as rose-colored as any local speculator in townsites could desire. If this is a fault, it is one which, under the circumstances, may fairly be said to lean to virtue's side. In one respect certainly his praises are no higher than the facts fully warrant. When the gold discoveries attracted to the wildest part of the Territory a miscellaneous crowd of adventurers from almost all civilized and many barbarous countries—from Europe, California, Australia, China, the Pacific Islands, and other regions—the respect for law and order which prevails in all British colonies made itself apparent and dominant with wonderful force and completeness. The rules prescribed by the authorities were everywhere implicitly respected. Not a single outbreak of lawless ruffianism is recorded. The contrast between this picture and that which the early gold-mining period of California presented may well be regarded with pride on the one side, and with shame—if a community can be made to feel shame—on the other.

The history of the colony, so far as it can be said to have a history, may be told in a few words. The first white occupants were the traders of the Hudson's Bay Company. Their possession lasted about twenty years—from 1830 to 1850. The emigration from the United States into Oregon made it evident that the territory north of the international boundary could not be kept much longer as a fur-trading preserve. The British Government determined to begin by making Vancouver Island a colony. The shrewd managers of the Company, naturally averse to the scheme, were able, by large promises and specious professions, to induce the Government to place the control of the colonizing operations in their charge. Their object, of course, was to delay the progress of settlement as long as possible. In carrying out this betrayal of their trust, they found a ready and useful instrument in Sir James Douglas. His ingenious devices for this object, including his farcical colonial legislature and ministry, composed of his own relatives and creatures, are well described in this volume. Then came the gold discoveries, and the rush of adventurers, scattering all the Company's precautions to the winds. Douglas hurried to the mainland, where a separate Government was hastily established and placed under his charge. He made some efforts, not ill-judged, but costly, to meet the exigencies of the situation, by opening roads, establishing courts, and appointing officers. Then the two colonies were united in one, and Douglas retired from a charge for which neither his talents nor his training fitted him. He left the colony overwhelmed with debt, and glad to throw it off upon the Canadian Confederation, which was just then established. With the true trader instinct, inherited from the founders of their community, the colonists, while gaining this great advantage, had the shrewdness to stipulate for one far larger. They required that the Dominion should undertake to construct a railroad from Eastern Canada to the Pacific within ten years. The confederated colonies undertook the task, which in their circumstances might well be styled stupendous, and have carried it out with admirable energy and thoroughness. The description of this great work forms one of the most satisfactory portions of Mr. Bancroft's volume.

The glowing prophecies which the author puts forth, in his temporary rôle of a British Columbian Micawber, hardly seem to be warranted by the facts. After a settlement of forty years, the white population does not exceed 30,000 souls. The greater part of the country has been well described as a "sea of mountains." A few tracts of arable land are scattered among the mountains; and in the far interior, about the headwaters of the Peace River, there is a considerable area of good prairie land, with a climate not too cold for wheat. The gold returns are gradually falling off; but coal of good quality, and fortunately situated, affords a valuable and increasing export. Doubtless other useful minerals will in time be discovered. Timber, chiefly pine, fir, cedar, and hemlock, is an important resource. The river and coast fisheries may be deemed, under proper regulations, inexhaustible elements of wealth. The transcontinental railway offers commercial advantages. A population of fishermen, miners, and traders, with some agricultural settlements scattered here and there, seems to promise for the country the character of an American Norway. It will have the advantage of a somewhat milder climate than that of its European prototype, with an equally hardy, intelligent, and law-loving people. The Lapps will be well represented by the Indians, who are fast acquiring a rude civilization, and will add a picturesque element to the population.

Some small maps, scattered through the work, afford useful aid to the reader. The principal map, however, is framed on a method now becoming common, against which a decided protest seems necessary. In this method, the map is first drawn on a large scale and then reduced by photography. With the greatest skill and care, the result is almost always unsatisfactory. When such skill and caution are not exhibited, the product is simply a repulsive nuisance. In the present instance the rivers are reduced to a hazy network of filaments, the mountains have vanished almost entirely, and most of the names of places are so contracted as to be only legible with the aid of a microscope. If by exhibiting this "frightful example" Mr. Bancroft shall succeed in expelling this detestable style of illustration from our geographical literature, he may feel the satisfaction of having accomplished a good work.

FRANKLIN IN FRANCE.

Franklin in France. From original documents, most of which are now published for the first time. By Edward E. Hale and Edward E. Hale, jr. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1887. Pp. xx., 478.

It is a little pathetic, to say the least, that the year 1840, in which the nearly 3,000 "Franklin papers" recently acquired by the United States Government were discovered in London, was the very year in which Dr. Sparks, writing the preface to his ten-volume edition of Franklin's works, referred with pardonable satisfaction to his "endeavors to make this edition a complete collection of the writings of Franklin." The precious documents now seen to supplement so largely what was previously known about Franklin's career, had then been lying for years on the top shelf of an obscure London shop; and the fact that they are now at last accessible to the student is chiefly due to the enterprise of the late Henry Stevens.

The "lost" Franklin papers have proved even unexpectedly rich. The "lost books" of Livy have been regarded by more than one modern historian as possibly exceeding in importance those which have been preserved to us; and if one were to choose what in a record of Franklin's career could least be spared, the best judgments would perhaps assign this preëminence to his services in France, from 1776 to 1785. Fortunately it is just in this period of his career that these "lost papers" are found to be exceptionally strong. Their recovery, therefore, is an event of uncommon literary interest—to say nothing of their historical interest—even in a literary history like Franklin's, which, as Mr. Bigelow has remarked, is "a succession of surprises." The gain in bulk in the successive editions of Franklin's works which have appeared is itself very noteworthy. The three-volume edition, brought out by William Temple Franklin in 1818-19, was long accepted as containing all the accessible material. Dr. Sparks's edition of twenty years later was the result of so much and so diligent searching of public and private sources that it contained "some 460 pieces" never before printed. Mr. Bigelow's edition, in turn, of which the first two volumes have just appeared, is, of course, based on the Stevens acquisition now first accessible, and will contain nearly 400 papers never before included either by Dr. Sparks or any of his predecessors.

Pending the completion of Mr. Bigelow's edition and the consequent utilization of the entire Stevens material, it has not unnaturally seemed proper to the Messrs. Hale that different editors should attack, as they say, "different parts of the collection, and bring forward for the use of the public such documents, before unpublished, as are of the most value." The scope of the volume now before us is expressed in its title. It comprises such portions of the collection as relate to five of the years spent by Franklin in France, namely, 1776-1781. There is hardly a period which could be of more interest to a student of American history. The success which the American colonies ultimately attained was due scarcely more to Washington's efforts in the field than to Franklin's in European diplomacy. So recently as 1880 an acute writer in the Edinburgh Review has declared that "so far as any historical events can be appropriated to individuals, those two men were the joint authors of the great republic."

Mr. Hale has added to the interest of the present volume by prefacing it with a chapter on "France and the Treaty of 1763." And, in truth, any study of Franklin's connection with this period which should fail to look well before the event and well after it likewise, would be manifestly inappropriate. It was through no accident of good judgment that Franklin's services proved to be so invaluable to his country. It was because his was by nature one of those rare minds which are constantly accustomed to look before and after, in entering upon any action. So far back as 1754, we find him in the Albany Congress advocating measures which almost startle one by the extent to which they anticipate the discussions of 1776 and 1787, and displaying an extraordinary political prescience. In 1783 he saw clearly the bearing of the Peace of Paris upon the dreams of France for colonial extension, and his perception of this fact was no doubt constantly in his mind in all his negotiations with Vergennes, fifteen years later. In 1774 his mind seems to have deliberately relaxed its hold on the notion that the hope of the colonies could be placed longer on what Parliament could or would do for them. From that time he acted as if assured that the help of the colonies was to be found in their own endeavors alone.

Franklin was not at the outset in favor of direct efforts to secure the opening of diplomatic negotiations with the European Powers. To use his own expressive language, he held that "a virgin State should preserve the virgin character, and not go about suitoring for alliances, but wait with decent dignity for the applications of others." In this, he says, he "was overruled," largely through the persistent efforts of John Adams, who was the chief advocate of the measures for securing alliances. What the colonies would have gained or lost, had some other mind than Franklin's been the influential one in the negotiations actually undertaken, can only be a matter of conjecture; yet, with all we now know on the subject, we can only be thankful that Franklin's was the controlling mind—that his dignified and self-possessed personality was the agency by which America was represented abroad. Certainly there would have been no gain in dignity had the chief control been in the hands of John Adams. His correspondence with Vergennes in 1780 is the very best evidence on that point. Certainly Silas Deane would have been no gain; nor would Arthur Lee, whose apparently selfish malevolence is coming to be more and more generally interpreted as insanity. Franklin's conduct, like that of all men whose work is for posterity, was not wholly understood by his contemporaries—not wholly, indeed, by the writers of our own generation, as we shall have occasion presently to observe. But in the light of history his services are seen to be of the enduring kind.

The "knowledge of the end," says Sir Arthur Helps, we must regard as "one of the most dangerous pitfalls which beset the writers of history." Seldom has this truth been so well exemplified as in the case of the French alliance; for it has been entirely too common for recent writers, seeing what strong reasons could be urged in its favor, to treat it as a foregone conclusion and a matter of course. When, however, as in the volume before us, we are enabled to see what was in the minds of the actors on both sides, the event is perceived to be only the resultant of strongly opposing tendencies. No doubt it was true, and by no one was it more strongly urged than by Franklin, that the Treaty of Paris in 1763 was for France the source of the bitterest disappointment and resentment towards England; that an opportunity to humble her ancient rival in an equally signal manner was precisely what France was most anxious to discover; and that by taking a hand in the struggle between England and her revolted colonies, there was a preëminently effective method available for paying an old score. It was, moreover, natural that France should take an interest in permanently establishing on the opposite side of the Atlantic a friendly Power, capable of carrying on a flourishing commerce with her, and contributing to the enrichment of French merchants. But there was another side. Our authors have outlined it very forcibly.

"Was it natural," they ask, that France "should desire to aid these American colonies to gain their independence? Revolution against kings was no more a part of the Bourbon creed in 1776 than in 1820, the days of the Holy Alliance. Would Louis XVI. care to join a Revolutionary army, even against an inveterate foe? And again, these colonists were men who twenty years before had stood shoulder to shoulder against the French regiments in America, had marched with the Iroquois against Quebec and Montreal. George Washington, their general, was that very leader of the provincials who was associated painfully in the minds of the French, by the Jumonville affair, with that war which had ended in the expulsion of the French from America."

These are the ideas, it must be borne in mind, which were constantly in the minds of both parties to these diplomatic negotiations. There was another idea present, no doubt, in the minds of both. Vergennes hoped, the American Commissioners feared, that the pressure of events might force the American people into a decidedly compromising attitude of armed alliance with France against her enemies. Franklin knew well enough that it would be a sad day for the young nation should the result prove to be merely a change of masters. The yoke would be no easier to wear because Gallic rather than British.

The papers here printed for the first time are particularly numerous for the important years 1778 to 1780, and show very plainly how persistently overtures were received from those who were then acting for Great Britain, up to the very date of the French Treaty. In a letter to David Hartley, dated February 1, 1778 (almost on the eve of the signing of the treaty), Franklin says (quoting a saying of Ariosto, that things lost on earth are to be found in the moon), that "there must be a good deal of good advice in the moon. If so, there is amongst it a good deal of mine, formerly given and lost in this business. I will, however, at your request, give a little more, but without the expectation that it will be followed; for none but God can, at the same time, give good counsel and wisdom to make use of it." Later in the same year he writes again to this same friend of his in England—who, by the way, is seen to have had some intimate connection with Lord North's reconciliation scheme of 1778. He declares that the conduct of Great Britain has "extinguished every thought of returning to it, and separated us for ever. You have thereby lost limbs that will never grow again."

The papers here printed come to an end in 1781, leaving one to infer, though it is not expressly stated, that beyond that point the Stevens collection has nothing new to give us. Additional light on so interesting a matter as the Treaty of 1783 with England would indeed have been interesting, but, with the richness we have in the letters now printed, we certainly cannot complain. Especially welcome is the light here thrown on what have perhaps been the two principal points of obscurity in connection with the French negotiations. The first of these is concerned with the question how far the French Government wished and was willing to be committed to coöperation with America in the years 1776 to 1778. That the position in which the French Government held itself was an anomalous one, has always been felt. That it was distinctly meant to be anomalous is what is now seen to be the case. All of Vergennes's "diplomatic skill and clever astuteness," say our authors, were applied "to maintain France" in this very position, neither openly committed in favor of an American alliance nor, on the other hand, opposing in out-and-out fashion such an alliance. Many hitherto dark matters find their solution here, including "secret aid" to America, rendered through the fictitious firm of "Roderique Hortalez & Co.," rather than outright by the French Government; the temporizing replies of Vergennes to Lord Stormont, the British Ambassador; the palpable, yet apparently deliberate, violations of international law perpetrated by the cruisers under Conyngham and Wickes, with the knowledge of Franklin and Vergennes. When, as they inevitably did, questions arose as to the disposition to be made of the captured vessels, say our authors, "according to public international law, as understood to-day, every one of them would be answered in the negative." From more than one point of view, then, the news of Burgoyne's surrender was a most welcome event, precipitating as it did the change from this anomalous state to that which made the signing of the treaty a necessity.

Of no less importance is the light here thrown on the attitude of Franklin himself during the later years of his stay in France. The grave charge of subserviency to Vergennes has long lain against him, deliberately made in the first instance by John Adams in a letter printed as one of the "public documents" of the "Diplomatic Correspondence." The charge has been many times repeated, and as recently as three years ago by one of Adams's biographers, who says: "He comfortably agreed with de Vergennes and quite contentedly fell in with that minister's policy." While nothing here furnished can be denominated a confutation in set terms of the opinion expressed by Mr. Adams and his biographers, yet the numerous letters to and from Vergennes during these years, now for the first time printed, show anything but a subservient spirit on the part of Franklin. They do, indeed, in several instances show an apparent belief that Mr. Adams was incapable of comprehending the true bearing of events, and an unwillingness, possibly a blameworthy unwillingness, to undeceive him.

We have already referred to the conditions of the Treaty of Paris in 1763 as an antecedent circumstance to be considered in any view of Franklin's negotiations in France. No less important in its bearing on these negotiations are the relations into which this country was later brought with France, during the years 1789 to 1815. The necessity for avoiding "entangling alliances" with any foreign Power was seen by Franklin and others many years before the time of Hamilton and the composition of Washington's farewell address. John Adams himself was perfectly sound on this point, and in his Autobiography wrote (though many years after the event) "that our negotiations with France ought, however, to be conducted with great caution, and with all the foresight we could possibly obtain; that we ought not to enter into any alliance" "which should entangle us in any future wars in Europe; that we ought to lay it down, as a first principle and a maxim never to be forgotten, to maintain an entire neutrality in all future European wars." And he adds, a little later on, "that our real, if not our nominal, independence would consist in our neutrality." This last remark is of a weight and significance not fully realized by Adams when he wrote it, nor could either Franklin or Adams have seen in 1778 or 1783 how vitally significant it was destined to become. Franklin died without being further enlightened on this point, but Adams lived to have it painfully impressed upon him that a real, as distinguished from a nominal, independence could indeed scarcely be claimed for the United States until after the peace of 1815, concluding the second war with Great Britain. The semi-dependent condition of the American Government during the earlier administrations, exposed alike to the warring factions of French partisans and English partisans within our own borders, and to the insolent exactions of English and French authorities alike outside the limits of the country, came too near to realizing the truth of Adams's words. That these entanglements, however, might have been more serious and much more compromising, had Vergennes been more of a match for Franklin, no one can doubt.

We have spoken of the aim of the Messrs. Hale in this volume to make it a work which will appeal to the interest of the public. We are heartily glad that they have made it so. The public can hardly know too much or have too intelligent an opinion about Franklin's career or services. Franklin's Autobiography, it is true, is one of the few autobiographies in the English language which have been read by all classes of society. By means of it, the public mind has become familiarized with many features of Franklin's personality and private history. The story of his winning for his country a place among the nations of the earth deserves to be equally familiar to every American citizen.

AMONG the many phobias, or morbid fears, now quite well defined, is mysophobia, or fear of dirt, first described in 1878, which impels the patient to wash every object he must touch, and to wash the hands after dreaded contact with everything more palpable than thin air, often scores of times a day, to avoid pollution or contamination. Its analogue we may call hylephobia, or morbid fear of materialism, also a very modern distemper, which afflicts now and then a philosopher with a horror of contact with the fresh facts of science so necessary to his survival in the world of modern thought, and impels him to try to purge every element of matter from facts he cannot escape. Prof. Bowne's book is, in a word, a labored effort to deneuralize the mind. Instead of being neuro-physically interpreted, as most of the best and latest researches now suggest, he pleads that the psycho-physic law is purely psychic. The doctrine of "specific energy" is true, not of the nerves as every one has held before, but of the soul. The so-called cerebral theory is "a set of fantastic and grotesque whimsies." The mind must not be conceived as extended in space, etc. He repudiates the use of "madhouse and hospital stories" in psychology, yet has much to say of aphasia, of sleep, and morbid mental phenomena later. This suggests a sentence from Galton's 'Mental Imagery' (p. 68). After speaking of the "floods of light" thrown "by the every-day experiences of the madhouse," he adds: "No professor of metaphysics or psychology or religion can claim to know the elements of what he teaches unless he is acquainted with the ordinary phenomena of idiocy, madness, and epilepsy. He must study the manifestations of disease and congenital folly as well as those of society and high intellect." Again, Prof. Bowne thinks that in his book "many will not find what they want, and probably still more will find what they do not want." This, by the way, is almost the precise claim made, as we remember, by a book-maker against whom Anthony Comstock waged legal warfare. Our author's case is, of course, far less serious, and this remark merely betrays, like so much else in the book, the painful self-consciousness of a man in a field where he is but little at home.

This is shown not only by many errors, some of them grave, which should be here noticed in detail were there not a worse fault that demands our space, but by the hardihood of assertion about many matters as to which no well-informed man—least of all an expert—would venture any positive statement. Here at once both the dogmatic habit of the metaphysician and the 'prentice-hand of the novice are plain. Prof. Bowne reiterates, with many and ingenious variations, the trite but still grand old formulæ of objurgation which Kant first taught men to use against sceptics and dogmatists. All we can know is soul and its present states, and not brain, or light, or vibrations, or matter, or future or past, as such. There is nothing in the world but consciousness, which unites its own manifold states, manifests itself spontaneously in feeling and in will, which is a free first cause, being both ultimate and undefinable in other terms. Herbart was wrong in saying mind is constituted by the reactions and collisions of ideas upon each other. We agree to this, too, but think even that better than to make it seem to be the mutual action and reaction of words. There are processes of disinfection that are more dangerous than the disease. The restatement of the venerable problems of philosophy in terms of neurology, psycho-genesis, and anthropology gives them definiteness, makes them real and pressing, and is already making the present an era in the history of philosophic thought by applying solutions and better working hypotheses to education, administration, economics, experimental research, etc. To invoke here again the reign of chaos and old night is simply to repel from idealism every vigorous and able young mind that both needs it to live by, and must, by a deep and healthy instinct, abhor all such colloquative mysticism in an age and land like ours. There is absolutely no such antagonism between experiment and introspection, the material and the ideal, the cerebral and the mental, as is here asserted. Rather the active co-operation of these two methods is the new hope of true philosophy and of religion. Historical idealism and empirical scientific psychology are the two tools which every one who would speak to be heard in the very near future must learn to use together like mathematics and physics. We can only deplore in this volume a spirit so unlike that of Lotze, whom the author followed with such fidelity in an earlier work, or that of Prof. Alexander, who says: "There are two common mistakes—one, the denunciation of physiological methods by men who have never seen a ganglion cell; the other, the denunciation of subjective methods by men who have never given an hour to introspection. It does not appear to be necessary, however, that a knowledge of one set of facts should be incompatible with a knowledge of the other set. A combination of the two is the ideal psychology." There is a narrowness of view, a lack of knowledge and valuation of facts, and a petty violence of spirit about this book in striking contrast with every other book in our list, and still more so with the broad and scholarly work of Prof. Ladd, which makes a book like this quite superfluous.

Dr. Dewey states that "what is ordinarily called physiological psychology cannot aid psychology directly; the mere knowledge of all the functions of the brain and nerves does not help the science, except so far as it occasions a more penetrating psychological analysis and thus supplements the deficiencies of introspection." Psychology is defined as "the science of the reproduction of some universal content or existence, whether of knowledge or action, in the form of individual, unsharable consciousness": and consciousness, we are told, cannot be defined or described, but is presupposed in all definitions. The standpoint is thus that of absolute idealism. There is no sense of antagonism and there is more information than in the preceding work, but the author is far too intent on expressing the doctrines of the above creed than on the clear, succinct statements of demonstrated facts, which a text book, in the present condition of psychology, should chiefly attempt. The disappointment of several instructors we know, who hoped to find this in it, is dire. The unusual ability and promise of the author are abundantly manifest, and we are confident that we only anticipate by a few years his own regretful verdict of his work. What so many teachers now want is a simple outline of such leading chapters—each soon to be represented, we trust, by a volume—as time, space, images, binocular vision, the Weber-Fechner law, dreams, hallucinations, and will—each the centre of a large new literature, and of great and deepening interest. These studies can never make the world seem less, but more, ideal and miraculous to young men. The literature which Dr. Dewey cites at the end of chapters, though there is abundant internal evidence that it was an after-thought, is the most helpful part of the book, yet is not utilized in the text; and nearly every author he cites would not agree with the argument, for such it is, of his book.

The contrast between these two books and the others on our list in spirit and method is vast. Prof. Alexander's work consists of eighteen articles, all but the last (on Cause and Effect) brief. The Immortality of the Soul is discussed in two pages; the Atheistic Meaning of Pantheism in one; the Problem of the Will in two; the Ego in two, etc. Those who measure merit by pages will have nothing but contempt for all this. But the absence of philosophic verbigeration and long-winedness, the direct, simple, well-bred statement of results, the rapid sketching of the main outlines of the immortal problems of human life and duty, is most pleasing and effective. It is possible by a simple apparatus to apply a heavy weight to the tactile surface of the human skin so very gradually that the finger may be almost crushed, and not only no pain, but no increase of pressure felt, while even a very small weight, falling on the skin from a very small height, may be acutely felt. So in writing there is probably no thinker so feeble that he cannot make his wisdom impressive by sufficient concentration, or so-able that diffuseness is not fatal to effectiveness. This no more implies that conciseness is feebleness than that prolixity is ability. No less admirable than the pedagogic tact and insight and modesty is the breadth of sympathy shown in this volume, which is not worked by the method of exhausting thought-possibilities, but by all-sided open-mindedness.

Probably the most commendable book on our list is the little volume by Prof. Fullerton, which is a logical and psychological analysis of the mathematical antinomies and of the Infinite. A somewhat abstruse but important and clearly defined problem is carefully examined in good historical light, and the conclusion is reached that, contrary to views now widely current, the Infinite is "neither contradictory nor beyond the grasp of the human mind," and is, in fact, a very common conception as well as real, and consonant with experience and with the Christian doctrine of immortality. It is a work that every student of Kant should know, and is a really valuable contribution to an important topic.

The new volumes of President McCosh, following so soon his volume on Psychology, indicate at first sight most extraordinary activity from a man of his extended administrative responsibilities, to say nothing of ripening years. But the intending reader should be plainly told beforehand that much of the material has been printed before, in pamphlets, articles in magazines, etc., and some of it substantially long ago, especially the logical part. Except the historical continuity of the second volume, topics succeed each other in the most disconnected way, which might be indefinitely varied. There is much irrelevance, which sometimes drops almost into garrulity. Uncle Toby's stockings, which are chosen as the insignia of the "system," are darned with many colors, new and old, but the original Scotch texture is still seen. The author's idea of an "American philosophy," for which he pleads (and which is, so far as its ethical aspects go, less absurd than the postulate of an American chemistry or mathematics would be), is probably illustrated by such eclecticism. Next to the American realism for which he pleads, the author is most open-minded towards physiological psychology, the importance of which is clearly seen. Despite his long and vigorous polemic against him, it is plain that he has inner leanings to much of the drift of Herbert Spencer; but Hegel, and especially Kant, he cannot abide, because they represent idealism, and he criticises them at great length. "Surely," he says, "no one would give ideality a place in science as science. Idealism has no place in philosophy any more than in science. Philosophy will never be properly established till this is acknowledged." Here we have the same sort of blindness to the most important lessons of historical philosophy, from Plato to Hegel, that we complained of in the first writers on our list towards inductive psychology, both involving, as we profoundly believe, the gravest loss to their pupils in the entailment of prejudices which seriously hinder the unfoldment of mental powers and future effectiveness in dealing with a large class of problems in a field where the very strongest of all pedagogic stimulus, the deepest insights, and the most steadying poise can be given to young men by a teacher of catholic sympathies, even if he have no more of a system than realism. After all, however, we cannot refrain from admiration of the vigor, receptivity, clearness, and pedagogic power displayed in these curious volumes.

Le Romantisme français. A Selection from Writers of the French Romantic School. 1824-1848. By Thomas Frederick Crane, A.M., Professor of the Romance Languages in Cornell University. 16mo, pp. xlvii, 362. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1887.

PROF. CRANE is seeking and finding new paths in his specialty. A few years ago, in collaboration with others, he published his 'Tableaux de la Révolution française,' which has proved to be an excellent elementary reader on a plan hitherto little tried. He now presents a work of higher aims, and more novel in character and arrangement. As he says in his preface, no attempt had been made before his own to group the principal writers of what has been called the Romantic movement, and to give by extracts an idea of the literary school of which Victor Hugo is the greatest name. 'Le Romantisme français' is not a book for elementary students, and Prof. Crane very wisely has not tried by notes of an elementary character to bring it within the reach of a beginner. He has succeeded, consequently, in making a book the interest of which is due as much to what he personally contributes to it as to the extracts he presents. These extracts fill 322 pages, and there are 40 pages of notes, which the editor might easily have extended to twice that number had he not used the utmost discretion. In making notes to such erratic writers as Hugo and Gautier, it is difficult to know where to stop. Prof. Crane has not allowed himself to display any useless erudition. What he says is just enough to make the passage annotated intelligible, and he leaves enough unexplained to allow the student to think out for himself difficulties of style or construction. The twenty pages of Introduction are such a good and clear statement of the literary movement in France between the years 1824 and 1848, that it is to be regretted that the editor could not have developed his ideas more fully. As he shows such discriminating tact in what he has chosen to say and to leave unsaid, he will certainly see the justice of the following remark. As an instructor he must know too well the disturbing influence of unnecessary information not to feel that in referring to Lamartine, for instance, it is enough to call him by his name, or at the most to write Alphonse de Lamartine, and not Alphonse de Prat de Lamartine—a compromise, after all, for the whole name, as it is found in biographical and bibliographical dictionaries, is Alphonse-Marie-Louis Prat de Lamartine, though the addition of Prat is condemned by the latest authorities, as may be seen in the just-published work of M. Émile Faguet, 'Études littéraires sur le dix-neuvième siècle,' p. 73 (Paris: Lecène & Oudin; Boston: Schoenhof). It also adds little to the information of a student of literature to begin speaking of George Sand as Amantine-Lucile-Aurore Dupin, especially in such a condensed review as is here given of her work.

Prof. Crane's list of books to be consulted on the Classic and Romantic theories is very good, very rich, and just what it should be in an educational work. To the excellent references on p. xi, on the dramatic unities, one might have been added as being easily accessible, viz.: the chapter on "The Three Unities," in Mr. T. S. Perry's 'English Literature in the Eighteenth Century.' It was, of course, not the editor's intention to give in nine pages an exhaustive list of works on Hugo, George Sand, and the rest. What he has given shows discrimination and taste, and the short remarks about many of the books cited could have been made only by one thoroughly conversant with the literature of the whole subject.

In his Introduction, as well as in his extracts, Prof. Crane limits himself to what was accomplished by the Romantic movement in poetry, fiction, and criticism. The lion's share is justly given to Victor Hugo. Alfred de Musset and Théophile Gautier are generously dealt with; George Sand, Balzac, and Mérimée are also fairly represented. Sainte-Beuve, as the critic of the school, has about twenty pages. There are no other writers. The editor's answer to the objections that might be made to this limitation is that, by a judicious elimination, he has been able to present, in many cases, complete works, "long enough to give a fair idea of the author's style." This is very true, and satisfactorily accounts for the total omission of the drama and of many minor writers. But it may be regretted that one extract, at least, from Michelet was not given to show how the Romantic movement reached beyond the regions of fiction and poetry. It would also add to the fulness of the impression left by the volume if in a few, a very few, cases one characteristic poem or page were given from some of the Romantic writers who had their day of brilliant success in the thirties, like Gérard de Nerval and Émile Deschamps. The celebrated "Sonnet d'Arvers," would be a graceful addition to any volume on the Romantic movement.

"Mon âme a son secret, ma vie a son mystère,"

It would be invidious to close this notice with anything that might seem to find fault with Prof. Crane's volume. He has given an excellent selection of the best and most characteristic French Romantic poetry and prose. He has enriched school literature with a book fit to be put into the hands of the most advanced pupils. He has shown that scholarly work, worthy to be ranked with what has often been done for the Greek and Latin classics, can be produced in treating the literary productions of the nineteenth century. We are glad to learn that it is Prof. Crane's intention to continue his work at some future time by a volume on French society in the seventeenth century, in its relations to the literature of that period, which will consist of extracts from contemporary memoirs, letters, and novels. This will be a very desirable and practical commentary upon the classical French writers usually read in colleges, and valuable as an introduction to the more modern literature.

Gazetteer of the British Isles, Statistical and Topographical. Edited by John Bartholomew, F.R.G.S. Edinburgh: Adam and Charles Black; New York: Scribner & Welford. 1887.

A READY welcome awaits this work, which has been long needed. One finds in it political subdivisions down to parliamentary and municipal boroughs, parishes, villages, hamlets, hundreds, and liberties; and, besides these, railroad stations, castles, halls, seats, with forest and moor as well as lake, river, and mountain. Even schools of the larger sort have a place in the alphabet: even Scotland Yard is separated from the metropolis. A cave entrance, like Speedwell Mine, is found in its alphabetical place. The scale of treatment may be judged from Liverpool, which fills a column and a quarter, and London, which demands eight. Wales, as a principality, is allowed a separate article, but none is given to England, Scotland, or Ireland. The English poverty of invention in town nomenclature, or the proof of a former isolation through imperfect means of communication, is shown in the case of the Newtons, whose number, if not past counting, is not easily stated. The origin of the curious name of Portobello is explained, but there is no systematic attempt to do this, even by interpreting once for all the commoner suffixes, such as -ford, -ham, -bury, -by, -caster, etc., with an indication of their geographical distribution, or by showing the great part which rivers play in the naming of towns. The historic and literary associations, however, are well remembered, and the former often reveal the etymology. The population is given according to the census of 1881, together with the present parliamentary representation. The market day—any day but the first two of the week—is stated for market towns. The leading industries are noted—that of London being, we are told, brewing. We miss specific mention of the great cycling industry of Coventry. Girton College is remembered, while Newnham is overlooked. Our eye detects by chance the absence of a cipher by which Chelmsford is placed 3 miles from London instead of 30.

The appendices decidedly enhance the value of this gazetteer. Meteorological and vital statistics are tabulated with great fulness, and the census figures displayed in one view. One sees how the inhabitants of Ireland, exceeding 8,000,000 in 1841, had fallen off a million and a half when first enumerated after the famine, and have almost steadily declined, till 1881 marked a decrease of 3,000,000 in forty years. Occupations, agriculture, railways, commerce; parliamentary representation according to the redistribution of 1885—such are some of the useful data to be found here. Twenty-three maps, physical, geological, meteorological, political; of birth and death rate; of stock; of lighthouses, etc., etc., complete the sources of instruction. Among these, that of Scotland colored for density of population is most striking to any one who is accustomed to think of the entire peninsula when estimating North Britain as a factor in the United Kingdom.

Sketches and Impressions, Musical, Theatrical, and Social (1799-1885), from the after-dinner talk of Thomas Goodwin. By R. Osgood Mason. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1887.

MR. MASON'S little volume is a readable contribution to the history of amusements in New York and London. Mr. Thomas Goodwin was a music-librarian in this city, who died in 1886, aged eighty-seven years. The first twenty-eight years of his life were spent in London, and accordingly 140 pages are devoted to certain notable events in that city—Nelson's funeral, the first production of Haydn's "Creation," John Kemble's Shaksperian revivals, reminiscences of Mrs. Siddons, Edmund Kean, etc. In 1827 Mr. Goodwin came to New York, requiring for the passage sixty-eight days, at a time when it had been "scientifically demonstrated that no vessel could cross the ocean by steam, because no vessel could carry sufficient fuel for the purpose." Quite as primitive as the facilities for international travel were the musical and theatrical affairs of the city at that period: "In the theatres boots were sometimes seen reposing unrebuked upon the upholstered rail in front of the boxes of the third and even the second tier; though, after Mrs. Trollope's book came out, this display was often met by the observant occupants of the 'pit' with the cry, 'Trollope, Trollope! Boots, boots!' Boots, thus becoming conspicuous as an object of observation from all parts of the house, quietly but promptly disappeared."

The most interesting chapter in the book relates to the Philharmonic Society and the musical societies which preceded it. The Philharmonic was the first permanent musical organization in the city which had regular concerts and evenings for rehearsals. It had four conductors the first season. Beethoven's fifth symphony was the opening piece of the first concert, which took place on December 7, 1842; and this symphony has for forty-five years remained one of the favorite numbers in the Society's repertory. "The rehearsal of Beethoven's symphony in C minor for the first concert in 1842 is frequently spoken of by the few original members now alive and who participated in it, as something wonderful for its roughness; and the frantic efforts of the conductor, U. C. Hill, to obtain a pianissimo, or even a tolerable piano, are mentioned with a smile."

One of the most amusing anecdotes in Mr. Mason's book is told of the famous 'cellist Robert Lindley. One day when on his way to a music festival the stage-coach, which contained him and other musicians, was upset. No one was hurt, but on counting the passengers Lindley was found missing. Suddenly a strain of music was heard from a churchyard close by. "On making search they found Lindley sitting on the edge of a tombstone, examining his pet instrument, now sounding the various parts gently with his knuckles and now trying the chords, perfectly oblivious of everything about him." Suddenly he noticed his companions, and stammered out: "I was f-f-fearfully afraid my f-fine old 'cello was f-f-for ever ruined, but that strong case saved it, I d-do believe."

The Christian Platonists of Alexandria. By Charles Bigg, D.D. Oxford: At the Clarendon Press; New York: Macmillan & Co. 1886.

THE author of these Bampton lectures brought to their delivery not only ample preparation, but also the skill to treat his subject in well-proportioned parts, and the courage to seem less learned than he was in order that he might be more generally apprehensible, and give his lectures something of literary form. It is easy to imagine how futile and unbearable the lectures would have been as heard if he had attempted to empty into them the learning which, in his printed notes, makes up an amount of matter nearly or quite equal to the body of the text. The arrangement of the material is excellent. The first lecture is upon Philo and the Gnostics, after some introductory matter on the Alexandrian Jews and the Septuagint translation of the Hebrew Scriptures (assigned to 300-150 B. C.). The treatment of Philo is extremely sympathetic. The same is true of the author's treatment of the great Alexandrian Christians, Clement and Origen. It would be hard to find a book with less odium theologicum, or less disposition to warp the teachings the author exhibits into the service of his own ecclesiastical opinions. The treatment of the Gnostics, if it errs at all, certainly does not err on the side of adverse criticism. Dr. Bigg says: "The interest, the meaning, of Gnosticism rest entirely upon its ethical motive. It was an attempt, a serious attempt, to fathom the dread mystery of sorrow and pain, to answer that spectral doubt which is mostly crushed down by force—Can the world as we know it have been made by God?" But the attempt seems to us to have been made almost entirely from the intellectual side. The intellectualism of Gnosticism was its most striking characteristic. Its enthusiasm was all for daring speculation. It had the Hindu vice of devotion to Gnosis, knowledge, as the saving good of life.

It is strange how many things are written here, apparently with little or any consciousness of courage, which in the 'Essays and Reviews' of 1859 would have brought a storm about the writer's ears. What an allowance that the strength of Gnosticism was in its Old Testament exegesis, which was extremely hostile, and that this "was so powerful because it was so true"! Equally remarkable is the allowance of Alexandrian elements in the Fourth Gospel, and of the gradually evolved distinction of priests and bishops in the course of centuries. Still more remarkable is the credit given to the Gnostics for the preservation of St. Paul's Epistles. Renan is not more explicit on this head; and probably he would agree with Dr. Bigg that the Gnostic admiration for St. Paul was a ground of orthodox neglect.

The second lecture is upon Clement, and is interesting in showing how extremely loose and vague were the conceptions which a few centuries later became hard as rock and as fixed as they were hard. Lecture three continues the account of Clement's teaching. His allegorical interpretation is dwelt upon. Already the six days of Genesis were not six literal days, though they were far enough from being Hugh Miller's geologic periods. The pages relating to the Eucharist could have met with little favor from the ritualists of Oxford, showing as they do how slightly ritualistic was the Eucharist in Clement's time, and how little magical or sacramental. Three lectures upon Origen follow those upon Clement. We feel that we are in the presence of a larger mind, a richer personality, but the difference of opinion is not great.

The point at which these lectures have distinctest reference to present controversies in the English Church, as well as in America, is that of future punishment. Clement and Origen were frank Restorationists, and Dr. Biggs's sympathy with them in this particular is undisguised. For "the Unitarian Channing," "the Buddhist ascetic," and "even the naked savage on his sea-swept coral reef," there is hope. "We believe that one star differeth from another star in glory, and in these words lies all that any sober-minded man has ever maintained." Then there have been many Christians who have not been sober-minded.

The chapter on "The Reformed Paganism" is one of the most interesting in the book, and that on Celsus is the most interesting part of it. Such a mere name to spit upon is Celsus in ordinary polemics that it is good to have him made real to us, and to have him treated with respect. The pages upon Apollonius of Tyana are in perfect agreement with Dr. Réville's admirable monograph, 'The Pagan Christ of the Third Century.' The comparison between Origen and Augustine in the closing chapter is generally adverse to the latter. One does not like to doubt the course of history, but it is impossible not to feel how much more genial and humane the Christian centuries would have been if they had been dominated by the mind of Origen rather than by that of Augustine.

Fine Arts.

THE ACADEMY EXHIBITION.—II.

"STUBBORN," No. 338, by Louis Moeller, is a small picture, representing three old men in an apartment in which law books and papers, dictionaries and encyclopædias, are scattered about on the table and strewn over the floor. The old men are apparently in the heat of an argument, one of them yet unconvinced being the central figure, and he is shown as emphasizing his convictions with a determined gesture, which leaves no doubt as to his opinion on the matter under discussion. As a story-telling picture it is all that could be desired. If it had no other merit than this, however, it would not be entitled to notice; but, as is usual in Mr. Moeller's work, the figures are concisely drawn, and, though detail is pushed to the last extreme, a certain breadth of painting is preserved, and there is a completeness of ensemble in the picture which makes it very good work indeed. It is the best of the figure works of its kind in the exhibition, and quite worthy of the painter of "Puzzled," the wonderful little picture in the Academy of 1885.

"Washing of the Feet, St. Mark's, Venice," No. 156, is the most ambitious picture Mr. Charles F. Ulrich has ever produced. There is in it more freedom of handling, and in parts of it more carelessness also, than in his usual work. As a composition it is not without serious merit, and, both as to line and masses of light and dark, it is effective. The long row of beggarmen in their white suits on the dais at the right of the picture is painted in a light key, and this group is in happy contrast with the dark purple and red masses of the figures of the priests and acolytes on the left. The picture may be justly reproached for cheapness of color and for a slightly theatrical air, but it contains many serious qualities, notably excellent drawing in the figures of the old men already mentioned.

"Rose Festival," No. 202, by H. Siddons Mowbray, is a variation of his Oriental themes. The scene in this picture is out of doors; the group of pretty young girls amid the roses in the foreground is refined in color, and the figures are cleverly painted. This picture is suggestive of fairyland and is singularly bright and attractive.

"The Lacemakers," No. 323, by Edgar M. Ward, is a picture of two girls seated at work, with their frames in hand, in a large room with white-washed walls and beams. It is carefully painted, and is one of the best genre pictures in the exhibition. "Buckwheat Cakes," No. 351, is in most respects the best of the negro subjects of which Mr. Alfred Kappes has produced so many in late years. The light is well managed, and there is less exaggeration of the effect of light on the figures, which had become a noticeable characteristic of some other pictures in the same line of subject by this artist. Mr. Kappes was awarded the first Hallgarten prize this year for this picture, which shows it to be esteemed by his fellow-artists. He relinquished the prize, however, since he is above the age prescribed in the conditions of the award, and the amount will probably be added to the same prize next year. "Infantry in Arms," No. 434, is a large picture by W. H. Lippincott, a family group of a lady and children in a richly furnished dining-room, which is remarkable for a well-told story and for good qualities of painting. "With Fate Against Them," No. 373, a battle episode—a small party of soldiers desperately defending themselves against an overwhelming opposing force — is of Gilbert Gaul's best work. There is much spirit in the picture, and the men seem to be fighting in earnest. In fact, it is chiefly because of this spirited action and air of reality that the picture is worthy of praise, for it is open to criticism in detail for loose and insufficient drawing and unpleasant color. "Two Friends," No. 359, and "A Kitchen Conservatory," No. 381, are two small interiors with figures by M. A. Woolf, both sober, quiet little pictures with the great merit of sincerity. "The Watched Pot Never Boils," No. 345, is one of Thomas Hovenden's familiar negro genres, about as good as usual, but not better. "Old Whalers at Nantucket," No. 328, by Eastman Johnson, is a group of old salts in a bituminous sort of atmosphere, in which a wall and a door here and there may be made out on close scrutiny. "Old and Rare," No. 319, is a good little bit of painting of the better sort of genre work by George W. Maynard. "Indecision," No. 280, is a single figure of a Puritan maiden in a characteristic interior, with some good qualities of color, by Arthur Hoeber. "Battle of Kennesaw Mountain, Georgia," No. 278, is a large military picture by T. de Thulstrup, a scene in the open in which an excellent landscape, with the mountain in the distance and a fine sky, forms an important part. "The Loiterers," No. 243, is a cleverly painted restaurant interior with two figures, by Irving R. Wiles. "Sunday Morning," No. 174, a life-size seated figure of an old woman with her Bible on her knees, by C. Y. Turner, is marked by a good effect of atmosphere and breadth of painting.

"Flower de Luce," No. 87, is the title given by Mr. Kenyon Cox to a small full-length study of a nude female figure. It is pretty in its general aspect, and the head and upper part of the figure are well executed, but the legs are strangely out of proportion. "Feeding the Pigeons," No. 116, a picture of but moderate merit, is signed "H. Lindenschmit, München." If it is the work of the Munich professor, it is not likely that his reputation here will be increased by its exhibition. It is hard and dry in handling and disagreeable in color. In "The Rehearsal for the Ball," No. 152, by Percy Moran, we find a deftly painted colonial interior, with a number of figures of young men and women preparing to dance a minuet. "La Mandolinata," No. 160, by William Morgan, a life size study of an Italian woman, shows good qualities of drawing and pleasing color. "An Unexpected Guest," No. 193, by F. C. Jones, is an effective little genre—two figures of an old man and an old woman at their modest table in a homely interior. "Two Generations," No. 231, by I. H. Caliga, is a delicate piece of figure work marked by good drawing and pleasant gray tones of color. "The Squire," No. 263, by Richard Creifelds, a small head, possesses considerable breadth of painting. In "The Click of the Latch," No. 398, we have one of F. D. Millet's pretty female figures in a bright cottage interior, in his usual style and of his better work.

Among the new comers in New York exhibitions there is gratifying evidence at the Academy that the number of young artists who have learned something worth knowing about the art of painting is still increasing. "Lotos Eaters," No. 95, by Louise H. King, is one of the most important pictures of this class in the exhibition. It is a figure composition with a landscape setting, the whole decoratively treated somewhat after the manner of Mr. T. W. Dewing's work, and is eminently creditable. "A June Morning in Prospect Park," No. 59, by A. W. Brown, an out-door study with a good feeling of air and light; "Cows," No. 42, by Edwina Post, a broadly painted vigorous cattle piece; "A Cabbage Garden," No. 226, by C. C. Curran; "A Parisienne," No. 284, by H. A. Levy, a small three-quarter length of a young woman in jaunty attire as jauntily painted; and "Lenten Lilies," No. 488, by Mary C. Richardson, a study of a young girl with an apronful of yellow lilies, characterized by refined sentiment and good painting, are other important works signed by comparatively new names which are worthy of mention.

In landscape work in the present exhibition there is a fair showing only. Quite the best thing Mr. Walter Palmer has sent to an Academy exhibition is "January," No. 418, a stretch of snow-covered plain at sunset, with a wide-spreading tree and some rocks and brush in the foreground. This picture is admirably truthful as a transcript of nature, besides being eminently well drawn and full and broad in painting. "A Quiet Afternoon," No. 354, is a handsome picture by H. Bolton Jones, in his best manner, in which some groups of thickly leaved trees, and undulating meadows, with a sky of intense luminosity, make up a picture of excellent quality, truthfully observed and broadly painted. D. W. Tryon is represented by a good example, "A Pasture," No. 97. Kenyon Cox shows a flat field with a large round-topped tree at the right, and a stretch of country in sunlight beyond, "Noon," No. 122, which is good in color and well drawn, but in which the foreground does not seem to "lie down." J. Francis Murphy has among other pictures "Approaching Night," No. 142, and "Neglected Land," No. 344, both representative and of his best; Charles M. Dewey, a characteristic and good "Landscape," No. 472; Horatio Walker, an "Arcadian Pastoral," No. 485; and Edward Gay, a large picture with an effective sky, called "The Pool in the Marshes," No. 432. By F. K. M. Rehn there is a good marine, "Gloucester Harbor at Sunset," No. 307; and by the late Arthur Quartley there are half a-dozen sea and shore views, all characteristic examples.

The exhibit of sculpture is small. This part of the exhibition is arranged in one end of the West Gallery, and it is so placed that the figures can be seen only from one side. A piece of sculpture, to be good at all, must be good from every point of view from which it may be looked at, and it is consequently impossible at the Academy to form a satisfactory judgment on the works shown in this branch of art. "Young Sophocles Leading the Chorus of Victory after the Battle of Salamis," No. 454, by John Donoghue, however, seems to be a powerfully modelled and well-composed figure. It is of heroic size, and is fine in movement and distinguished in pose. "Magdalen," No. 456, by F. Edwin Elwell, is a female figure, graceful in proportions, and well managed as to its great lines. There is also a fine little bust, "Portrait of a Gentleman," No. 458, by Olin L. Warner, and a large "Bacchante Group," No. 451, by Carl R. Smith, which is most ambitious in intention, but only moderately well realized.

The exhibition will remain open until May 14.

CUORE: An Italian School Boy's Journal. By Edmund de Amicis. Translated from the 39th Italian edition by Isabel F. Hapgood. 12mo, $1.25.

In this delightful volume, so unconventional in form, so fresh and energetic in style, Signor de Amicis has given not only the heart-history of an Italian lad, but also a very vivid and attractive picture of modern life in Italy. He is a genuine boy who is supposed to write the story, and all the events, incidents, and observations are seen through a boy's bright young eyes. The descriptions of school experiences, of festivals and public ceremonies, of scenes in city and country, are all full of color and charm, and are inspired by a genuine love for humanity.

SIGRID: An Icelandic Love Story. Translated from the Danish of Jon Thordsson Thoroddson. 12mo, $1.25.

A quiet, unpretentious story, noteworthy for its artlessness, its careful delineation of scenery and character, its variety of interest, and the refined humor in the author's quaintly fruitful portrayal of the primitive and picturesque life of the inhabitants of Ultima Thule. The fortunes of Sigrid and Indride make an idyllic love tale which attracts because it is true to the instincts of finer natures the world over. Nearly every phase of contemporary manners in Iceland is touched upon and revealed with the skill of the true artist.

THE PICTURE OF PAUL. (The Disciple.) By the Rev. H. R. Haweis, M.A. The fourth volume of 'Christ and Christianity.' 12mo, $1.25.

The Literary World says: "Mr. Haweis contends for a rational estimate of the New-Testament records as distinct from an absolute divine and infallible book, a position which we hasten to say need in no way imply that he is other than a profound and loving believer in the New Testament."

INITIALS AND PSEUDONYMS. A Dictionary of Literary Disguises. By William Cushing, A.M. 8vo, cloth, $5.

A new and revised edition of "a work which no reference library, no library, no literary reporter, and no fully equipped bookseller can afford not to possess."

PROFESSOR JOHNNY. By the author of Birchwood Fitch Club and Riverside Museum. 12mo, $1.25.

"It is the very book that the parent, watchful of the moral and intellectual development of children, would select out of a hundred such books as are regularly published for the young."—Boston Globe.

FINAL MEMORIALS OF

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW. By Samuel Longfellow, author of 'Life of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.' 8vo. Uniform with the 'Life.' With two new steel plates. In cloth, $3; half-calf or half-morocco, $5.50.

The journals and letters of the last twelve years of the poet's life, omitted from the biography through fear of making it unduly large. Many letters are also given of the earlier periods, from Mr. Longfellow, Mr. T. G. Appleton, Mr. J. L Motley, Dean Stanley, etc. There is a chapter of "table talk"; some pieces of unpublished verse; the tributes of Prof. C. C. Everett, Dr. O. W. Holmes, and Prof. C. E. Norton; and the reminiscences of Mr. William Winter and others. There are engravings of several "Longfellow" houses, and curious facsimiles of drawings and sketches, and pencil portraits of Mr. Longfellow, hitherto unknown.

THE DEVIL'S HAT. By Melville Phillips. $1.

"Much of the real worth of the book lies in the accurate and absorbing picture of life in the oil regions of Pennsylvania. This part of the work is very finely done. The various incidents of such a life are all realistically written, while the scenery of the tale is sketched with [illegible] artistic hand."

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS O[illegible] Life. By Madeleine Vinton Dahlgren, author of 'A Washington Winter,' 'Memoirs of Admiral Dahlgren,' etc. $1.50.

The picture of Southern home life, the unveiling of the secrets of a heart, the coming and going of the lights and shadows in the heroine's life, are portrayed in Mrs. Dahlgren's most perfect manner, and form but small parts of one of the most successful and delightful novels of the season.

DUE NORTH. By Maturin M. Ballou, author of 'Due South,' 'Due West,' 'Edge-tools of Speech,' 'Genius in Sunshine and Shadow.' $1.50.

The Blueberry is a valuable fruit, and is a reliable fruit to grow in the Northern States, where the more tender varieties winter kills. It is perfectly hardy, will stand 40 degrees below zero without showing any injury to the most tender buds. Fruit ripens in this latitude about the first of July. Color, a bluish black, when fully ripened. The flavor is equal to the raspberry, a very mild, rich sub-acid, pronounced by most people delicious. The fruit is excellent for pies, or canned for winter use. It grows very stocky; the shining dark-green leaves and the blue fruit make a pleasing contrast. It seems to flourish in all soils and is a prolific bearer. One dozen plants by mail, carefully packed in oil paper, 60 cts.; two dozen by mail, $1.00; 100 by express, $2.50; 1,000, $15.00.

THE STORY OF ALEXANDER'S EMPIRE.

By JOHN P. MAHAFFY,

Professor of Ancient History in the University of Dublin. With the collaboration of ARTHUR GILMAN. Being Volume XVI. in the STORY OF THE NATIONS Series. 12mo, with Maps and 37 Illustrations, $1.50.

"The story of the conquests of Alexander has been told many times, and his name is familiar in our mouths as household words; but the history of the different portions of the great Empire that he founded, how they rapidly gained and lost their independence, and finally were absorbed into the dominions of Rome, is by no means equally well known. . . . The succession of violent deaths that mark the story indicate clearly the condition of society at the period; but, as we thread our way through the labyrinth of bloody wars and assassinations, we find our attention happily distracted by studying the influence, which is perceptible in them all, of the ideas that Alexander impressed upon the peoples that he conquered. It is one of the purposes of this volume to present this complex truth distinctly to the reader, and to show also how considerably Rome was influenced by the ideas of conquered Greece, as well as to indicate the manner in which Hellenistic influences modified the characteristics of the dominant people."—Extract from Author's Preface.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MAY 5, 1887.

The Week.

SPEAKER CARLISLE, in an interview at Louisville on Monday, gave his ideas on the subject of revenue reform and also on the next Presidency. He believes that taxation will be reduced by the next Congress as a matter of necessity, and that the tobacco tax for one thing will be repealed by nearly unanimous consent. This will take off $30,000,000 of revenue. As Mr. Carlisle was understood to have prevented the repeal of the tobacco tax in the last Congress, his remarks at the present time carry something like positive assurance that the repeal will be carried next winter. There will still be a surplus of revenue, and since Mr. Carlisle is opposed to any meddling with the whiskey tax, it will be necessary to cut down the tariff somewhere. But of course Mr. Carlisle is no wiser than the rest of us in determining which way the wind will blow among the 401 men constituting the Senate and House of Representatives. In Mr. Carlisle's opinion, Mr. Cleveland will be renominated by the National Democratic Convention, and ought to be. He has a high opinion of the Mugwumps, and he promises them the happiness of being admitted into the Democratic party some time. He does not say who is to go out when they come in, but he probably has in mind the Old Jeffersonians, the Lifelongs, and the New York Sun.

The order, or suggestion, given by the President to the Secretary of the Interior, to grant title to a homesteader who had settled upon a piece of land included within the "indemnity limits" of the Northern Pacific Railroad, is distinctly just and undoubtedly legal. All principles of justice are violated by the withdrawal of the public lands from settlement in an indefinite way. Within the limits of the ten or twenty-mile strip of a land-grant to a railway a definite selection is made by the terms of the act, and it becomes apparent, as soon as the land is surveyed, what are the sections belonging to the railway and what are those belonging to the Government. In the "indemnity limits," which may extend as much as twenty miles beyond the land grant proper, it cannot be known what lands, if any, the railroad company may select to make good the deficiency, if any, of lands within the land grant proper. It has been customary for the General Land Office to withdraw all the lands within the indemnity limits from preëmption and homestead entry until the grantee, the railroad company, has made its selection, and of course the withdrawal operates to prevent anybody from acquiring title there. The Attorney-General could not fail to decide, as he did in this case, that the settler, Miller, had not, as a matter of fact, acquired title, the lands not being open to entry. The President now suggests to the Secretary of the Interior that he exercise such power and discretion as may belong to him to cure the defects in Miller's entry. Of course this ruling will govern in all similar cases hereafter. It is worth remembering that an opportunity to restore some four million acres of the Northern Pacific land grant to the public domain, without dispute or litigation, was given to the last Congress, but that the bill introduced for this purpose was "jumped upon" by one lot of demagogues after another, some wanting to forfeit the Cascade branch grant, and others the whole grant from the Missouri River westward, until it became so loaded down with amendments that nothing could pass.

The reader of Mr. Huntington's testimony before the Pacific Railroad Commission last week must be struck with a sense of the loss suffered by the nation in the death of the Hon. Richard Franchot, a man to whom any amount of money could be trusted without accounts, or vouchers, or even any inquiry on the part of those who supplied it as to its disbursement. Such men are seldom found anywhere, least of all in Washington city. The difference between Mr. Huntington and Mr. Franchot, according to the testimony of the former, was very much in Mr. Franchot's favor, because Mr. Huntington rendered an account for all the money he disbursed, thus putting himself in the category of those who must be subjected to the revision and scrutiny of auditors and comptrollers, whereas Franchot was never asked for a voucher. Such touching confidence would never be believed if it were not sworn to in the manner following:

> Q. Would you pay the sum of $5,000 without taking a voucher? A. Yes.
> Q. Without knowing where it went? A. I should know it was right if I gave it to Gen. Franchot.
> Q. Would you know how it was expended? A. No. There were certain things to be done. I knew he was a man of the strictest integrity—as pure a man as ever lived—and when he said, "I want $10,000," I knew it was proper and let him have it.
> Q. Without knowing how it was to be used? A. Yes; that's my way of doing business. I believe in the familiar couplet,
> Trust all in all,
> Or trust not at all.
> That is my way.

We find, by reference to the political almanac, that this incomparable man represented the Nineteenth District of New York in the Thirty-seventh Congress, 1861–3.

The Times on Wednesday week had an interview with Father McGlynn, the contents of which it amplified on Thursday in an interview with another person, professing to give the true inwardness of the support given to Blaine by the Catholics in this State in 1884. That Blaine received this support, there never has been any doubt. It was thus, and thus only, that he was able to creep up so near Cleveland in the final count. The reason why has always been shrouded in more or less mystery; that is, it has never been clearly explained what Blaine's quid pro quo was to be, in case he got into the White House, beyond general favor to Catholic views of politics and morals. Father McGlynn's explanation of the hostility of Archbishop Corrigan, and other Catholic prelates in this State, to Mr. Cleveland, is that he vetoed the bills appropriating money for the Catholic House of Refuge and for the Catholic Protectory. This, if true, however, only confirms a long-standing report. The oddest feature in the canvass of 1884 was the tenderness which broke out between Blaine and the Tribune and the dynamite faction of the Irish headed by Pat. Ford.

Mr. Blaine's Western trip served the excellent purpose of giving an opportunity for discovering the drift of sentiment in the Republican party regarding his candidacy in 1888. Just before he went out to the Indian Territory there had been a sort of "experience meeting" among the editors of Republican organs in that part of the country. The St. Louis Globe-Democrat led off with the explicit statement that "the Republicans certainly cannot defeat Cleveland in 1888 if they again confront him with the candidate which they put in the field in 1884." Other Republican papers, among them the Milwaukee Sentinel, the Burlington Hawkeye, the Council Bluffs Nonpareil, and the Keokuk Gate City, endorsed the Globe-Democrat's conclusion. Time enough has elapsed to develop dissent from this opinion among the Western Republican press if it existed, without bringing it to light. On the contrary, the revolt appears to be gaining strength. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, in commenting upon the Rhode Island election the other day, remarked: "Nobody knows where the spirit of independence will break out next; but it lies very near the surface in every Republican State. It must be consulted, it must be placated by the nomination of men of high character and lofty political principles, and not by the meat offerings of patronage, if the party is to remain a power in politics and complete its yet unended mission." The Washington correspondent of the Buffalo Courier showed this deliverance to a leading Minnesota man, and asked his explanation, which was as follows: "That is exactly the situation in our State. The thoughtful Republicans are alarmed. Their party is threatened with disintegration. Blaine's nomination would be the weakest that could be made for us. Of 103 Republicans in our Legislature, a poll showed only about thirty for Blaine, and that is about the ratio throughout the State. . . . You will find Minnesota looking elsewhere than to Maine for a candidate next year."

It is estimated by good judges in Rhode Island that there are now in that State between 4,000 and 5,000 voters, formerly Republicans, who are henceforth confirmed Independents or Mugwumps—that is, they are men who will vote for the most fit candidates without regard to their party labels. This is the feature of the recent political revolution there which gives the Republican managers the gravest concern. The total vote shows that while over 2,000 more votes were cast this year than in 1884, the Republican vote was about 4,000 less this year than it was in 1884.

That represents a Republican loss of over 4,000 votes in a total of 19,000, or one-fifth. The entire vote of all parties in the State is less than 35,000, so that about one-eighth of it is independent. As every election is decided by a few thousand votes, it is manifest that these 4,000 Independents have the balance of power in their own hands. As they are certain to cast their votes against an unfit candidate, it is easy to understand why the best authorities in the State are agreed in saying that it will be lost to the Republicans if Mr. Blaine is renominated next year.

It is to be inferred from Mr. Conkling's letter to the Americus Club of Pittsburgh, which last week celebrated the sixty-fifth anniversary of Gen. Grant's birthday, that he believes that the Republican party is still in existence, though in a comatose condition. He intimates that it has not "kept step with the march of events," and has laid aside "the spirit, prowess, and earnestness which made and kept it great and useful and triumphant." As a cure for all this, he suggests "the revival of the Republican party, provided it can discover the questions deserving of attention, take the right side of them, and act up to its convictions." Of the nature of these questions he, however, unhappily does not give the slightest hint. We regret to say, "the bearings of this observation lays in the application on it." Until some truly great Republican reveals what the "questions deserving of attention" are, we fear the party will remain in its present inanimate condition. We believe Mr. Evarts knows what they are, but would not tell, even if he saw approaching the wild horses which were to be attached to his person to wring from him by torture his momentous secret.

The votes cast at the recent election in Michigan, except for one very small county, have been canvassed, and the showing merits careful attention. Beginning with 1882 and ending with 1886, the Democrats and Greenbackers "fused" at each election, so that the true comparison of this month's result is with the spring election of 1881, when the Democrats and Greenbackers for the last time ran separate tickets. The figures for the two contests are as follows, the candidate who led the Republican ticket being the one whose vote is used:

	Rep.	Dem.	Green.	Pro.
1881...	127,436	72,730	33,256	12,774
1887....	176,322	140,827	27,980	18,530

It will be observed that in 1881 the Republicans had a plurality of 54,706 over the Democrats, and of 21,450 over the Democrats and Greenbackers together, and a majority of 8,676 over all three opposing parties; while in 1887 they have a plurality of but 35,495 over the Democrats, and of only 7,515 over the Democrats and Greenbackers, and lack 11,016 of a majority over all the opposition. Supposing that the Democrats and Greenbackers had maintained their fusion, the Republicans would have increased their plurality of 3,308 in the Presidential election of 1884 to 7,515 in 1887 on a smaller vote. The vitality of the Greenbackers is worthy of note, their vote this year being within about 5,000 of their record six years ago, although in the meantime the Greenback "issue" has vanished from our politics.

The most striking feature of the canvass is the showing that the vote on the prohibition amendment to the Constitution considerably exceeded that for State officers, the aggregates being 365,302 for the former and 363,825 for the latter. In a number of counties hundreds of votes more were cast for and against the amendment than for the various judicial tickets, and in the whole State, as will be observed, the total is about 1,500 larger. This is a result without precedent, not only in Michigan, but in any other State. The rule is that amendments are neglected by the majority of the men who go to the polls, and there have been cases in Michigan where not more than a quarter of the men who voted for State officers took the trouble to express their views on a proposed change in the Constitution. Even when the liquor issue was last submitted to popular vote in 1876, the question being whether the section which had then been in the Constitution for twenty-five years prohibiting the granting of licenses should be stricken out, although 316,689 men voted for President, only 113,200 ballots were cast in all on the amendment.

Mr. Edward Atkinson delivered an address to workingmen at the Central Labor Lyceum in Boston on Sunday evening. The difference between his lecture and that of the Rev. Dr. McGlynn was the difference between a practical workingman, who is also a trained thinker, and the inmate of a mediæval cloister. Mr. Atkinson comes before his audience with a yard of cotton cloth. He has made millions of yards himself, and he knows to the thousandth part of a cent where the 6¼ cents that the yard sells for eventually goes. He shows that a little more than 3 cents goes to pay for the cotton, that is, to remunerate everybody engaged in raising, baling, and transporting it; that a little more than 1½ cents goes to the cotton operatives, spinners, weavers, packers, etc., and that the remaining 1¾ cents is divided between mill supplies (other than cotton), wear and tear of machinery, insurance, taxes, freight, commissions on sales, wages of superintendents, and profit. How much does profit get? It is a decimal fraction, .3412. On 17,500,000 yards, worth $1,100,000, the estimated yearly production of a mill having a capital of $1,000,000, the owners get $60,000 if the times are good, the cotton-growers, the dealers in mill supplies, etc., get $85,000, the State gets $15,000 in the way of taxes, and the labor immediately employed gets the balance, $940,000. Now, the question is whether capital, the great gormandizer and oppressor of the poor man, can be induced to put itself at risk, and give up the enjoyments which might be had in this fleeting world, for less than .3412 cent per yard of cloth, or less than $60,000 on an investment of $1,000,000. If not, where is to be found the $940,000 that goes to labor when capital retires and the mill stops turning? These are very hard facts. They belong to the "dismal science," as Carlyle called it. But Mr. Atkinson has the rare faculty of putting hard facts in their pleasantest guise, and expounding the dismal science in its brightest colors.

Cardinal Manning's article in the London Tablet on the Knights of Labor, if the version published in the Herald on Friday be correct, throws no more light on the subject than that of Cardinal Gibbons. He argues in defence of the right of laborers to combine, and of the need of combination in order to defend themselves against the power of capital, which nobody now denies or even questions. But he fails to take notice of the one new fact in the present case, namely, that the Knights of Labor are not a trades union, but an attempt to organize all men who are paid wages in any calling into an association hostile to everybody who pays wages, and in fact to everybody who has saved money and uses or lends it in any enterprise calling for the employment of labor. If this attempt were successful, it would really mean the constitution by the wage-earners of a new political society within the State, an imperium in imperio, under an arbitrary government, possessing powers of interference with the lives and property of its subjects such as the worst despotisms in the worst ages have never exercised or claimed. The Cardinal touches lightly on the way the power of the Knights has been abused in persecuting people who do not choose to join the organization. But such an organization must persecute in order to succeed. Men cannot be persuaded on any great scale to surrender their control over their private affairs to small committees made up of persons belonging to totally different callings, without more or less intimidation and annoyance. In other words, the Knights can only maintain and extend the order by making it very uncomfortable or even dangerous not to be a Knight. Consequently, most of Cardinal Manning's talk on the subject is sadly platitudinarian. He affirms what nobody denies, defends what nobody attacks, and avoids touching the only knotty point in the case.

We are informed by the cable that a Mr. White is coming out here on behalf of the Irish Woollen Manufacturing and Exporting Company, in order to look for a market for Irish woollen goods in this country. He is doubtless going to appeal to the patriotic sentiments of Irishmen in America, in order to get them to clothe themselves in Irish woollens. Probably nothing has done more, however, to make people doubt the industrial capacity of the Irish at home than these attempts, of which there have been many, to build up Irish manufactures on a sentimental basis. No people have ever long purchased their goods out of love for the makers. As Thiers well said, "Men will die for their country, but they will not make pig-iron for their country"—or, he might have added, buy it. The only way under heaven to make Irish woollens permanently sell here or elsewhere is to offer them cheaper and better than other woollens. And, even if Irish woollens could beat the English or Continental woollens in the home markets, they could not get much sale here without a lowering of the tariff. And yet at the last election, and, in fact, at every election, Irishmen are found voting for the high tariff for the purpose of damaging England, which is very like the Dublin mob in the last century which burnt the bills of the Latouche Bank for the purpose of annoying the Latouches.

Prof. Atwater of Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn., who begins in the May number of the Century what promises to be an exceedingly valuable series of papers on "The Chemistry of Foods," makes some remarks upon oleomargarine, from the standpoint of a thoughtful man of science, which deserve the attention of careless legislators. "This is a case," he says, "where mechanical invention, aided by science, is enabled to furnish a cheap, wholesome, and nutritious food for the people." Conceding that legislation to provide for official inspection of this, as of other food products, and to insure that it shall be sold for what it is, and not for what it is not, is very desirable, and that every reasonable measure to prevent fraud, here as elsewhere, ought to be welcomed, Prof. Atwater holds that "the attempt to curtail or suppress the production of a cheap and useful food material by law, lest the profits which a class—the producers of butter—have enjoyed from the manufacture of a costlier article may be diminished, is opposed to the interests of a large body of people, to the spirit of our institutions, and to the plainest dictates of justice." Fortunately, the tax imposed upon the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine by the law as it finally passed was so much reduced from the high figures first suggested by the dairy interests, that while it may help toward preventing improper sale of butter substitutes, and, by obliging sellers to pay high license fees, may considerably interfere with their general use, it will not be as effective in excluding them from the markets as was desired.

It is surprising that in all the discussions about the ash-barrel nuisance and the difficulties of street-cleaning in this city, no mention has been made of that great peculiarity of New York, the absence of back entrances to the houses. We are not able to say in detail how the matter is arranged in all other large cities, but certainly in no other large city is the back or kitchen side of the house wholly inaccessible from the street, as it is here. In Boston, the cleanliness and neatness of which are very striking, there is, in most streets, a narrow passage through the block, in the rear of the houses, through which the ash and swill carts have access to the back yards, in which the household refuse is deposited pending removal. The same arrangement exists in Philadelphia, in Chicago, and in London. In the continental cities the inner court of the great apartment-houses is always accessible to vehicles of some kind from the street, and the refuse can be kept there out of sight. There is probably nothing more extraordinary in New York than the utter disregard of this most necessary convenience in the building of all the upper portion of the city—by which we mean that portion of it which was built after people became conscious that it was going to be a really great city. From Union Square up, block after block has been built, and is being built, up to the Harlem River, without the smallest provision for a back entrance, although a passage through the block twelve feet wide would have sufficed amply for the purpose. The lots are usually 100.5 deep, and six feet from each back yard would never have been missed. A wider space somewhere near the centre of the block would be necessary to enable carts to pass each other, but this need not curtail more than one lot on each side. There are very fine blocks of houses going up on the west side of the Park, but, strange to say, not one is provided with a back alley. And yet it would add immensely to the comfort, convenience, and decency of them all—to say nothing of the preservation of the streets from disgusting nuisances. How is it that no builder has ever thought of this; and how is it that none of the legislators who love to tinker New York city has ever brought in a bill making these back alleys compulsory?

In fact, we doubt whether there is a city in the world which has done less through its municipal ordinances to teach habits of order and decency to the poor, and raise their standard of comfort. Tens of thousands of ignorant, slatternly people drop down here from Europe every year, of whom a large proportion soon acquire homes of some sort, but nothing that they see or hear around them teaches them that cleanliness and neatness can be had without wealth. The only clean streets they ever see are streets where rich people live. The only sidewalks they see which are always free from beastly barrels of offal and ashes, are the sidewalks in front of rich people's houses. It is not surprising that they soon come to regard squalid and filthy surroundings as the signs and concomitants of republican institutions. Those who move out to the suburbs carry with them the tastes which they acquired in the city. Is there in the world a more repulsive spectacle than our suburban villages? Can any one carry a foreigner along our roads and through our villages, between here and the Connecticut line, and on this end of Long Island, without hanging his head for shame, or wishing it were night time? The wretched roads (except along the Hudson River), worthy of the Middle Ages, the dirty little frame houses, the broken-down fences, the weed-grown yards, the litter of vegetable cans, hoop-skirts, old shoes, ashes, offal, and filth of every description which line the sidewalk, wherever there are habitations, make a very odious spectacle. But suburbs like these are fitting appendages to our streets. It would be useless to girdle such a city with more decent villages. We cannot expect the suburban population to dislike squalor and dirt more than the population of the city.

The mortality statistics of London show a steady lowering of the death-rate, amounting to about 20 per cent. during the last quarter of a century. The average during the ten years following 1860 was 24.4 per 1,000; from 1870 to 1880, 22.5, and since 1880, only 20.5, the rate in the last two years having been so unprecedentedly low as 19.8 and 19.9. The change is accompanied by a similar, though less pronounced, diminution in the birth-rate of late years, which ranged between 35.9 and 35.3 from 1870 to 1880, and since then has fallen steadily, year by year, to 32.3 in 1886. The decline in the death-rate of London is, of course, largely due to the development of an effective system of sanitary regulations. The decline in the birth-rate of recent years, the Lancet says, has not been confined to London, or even to England, although more pronounced in the metropolis than elsewhere.

The revelations made by Mr. Gladstone touching Parnell's state of mind after the Phœnix Park murders will greatly strengthen the prevailing belief that the Times has been the willing victim of a forgery. The temper in which that journal has of late been carrying on the warfare against the Irish party is one which of course makes anything in the way of credulity and readiness to be imposed on, seem possible. That the evidence of the authenticity of the letter could have been weighed by a person in the sort of frenzy about everything Irish in which the editor seems to live, is of course very improbable. To a person in that condition anything that seemed likely to back up the frantic accusations he had been making for many weeks, was very welcome—too welcome to be criticised or examined. But, on the other hand, it is almost certain that both the Times itself and a considerable number of the Tories and Liberal Unionists will now maintain that when Parnell made the communications to Gladstone which the latter reports, he was simply manufacturing evidence for future use—that is, to be produced on some such occasion as the present one. There is nothing, in fact, in the way of deep-laid villany they are not ready to ascribe to him, and do not ascribe.

The Tory position, and that of the Times, is that when a letter is produced, even by an enemy, containing what purports to be a man's signature, although unaccompanied by any proof of its authenticity, his repudiation of it is of no value, unless backed up by an action at law, to be brought in the midst of a prejudiced and even hostile community. In the present case, the Times offers only à priori reasons for believing in the genuineness of the signature—that is, the letter is genuine because it is just such a letter as a bad man like Parnell would be likely to write. The acceptance of this argument by a large body of English gentlemen is a striking illustration of the depth of the rancor felt towards the Irish party, and of the absurdity of the notion that there exists anything that can be called real "unity" between Great Britain and Ireland. If there were the semblance of such a thing, of course all politicians in England would hesitate, no matter what their real opinion of them might be, about heaping all the insults they can put into words on the legal representatives of the Irish people in the House of Commons. They would feel that, in reviling them en masse, they were wounding and exasperating a large body of fellow-citizens—a kind of thing which shrewd politicians in a constitutional country always avoid.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, April 27, to TUESDAY, May 3, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

EX-SPEAKER J. G. CARLISLE has declared that he does not wish to be considered a candidate for the Senate from Kentucky, and has made the predictions that the Fiftieth Congress will reduce the revenue both from customs duties and the tobacco tax, and that Mr. Cleveland will again be the Democratic candidate for the Presidency.

The Inter-State Commerce Commissioners have been holding sessions in the principal Southern cities, hearing arguments chiefly by representatives of the railroads to show that the long-and-short-haul clause of the law ought to be suspended; but an organization of farmers in Louisiana presented a petition for the enforcement of the whole law. Some of the Western roads have lost much cattle traffic because they have refused passes to cattle men while their competitors have continued to give them. Judge Cooley, the Chairman of the Commission, has informed a religious organization in St. Louis that the law does not prevent the granting of cheaper rates to preachers and other religious workers. The Oregon Railway and Navigation Company and the Union Pacific Railway Company are among those which have most recently asked for a suspension of the long-and-short-haul section. The United States Pacific Railroad Commissions, sitting in this city, have begun an investigation of the affairs of the Pacific railway companies.

The National Civil-Service Commission is proceeding with the organization of the permanent Board of Examiners, separate boards hitherto having been appointed at different times. Two of the seven members have already been chosen and have entered upon their preliminary duties. They are to have charge of all examination papers which come up from the several examination cities, and are to pass upon the qualifications of all applicants.

A new prohibitory law has been enacted by the Rhode Island Legislature, the principal features of which are as follows: Making the presence of an excess of two per cent. of alcohol in liquor prima-facie evidence that it is intoxicating; giving the Chief of State Police ten salaried deputies for use in any part of the State; strengthening the seizure section; giving members of the State Police authority to arrest and hold a prisoner twelve hours without a warrant; making drunkenness a statutory offence, with a maximum penalty of $10 fine or ten days' imprisonment; making the keeping of a club-room a penal offence, the maximum penalty being $1,000 fine and a year's imprisonment.

Dr. W. T. Northrup, a prominent physician at Haverhill, Scioto County, O., was murdered April 27 by Thomas McCoy, a saloon-keeper, and his brother and nephews, because Dr. Northrup had been active in favor of local option. They waylaid him and fired on him with pistols and shotguns. The murderers were arrested, and the excitement has been the greater because the murder was committed for the same reason as the Haddock murder in Iowa.

A sum ($8,000 or more) has been subscribed in Louisville, by liquor-dealers, to be used in the fight in Texas over a prohibitory amendment to the State Constitution. The Texan campaign is becoming very exciting.

At Fall River, Mass., on April 30, every one of the 300 liquor licenses expired, and prohibition under the no-license law went into effect. The town had got $60,000 a year revenue from this source.

Milo H. Dakin, a member of the Michigan House of Representatives, who was accused of soliciting money from his fellow-members on false pretences, and of making out a list of members and the prices for which their votes could be controlled, was found guilty under impeachment proceedings April 28, and expelled.

Gov. Green of New Jersey on April 28 signed the bill requiring the use of the Hall & Wood ballot-box, now in use in Ohio. It registers and numbers each ballot, and is secured with three different locks and keys.

Thirteen more indictments against men for committing frauds in the election at St. Louis last fall have been presented by the Grand Jury to the United States Court.

The Half-Holiday Bill, as it has passed both houses of the New York Legislature, provides that in case New Year's Day, Washington's Birthday, Decoration Day, the Fourth of July, or Christmas falls on Saturday, the next Monday shall be deemed the legal holiday, and in such cases commercial paper which would otherwise be payable on that Monday is payable on the Tuesday next succeeding. The bill, if it receives the Governor's signature, will make every Saturday afternoon a legal holiday, in addition to the days named above.

Another man having leaped from the New York and Brooklyn Bridge, a bill was introduced in the New York Legislature April 28 to make jumping from the bridge a misdemeanor.

The motion made by the counsel for Jacob Sharp, to quash the indictments against him for giving bribes to the New York Aldermen of 1884 to grant the Broadway Railway franchise, has been denied, and his trial will be begun on the day appointed—May 11.

The jury in the case of Paul Grottkau of Milwaukee, charged with inciting riot there last May at the time of the Anarchist activity in Chicago, found him guilty.

The largest natural gas well yet discovered is at Fairmount, Ind. The test of Prof. Orton, State Geologist of Ohio, shows that it is flowing nearly 12,000,000 feet per day.

Robbers stopped a Southern Pacific train near Tucson, Arizona, April 27, and took from the express car about $5,000.

The streams in New England, especially in Maine, have been swollen to a higher water mark than had been reached before in eighteen years. Two million logs at the Somerset Mills on the Kennebec River were washed away and many of them were carried to sea. The damage to railroad tracks and to other property is great.

Two sharp shocks of earthquake were felt at Spokane Falls, W. T., April 30.

During the winter season of 1883-4 48,869 persons were registered at the hotels in Jacksonville, Fla.; during the season of 1884-5 60,011; during the season of 1885-6 65,193, and during the season just ended 58,460. The comparative reports from the hotels in other towns in the State show about the same rate of increase up to 1885-6, and slight decrease this season.

A Philadelphia company has built four magnificent sleeping cars that are to be drawn by horses in the heart of the Argentine Republic. Horse power is used because of the scarcity of coal.

The report of the Massachusetts Railroad Commission on the Bussey Bridge railroad disaster has been presented to the Legislature. It finds that the contract for the bridge was carelessly made, that the designs and specifications should not have been accepted, and that the bridge had not been properly inspected. The Board recommend the passage of an act requiring every railroad, at least once in two years, to have a thorough examination of all bridges on its lines made by a competent civil engineer.

The 800 employees of Asa Cushman & Co.'s shoe factory at Auburn, Me., received a dividend of 4 per cent. on the amount of their wages for the year ended April 30. The business of the factory for the year amounted to $1,269,262; the cost of labor, $288,244, in addition to the dividend of 4 per cent., which amounted to $11,529. The business of the factory was larger by $150,000 under the profit-sharing system than ever before.

Mrs. Richmond of Batavia, widow of the late Dean Richmond, has given $25,000 for the purpose of erecting a library building in that place. Mrs. Osterhout, widow of the late Isaac Osterhout, died in Wilkesbarre, Pa., April 28. Her husband by his will bequeathed about $200,000 for the erection and establishment of a free library in that city, but provided that the fund should accumulate for five years. The five years have expired, and now by the death of the widow the fund is increased to nearly $400,000. Mr. Henry Woods of Boston has presented the Library Association of his native town, Barre, with a building, erected by him last year, and $5,000 as an endowment for a library.

The Metropolitan Museum of Art in this city has received two more notable artistic treasures. Mr. Henry Hilton has presented to it Meissonier's famous painting "1807," which he purchased at the recent sale of the Stewart collection, and Édouard Detaille's "Defence of Champigny."

Mr. Robert Henderson, who is employed by the Smithsonian Institution, arrived at Philadelphia April 28 with a large collection of tropical birds which he had made in the West Indies.

The hundredth anniversary of the birth of the German poet Ludwig Uhland (April 26) was celebrated by the Germans of New York April 28, and a literary society at Berlin gave a grand banquet in the Town Hall in honor of the same event. Among the guests were many authors, scientists, and other distinguished persons.

Gen. Grant's birthday, April 27, was observed by meetings at Pittsburgh and at several other places, many of them under the direction of the Grand Army posts. It is expected that the day will be observed every year.

A stone monument to ex-President Arthur will be set up in the cemetery at Albany, and a life-size bronze statue of him in one of the public squares in this city, by a number of his friends.

FOREIGN.

M. Schnaebelé, the French Commissary who was arrested by German police and imprisoned at Metz, was liberated April 30; but his trial will be continued, and is expected by the Germans to show the closest connection of the French Government with the spies. He arrived at midnight at Pagny-sur-Moselle, where he was arrested, and he was met by the populace of the town, headed by all the officers of the municipality. They cried "Vive la France," "Vive Schnaebelé." He proceeded to Paris, where he had an interview with M. Flourens. The Paris newspapers express pleasure at the manner in which the Schnaebelé affair has been settled, and pronounce it an honorable settlement. They praise the prudence and fairness displayed by M. Flourens, Minister of Foreign Affairs, in his conduct of France's side of the case. They draw from the incident the lesson that in the future France must redouble her vigilance in order to avoid surprises of the kind caused by the arrest of M. Schnaebelé. Germany seems to have even greater reason for gratification. Bismarck expects now to be able to show, whenever he chooses to find or make a casus belli, that the Government of France has officially sanctioned espionage of the most treacherous character. Schnaebelé's release will be exhibited as an act of magnanimity.

During the performance on the evening of May 3 in Paris of "Lohengrin," a crowd gathered outside the theatre which hooted Wagner and Germany, sang the "Marseillaise," and cried, "Vive la France! Vive l'Armée!" The police cleared the street and arrested four persons. A rainstorm dispersed the mob before the performance was ended.

The remains of the composer Rossini, who died in Paris in 1868, were disinterred at Père-la-Chaise Cemetery May 1 in the presence of a number of admirers. They were taken to Florence for reburial on May 3.

Mr. Gladstone, in a speech at a dinner given by Labor members of Parliament on April 26, declared his disbelief in the accusations made against the Irish leaders. He said that in May, 1882, immediately after the assassination of Cavendish and Burke in Phœnix Park, Mr. Parnell wrote him a letter with reference to that crime, the contents of which had obviously been written under great mental distress, and gave strong evidence that the letter recently published by the London Times as Mr. Parnell's was a base and malicious forgery. Mr. Parnell offered to place himself without reserve in Mr. Gladstone's hands; he regarded the murders with the utmost abhorrence, and offered to resign the leadership of the Irish party and retire altogether from political life if Mr. Gladstone considered such a step advisable in the interests of Ireland. Mr. Gladstone said that many years ago, when he was Commissioner to the Ionian Islands, the Times bitterly attacked him, accusing him of treason. On returning to England he consulted a famous lawyer, Mr. Freshfield, with the view of bringing an action, but was dissuaded because, even if he proved his case, no jury, in the state of the public mind at that time, would be likely to convict the Times.

In the House of Commons on April 28, a Liberal motion that the House decline to proceed with any measure directed against tenants' combinations for relief until a full measure for their relief from excessive rents is presented in Parliament, was rejected by a vote of 341 to 240; and a motion that the House go into committee on the Crimes Bill was then adopted. In the debate beforehand Mr. Morley said that the effect of the bill would be, not to prevent the withdrawal of capital from Ireland, but to drive out the labor that supported capital. The Government had its own weak case to thank for the prolonging of the discussion.

In the House of Commons on May 2 the debate on the Crimes Bill turned on the question to what parts of Ireland the bill would be applicable. Mr. Labouchere said that its aim was to crush out the Nationalists, leaving the Orangemen to do anything they liked. The administration of the law was so bound up with the Orange faction that it could not be impartial. During the debate Mr. Gladstone, replying to a statement that he was responsible for the equally strong system of five years ago, said that an essential difference was overlooked, namely, that his bill had been directed against crime, while the one under discussion was not. At least, he added, the present bill was directed against acts that had not hitherto been considered crimes. By the application of the closure rule the debate on this phase of the bill was shut off.

The London Times on May 2 said: "Our articles on Parnellism and Crime and the Parnell letter have sunk deep into the public mind, and have produced a conviction that nothing will shake, save evidence of a kind that Mr. Parnell cannot produce." The Times published on the same day a long article of the style of the articles on Parnellism and Crime, purporting to show that Mr. John Dillon, in his defence of the Parnellite party, either offered to Parliament a tissue of fictions or reached a still lower depth of dishonesty.

Charles Edward Lewis (Conservative), on May 3, in the House of Commons, called the House's attention to the breach of privilege committed by the Times in making this charge against Mr. John Dillon, and moved that the House take notice of them. Mr. Dillon declared that when the publisher of the Times stood at the bar he would prove him as base and cowardly a liar as ever existed. Mr. Sexton said it was for an assembly of English gentlemen to say whether for the future its Irish members should be exposed to the attack of every ruffian calling himself the editor of a newspaper. The House should let the assailed members have an inquiry by committee. "Then," said Mr. Sexton, "let the Times bring forward its battalions of forgers and liars. The Irish members will prove that they have been subjected to a system of moral assassination." After debate the House adjourned without taking action on the motion.

In the trial of the suit of St. John Brenon against William Ridgway, a publisher in London, for libel in accusing the plaintiff of being a Fenian and a former ally of the Invincibles, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, awarding him £500 damages.

Mr. Parnell has selected Mr. William O'Brien, editor of United Ireland, as the Home-Rule candidate for northeast Cork to fill the vacancy in the House of Commons caused by the resignation of Mr. Edmund Leamy, Home-Ruler. Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Kilbride, one of the tenants evicted from the Lansdowne estates, sailed from Queenstown for New York May 1, on their way to Canada, where they hope to arouse popular indignation against Lord Lansdowne. The Mayor and the Municipal Council of Queenstown and various other bodies presented Mr. O'Brien with addresses, and a crowd cheered him.

During the week ended April 30 2,618 emigrants left Queenstown for America. The total number who sailed from that port for April was 11,854, against 6,656 for April last year.

Westminster Abbey has been vacated by the clergy and given over to artists and architects for decoration for the jubilee visit of the Queen on June 21. The Privy Council has directed the Archbishop of Canterbury to prepare a prayer and thanksgiving for the occasion, which is to be ordered to be used in England, Wales, and the town of Berwick-on-Tweed. Manchester's jubilee exhibition rivals in interest and value the international exhibitions of the past. The collection of modern English paintings, which is insured at a value of $10,000,000, is said to be the finest ever made.

The Cambridge (England) University Boat Club has appointed a committee to make arrangements with the Harvard University Boat Club for a race between the Cambridge and Harvard crews, to take place in America in September. Seventy yachts have been entered for the British jubilee race, and it is probable that more will be added to the list of competitors before the entries close on June 7.

The Oxford University Dramatic Society will this year play the "Alcestis" of Euripides in the original Greek. The first performance will take place on May 18.

Cardinal Manning has published a letter wherein he says that towards the end of the last century the doctrines of political economy, under the plea of free contract, broke up the old relations between the employer and the employed, and the conflict between capital and labor then became perpetual; that the Knights of Labor and the British trades unions represent the rights of labor and the rights of association for its defence, and that the freedom of contract on which political economy glorifies itself hardly exists. Although the Clerical newspapers at Paris are silent on the Papal decision on the labor question, the Royalist journals express displeasure. The Temps says it does not wonder that the Pope is trying to gain such a powerful machine for his side as the Knights of Labor, but wonders what is to become of the old prejudices that so long dominated Rome. The Holy Office consecrates democracy as the legitimate heir of the régimes which preceded it.

As published in Vienna, the conditions for a reconciliation of the Vatican with the Quirinal are these: (1) The Pope will advise the royal, archducal, and ducal families of Naples, Tuscany, and Modena to renounce all claims to sovereignty in favor of the Holy See; (2) and he will crown Humbert King, granting him and his Catholic descendants territory in Italy in fief. (3) The King will govern the whole kingdom, with full temporal rights, but will acknowledge the Pope as suzerain, and pledge himself to rule according to the dictates of the Church; (4) and he will reside in Rome. (5) Territory, including the Leonine City and part of the Tiber shore, will be allotted permanently to the Pope, with absolute ruling and proprietary rights. (6) A special convention will be concluded, fixing the amount Italy shall pay to maintain the Papal household.

The lower house of the Prussian Diet ordered the new Ecclesiastical Bill to its third reading on April 27 by a vote of 243 to 100. Twenty-six Free Conservatives, eight Conservatives, and eight National Liberals abstained from voting.

The troops of the Amir of Afghanistan have been routed in two recent engagements with the forces of the rebels against his rule, and Candahar is threatened. The Governor of Herat has sent another demand to the Amir for reinforcements. He states that the Russians are advancing their posts and exciting the Afghans. Traders arriving at Herat report that the Russians have removed the pillars erected by the Boundary Commission.

It is reported from London that three Russian steamers are continuously engaged in transporting troops destined for Tcharjui, in Turkestan.

It is reported that Russia has proposed to remit the Turkish war indemnity in return for a cession of territory in Asia Minor.

The Swiss State Council has ratified a Literary Copyright Convention with the United States.

The details of a new postal treaty between the United States and Mexico have been made known at the Mexican capital. It provides that the single-rate letter postage between the two countries shall be reduced from five to two cents. Before it can go into effect it must receive the approval of the Congress and President of Mexico, and of the President of the United States.

It is reported that two of the seven lost Mexican bonanza mines have been rediscovered by an American party of prospectors. The tradition is that they were worked up to the middle of the last century. A surveying party found in an old chapel maps and other data which gave them a clue.

Advices from Lima under date of April 1 are that the number of deaths from cholera at Santiago and Valparaiso were decreasing. Free communication between the capital and the port has been restored. Up to that date 2,873 persons had fallen victims to the epidemic in Santiago alone. The poverty was alarming, owing to the few opportunities for work, and suicides were reported to be of frequent occurrence.

The first straight party division in the new Canadian House of Commons was made on April 29, the Government majority being 32.

A hurricane swept the northeast coast of Australia on the 22d inst. A pearl-fishing fleet, numbering forty boats, was destroyed, and 550 persons perished. The steamer Benton of Singapore was recently sunk in a collision with a bark off the island of Formosa, and 150 persons, among whom was no European, were drowned.

A VERY IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE first meeting of the most ambitious society the world has ever seen, was held on Sunday night in Chickering Hall—we mean the "Anti-Poverty Society." The object of this society is not to diminish poverty, or to console those who suffer from it with the promise of better things in a future life, but, to use the words of Dr. McGlynn, who was the principal speaker, "to pluck out the very heart of the hated thing—not to coddle it by plaster or poultice, but to reach to the basis which is the perennial and fruitful parent of that horrid poverty resulting from the injustice of man in violating the laws of God."

The metaphors here are a little mixed, but there is no rhetorical fault which may not be pardoned to a man who is announcing such a change in the near future as the disappearance of poverty. This would really be the most tremendous change seen since the appearance of the human race on this globe, for during the whole of that period, as at this moment, the great mass of mankind has lived and died in poverty—that is, has been able by hard labor to extract little more than a bare living from the soil. This is true of all countries and all ages, under all systems of land tenure and all systems of government. There are countries, and there have been ages, in which men were less poor and more contented than in others, but in all countries and all ages most men are more or less poor and more or less discontented. This is true of the people of Europe, of Asia, Africa and America. In all of them poverty has probably the same cause, whether it be, as we think, the niggardliness of nature, or, as Dr. McGlynn thinks, the injustice of man. In other words, whatever may be the cause of poverty, it is something tremendous in its power, and extent, and duration. The Society, therefore, which undertakes the speedy squelching or removing of this cause is a glorious society. If it succeeds without deceiving anybody, or obtaining money or goods from anybody on false pretences, its founders will take the place in human memory and imagination now occupied by all the prophets, apostles, saints, and sages of every age and clime. To say they will become famous would be ridiculous. Their position towards the human race will more nearly resemble that once occupied by the Greek and Roman divinities than that which the modern world has been in the habit of assigning to mortals, however illustrious. McGlynn and George will, in other words, if the Society succeeds, most certainly be worshipped as deities. Nothing the Positivists or Agnostics can say will prevent it. Halls dedicated to them and in which they will receive divine honors will spring up all over the country, and Chickering Hall will be put under glass and kept for pilgrims from all parts of the globe as the sacred spot from which the decree went forth which put an end to the greatest and most constant of human ills.

We are not ourselves, however, very sanguine about the matter, because Dr. McGlynn already seems to us to profess to know a great deal more of the intentions of the Almighty than the facts quite warrant. He said, for instance, apparently from his own knowledge, that "God cannot have sent the great mass of His children into this world to be cursed for ever with misery and poverty." Now, we do not ourselves know what the future of the race is to be. We trust it will be far happier than the past has been; but we are sure there is something wrong about Dr. McGlynn's deductions from the fatherhood of God. His argument is, that as God is our father, he cannot have intended any of us to be poor and miserable. But the fact is that the great bulk of us have been poor, miserable, and ignorant for countless ages, and are so still. Why this should be, we no more know than why man was sent on this planet at all. But Dr. McGlynn knows no more about it than we do. If his argument be good for anything with regard to the future, it ought to be good with regard to the past. But with regard to the past we know it to be as vain and empty as the ring of a brass farthing. God, in other words, has not governed the world on the McGlynn plan, and there is no reason to suppose that He will govern it hereafter on any plan recommended by McGlynn. He takes no account of resolutions passed in halls or even of popular majorities. In India, within our own time, where the land is all held on the George plan—that is, owned by the State and rented to the cultivators—hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children have perished miserably of famine, not through the injustice of men, but through drought. How is this to be explained on the McGlynn theory? Why did the earth not bring forth her fruits for these innocent peasants, and prevent the awful misery of a great famine? Why did earthquakes and volcanoes lay waste thousands of square miles in the Spice Islands a few years ago, and the overflow of the lower Ganges drown tens of thousands? We do not know, and the man who says he knows, and tries to get simple people to act on his information in the management of their lives, is undoubtedly either a deluded person or a charlatan.

What is most melancholy, however, about such oratory as Dr. McGlynn's and Henry George's is, not simply that they are trying to persuade ignorant people that their land scheme is divine in its origin, and would banish poverty, but that it can be successfully carried into execution by human agency; or, in other words, that we have the talent and capacity at command for the management of the whole continent as Government property, with such justice, honesty, intelligence, and foresight that no man shall be poor or unhappy. They do this, too, in full view of the result of poor Powderly's much less ambitious attempt to regulate the affairs of a few hundred thousand wage-earners, in different parts of the country. Powderly is really a man of very moderate abilities, little education, and apparently a poor physique; but he nevertheless undertook to create an organization which should solve the "labor problem" on this continent, and which he was to direct for the ridiculously low salary of $5,000 a year. He has only been two or three years in full work in his new post; and although he has never come anywhere near success, he is already crying out to his followers to have mercy on him. His wail, printed in the morning papers, is, when one considers what the man undertook, as ludicrous as anything in comic literature. He complains of the number of letters he receives, and implores people not to write to him or send him invitations to lecture. His strength, he says, will not stand the strain, and he "must have relief from unnecessary labor." But he has no right to ask for relief. Anybody who undertakes to tell all the trades in the United States how to manage their business, and all capitalists how to spend their money, is not entitled to relaxation.

TRUSTS AND CONFIDENCES.

THE public are hardly aware of the magnitude of the power growing up among them under the name of "Trusts." We are all familiar with corporations. We know where to find them. We know what their powers are. We can call them to account. The shareholders can inspect their books and in some cases understand them. They are the creatures of law and are subject to its limitations. These have been defined by judicial decisions extending over hundreds of years, so that anybody who takes the trouble can learn to a nicety what any corporation can do, and what it cannot. Nearly all corporations, for instance, have a limited capital and a limited debt, neither of which can be exceeded without express public authority. So, also, they are limited as to the nature of their undertakings. A railroad company cannot engage in manufacturing or general trading without express authority. A manufacturing company cannot engage in navigation, or banking, or publishing newspapers, or supplying gas to cities, or speculating in land or in stocks, or in any trade not specified in its charter. These limitations are in the interest of the shareholders as well as of the public. They are grounded in reason, and they form the substratum of corporate existence everywhere.

The "trust" is the sphinx of corporations, except that it is not a corporation at all. It may own and control many corporations, but it is bound by no law. There are no limitations upon it, not even those of time and space. Neither the public nor the shareholders can call it to account. It has no fixed abode, no place of meeting, no books of account that anybody can demand access to. It may engage in any kind of business or in many different kinds at once. It is irresponsible to the last degree. It may dissipate the capital confided to it without danger to anybody except the confiding investors. It may oppress the public without fear of the State because there is nothing for the State to lay hold of. Although it calls itself a trust, it is as far as possible from being such. There is a body of law applicable to trusts, but there is no law applicable to "the trust." It should be called a Confidence, since it has no similitude to anything known to the law as a trust.

What is meant by a trust in the present acceptation of the term, as, Standard Oil Trust, Cotton Oil Trust, Gas Trust, etc., is this: Certain persons conceive the idea of buying up all the machinery and tools in the country applied to the production of some staple article. They call themselves a trust, and invite the public to subscribe money to carry the plan into effect. They also invite the producers of the article to put their establishments into the trust, representing that thus competition can be controlled. They have no act of incorporation. They could not get one if they wanted it, and they do not want it. They get a certain number of producers with their plant into the trust and a certain amount of money into the treasury. Then they begin to force the other producers to come in by employing their heavy capital to crush them if they do not. The Standard Oil Trust had, as is well known, the coöperation of the railroads to help them to crush out rival refiners and dealers; but such assistance cannot be reckoned on hereafter if the Commerce Act remains in force.

It is a matter for surprise that the public are willing to put their money and property thus into the hands of irresponsible persons beyond the safeguards of law. That they will do so is shown clearly enough by the rapid growth of the Cotton Oil Trust. The Standard Oil Trust is a slower growth, but a much more formidable one. It has "blazed the way" for all the others, and has excited the investing public with a vision of equally large profits to be derived from the magical name of trusts. It has kindled a new form of madness in the speculating public, such as the South Sea Company bred after its kind in London a century and a half ago. There is nothing in the history of the "bubble companies" more absurd than the present eagerness of the public to put their money in places where they can never control it again, or learn anything about it more than the "trust" chooses to tell them. Most of those who throw their money into these confidences will lose it. They certainly ought to. They will lose it not because the managers are dishonest—so far as we know anything about them, they are not—but because they are striving after the unattainable. They are striving to circumvent the law of competition over the whole of a vast continent.

The Standard Oil Trust has accomplished this end for the time being, but the Standard Oil Trust will be put to death somehow and some time, most probably by its own vaulting ambition. Having secured its oil monopoly, it is now reaching out in many different directions after other things—railroads in Virginia, steam-heating works in New York, gas wells in Pennsylvania and Ohio, etc. It may have cattle ranches in Montana, and cotton presses in Texas, and salmon canneries in Oregon for aught that anybody knows. But whether it comes to an end one way or another, it is certain that the American people will not allow themselves to be bound and strangled, like a blind Samson or an aged Laocoön, by a lot of new-fangled monopolies calling themselves trusts. A way will be found to get rid of them, and it will be a lawful way. Meanwhile we counsel the investing public to give them a wide berth.

"THE MUGWUMP IDEA."

THE Nashville (Tenn.) American, a Democratic journal of ability and force, is impatient at our recent suggestion that the Administration cannot afford, at this stage in its history, to permit the use of the offices merely as patronage, and our criticism of dismissals of Republicans for purely political reasons. The American makes a serious blunder, however, in stating the ground of this criticism. "The Mugwump idea of civil-service reform," it says, "is to keep all Republicans in office and fill all the vacancies with Republicans."

The misconception of the Mugwump position here shown is so radical that it seems worth while to restate it correctly. To do so requires the change of only a very few words in the American's definition, which should read thus: The Mugwump idea of civil-service reform is to keep all faithful and competent incumbents in subordinate offices, and to fill all the vacancies with the best men who can be secured. It is understood, of course, that the small number of high offices whose incumbents necessarily have to do with the formulation or execution of a party policy are not here taken into account, since nobody disputes that a President should make changes in such offices.

It is always much easier to elucidate a principle by a few illustrations than by abstract reasoning, and we think we can make our meaning plain by referring to three or four concrete cases. Soon after Mr. Cleveland became President, the term of Mr. Henry G. Pearson as Postmaster of New York expired, and the question arose as to who should fill the office for the ensuing four years. The spoilsmen in the President's party urged that, as there was a Democratic President at Washington, there should be a Democratic Postmaster in New York, and that the President's duty was to order a competitive examination, open only to "party workers," and give the place to the applicant who could establish the strongest "claims." The Mugwump idea was that the incumbent, who had scrupulously kept out of politics and had made his office the model post office in the country, ought to be reappointed, on the simple ground that he could render the public better service than anybody else, and that the fact that he was personally a Republican in party predilections had nothing to do with the matter.

About a year later the term of the Brooklyn Postmaster expired. He had been an incompetent official, who had been given the place largely on sentimental grounds, because he had been a brave soldier and his wounds pleaded that he should be "taken care of" at the public expense. The Mugwump idea in this case was (it being assumed that the vacancy must be filled by a Democrat) that the Democrat should be selected, not who could present the strongest evidence that he deserved public reward for partisan service, or who could make out the strongest case that he needed the office because he could not earn a living in any other way, but who should appear most likely to give the Brooklyn public a businesslike administration of the office.

Since Mr. Cleveland was inaugurated, several notable cases have happened in Massachusetts where the terms of postmasters expired who had been Republicans, but not offensive partisans, and who had conducted their offices upon business principles. The Mugwump idea in all such cases was that, these offices being purely institutions for conducting a branch of the public business, men who had proved their competency and had not been politically objectionable should be retained in charge. A case now pending in Roxbury, a suburban district of Boston, perfectly illustrates the Mugwump idea. The Post-office in Roxbury is a branch of the Boston office, and its superintendent is an old Union soldier, who began his postal service in the main office, and was promoted ten years ago to the charge of the Roxbury branch, where he has been for ten years. As an official, by universal consent, he has been quiet, gentlemanly, accommodating, and efficient in the highest degree. No complaint of failure in duty has ever been lodged against him; on the contrary, patrons of the office are enthusiastic in his praise. A Republican in party faith, he has scrupulously kept the office out of politics, and no Democrat ever found cause of grievance against him for any display of partisanship. The Mugwump idea is that such a man should be retained as head of the Roxbury office just as long as he can be had. The spoilsman's idea, on the other hand, is that he should forfeit his place to some Democrat, because he is a Republican in party faith, while there is a Democratic Administration at Washington, and a movement is now under way to secure his removal solely and avowedly upon this ground.

A case which has just come to the surface in Illinois still more pointedly illustrates the Mugwump idea by presenting the perfect flower of the opposite theory. The Post-office at Rochelle fell vacant, and it was filled in accordance with the spoils principle. The boss of the Democratic organization in that region is one McNamara, and, by virtue of that fact, McNamara was held to be the man who should dictate the choice of Postmaster at Rochelle. He recommended and thus secured the nomination of a man named Gardner, as his first choice. But Gardner turned out to be the proprietor of gin-mills in three or four places, and to have been indicted for violating the liquor law, while a fresh indictment for the same offence was found when his name was before the Senate, and it had to be withdrawn. Although thus deprived of the salary himself, Gardner resolved to make something out of the office, and he offered to get the place for one Taylor, demanding $600. Taylor was willing only to pay $300, and a contract was drawn up on that basis, a facsimile of which has been published and is not questioned. But there was a quarrel, the negotiations finally fell through, and Taylor forwarded his papers without McNamara's endorsement. The next development was the announcement that one Furlong, a clerk in a clothing-store, with no qualifications for the office, had been appointed, and, of course, everybody believes that he got the place because he would pay what McNamara demanded.

These illustrations are enough to show what the Mugwump idea about appointments really is, in contradistinction to the spoilsman's idea. But there is one other phase of the matter to which we call the especial attention of the American. It is also the Mugwump idea that, purely from the standpoint of party advantage, the system of filling offices upon business principles pays better than the contrary policy; and here, too, we appeal to facts, rather than indulge in theory. There is not in New York a candid person who will not admit that Mr. Cleveland's Administration is far stronger to-day with the voters of this city because he retained an efficient Republican as Postmaster than it would have been if he had appointed any Democrat. Nobody can be found in Brooklyn who will deny that the Democratic party stands better with the people of that city because Mr. Cleveland appointed as Postmaster a Democrat who runs the Post-office as a business institution than it would have been if he had picked out the shrewdest wirepuller in the party and allowed him to run it as part of the Democratic Machine. In the Roxbury case Democrats of the highest standing can be summoned as witnesses to prove that the Mugwump idea of retaining faithful postmasters is the best idea for the Democratic party. Mayor O'Brien of Boston, who is a resident of the Roxbury district, refused to sign the petition for the removal of the incumbent, being firmly convinced that he ought to be retained despite his Republicanism. Ex-Mayor Palmer is outspoken on the same side, and he says that conversation with a number of leading Democrats shows that they agree with him. These Democrats see that nothing worse could happen to their party than for it to gain a post-office at the expense of proving its disregard for the public interests. If they need any evidence to sustain this belief, they need only point any Bourbon member of their party to Rochelle, Ill., where the popular disgust with the proceedings of the spoilsmen has distinctly weakened the Democratic party. And if Rochelle is not enough, they can point the still unconvinced Bourbon to Haverhill, Ohio, where a Democratic postmaster, appointed with a flagrant disregard of Mugwump principles, the other day shot a public-spirited citizen who was trying to restrict the liquor traffic, and thus did his best as an official representative of the party to justify the "Rum" branch of the famous alliteration.

In short, and to sum up the whole matter, the Mugwump idea is that honesty is the best policy, in politics as well as in everything else.

THE KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS IN A NEW LIGHT.

EUTAW PLACE, BALTIMORE, April 22.

AMID the revived interest in the Kentucky Resolutions, caused by the publications in the Southern Bivouac last spring, I was asked if there were any letters or papers in the archives of my family bearing on this subject. The search made in response to this appeal was disappointing. One letter, however, was found from Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Wilson Cary Nicholas of Virginia, dated August 26, 1799, which was thought at the time not to be in print. In this error I continued until a week ago, when it was found—inaccurately given—in the Congressional edition of Mr. Jefferson's works. This letter, as is seen below, plans a meeting at Monticello for the discussion between Mr. W. C. Nicholas, Mr. Madison, Mr. Monroe, and Mr. Jefferson himself of the Kentucky Resolutions. A second letter from Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Nicholas, written September 5, 1799, which is also given below, shows that this meeting did not take place.

Reflection on the contents of the first letter, taken in connection with those of the second, excited in me the suspicion that, when writing the Breckinridge letter twenty-three years later, his "waning memory" had played Mr. Jefferson false, and that a strange blending in his thoughts and recollections of plans with incidental occurrences had resulted in leaving us, in this letter of 1821, what may be called an epistolary composite photograph. In other words, the two letters of August 26 and September 5, 1799, taken in connection with the "great lapse of time" alluded to in the letter of 1821, suggested to me the idea that the meeting described in this last, as taking place at Monticello, had never in fact occurred. That Mr. Jefferson, under existing circumstances, should have labored under the delusion that it did take place, did not seem to me inexplicable or very strange, though, should it be proved that he had done so, it would unquestionably be both a striking and an interesting instance of misremembrance.

With my imagination captivated by this view of the subject, I determined to sift the matter to the bottom, particularly as by so doing I should but be fulfilling a promise made to a descendant of George Nicholas, to whom the lithographed copy of the Breckinridge letter in the Southern Bivouac did not seem conclusive proof that the original had not been written to Nelson Nicholas, son of George, the supposed recipient. Knowing that no satisfactory investigation of the subject could be made without examining the Jefferson manuscripts in Washington, I determined to do this. Access to these papers being kindly granted me, early in the summer my task began, and to make known through your columns the important discovery resulting therefrom is the object of this communication. For the personal details unavoidably thrusting themselves into it, let me at once apologize to yourself and to your readers, as well as crave your indulgence for their persistent recurrence.

With Mr. Jefferson's manuscripts before me, it was the work of but a few minutes to find his letter-book, turn to the year 1821, and find the following entries under the respective heads of received and answered:

Dec. 9, J. Cabell Breckinridge, Frankfort.

Dec. 11, J. Cabell Breckinridge.

There could be, of course, no appeal from the decision of this arbiter as to the address of the letter of December 11, 1821.

Turning to the letters themselves, I found Mr. Breckinridge's original letter which called forth Mr. Jefferson's much-discussed response. The date of Mr. Breckinridge's letter being November 19, explains how Mr. Jefferson's pen slid into the mistake of writing "your letter of Dec. 19," when he had just dated his own letter Dec. 11. Mr. Breckinridge's handsome letter is given below, and Mr. Jefferson's answer to it.

FRANKFORT, November 19, 1821.

DEAR SIR: If I had not experienced the effects of your candour and obliging indulgence on a former occasion and on a subject connected with the memory of my father, I should feel an insuperable reluctance to trouble you with this letter. A very brief narrative will explain its object.

In the Richmond Enquirer of September 4, in an editorial stricture on certain articles that had appeared in the National Intelligencer, the writer, in support of his principles, refers to the authority of your name and opinions, and expresses himself in the following words: "We protested against putting Mr. J. forth as chief of a new party, and that the doctrine we held on the great question of supremacy in cases of collision between the two governments was the doctrine of the old Republican party of Mr. Madison's report of '98, and of the Kentucky Resolutions penned by Mr. J. himself."

Well knowing that the resolutions here alluded to were introduced into the Legislature of Kentucky by my father as his own production, I was greatly astonished by the assertion of the editor. Convinced, as I am, that the mover of the resolutions would not have consented thus to appropriate the labors even of his illustrious friend, I did believe the assertion to be untrue.

To a man the measure of whose fame and usefulness is full, an occurrence like the present may be regarded with indifference. But when you remember that the providence of God arrested at an early period the auspicious career of him whose loss we have cause so deeply to deplore, you will excuse, nay approve, the sensibility which I feel on every subject connected with his just renown. If I am not deceived in the temper of the times, the day is at hand when the struggle of '98 is to be renewed with decisive characteristics of consolidating intent, and these States are to maintain a second contest for the purity and extent of their ancient rights. At such a crisis, involving the safety and perpetuity of some of the most sacred principles of American freedom, the recollection of similar events, the corresponding sentiments and acts of departed patriots, will be revived with peculiar interest and powerful effect, and I can distinctly perceive the value of your written declarations to ensure justice to the memory of one whom, living, you largely contributed to exalt. Believing that I cannot give a better evidence of the sincerity and respect of the present application than by omitting all formal and affected apologies for having made it, I hasten to assure you of my high consideration, and to offer you my sincerest wishes for your continued health and happiness.

J. CABELL BRECKINRIDGE.

Th. Jefferson to J. Cabell Breckinridge.

MONTICELLO, December 11, 1821.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of December the 19th places me under a dilemma which I cannot solve but by an exposition of the naked truth. I would have wished this rather to have remained as hitherto, without inquiry; but your inquiries have a right to be answered. I will do it as exactly as the great lapse of time and a waning memory will enable me. I may misremember indifferent circumstances, but can be right in substance.

At the time when the Republicans of our country were so much alarmed at the proceedings of the Federal ascendency in Congress, in the Executive and Judiciary Departments, it became a matter of serious consideration how head could be made against their enterprises on the Constitution. The leading Republicans in Congress found themselves of no use there, browbeaten as they were by a bold and overwhelming majority. They concluded to retire from that field, take a stand in the State Legislatures, and endeavor there to arrest their progress. The alien and sedition laws furnished the particular occasion. The sympathy between Virginia and Kentucky was more cordial, and more intimately confidential, than between any other two States of Republican policy. Mr. Madison came into the Virginia Legislature. I was then in the Vice-Presidency and could not leave my station; but your father, Col. W. C. Nicholas, and myself happening to be together, the engaging the coöperation of Kentucky in an energetic protestation against the constitutionality of those laws became a subject of consultation. Those gentlemen pressed me strongly to sketch resolutions for that purpose, your father undertaking to introduce them to that Legislature, with a solemn assurance, which I strictly required, that it should not be known from what quarter they came. I drew and delivered them to him, and in keeping their origin secret he fulfilled his pledge of honor. Some years after this, Colonel Nicholas asked me if I would have any objection to its being known that I had drawn them. I pointedly enjoined that it should not. Whether he had unguardedly intimated it before to any one I know not, but I afterwards observed in the papers repeated imputations of them to me; on which, as has been my practice on all occasions of imputation I have observed entire silence. The question, indeed, has never before been put to me, nor should I answer it to any other than yourself; seeing no good end to be proposed by it, and the desire of tranquility inducing with me a wish to be withdrawn from public notice. Your father's zeal and talents were too well known to derive any additional distinction from the penning these resolutions. That circumstance, surely, was of far less merit than the proposing and carrying them through the Legislature of his State. The only fact in this statement on which my memory is not distinct, is the time and occasion of the consultation with your father and Col. Nicholas. It took place here, I know; but whether any other person was present, or communicated with, is my doubt. I think Mr. Madison was either with us, or consulted, but my memory is uncertain as to minute details. . . . TH. JEFFERSON.

It will naturally be asked, If the above-described meeting never took place, how could Mr. Jefferson say, "Those gentlemen pressed me strongly to sketch resolutions for that purpose"? But this assertion is also easily attributable to a confused recollection of events. Mr. Madison and Mr. Nicholas must have held in fresh recollection his paper addressed, in the form of a petition from the inhabitants of certain counties in his own State, "To the Speaker and House of Delegates of the Commonwealth of Virginia, being a Protest against interference of Judiciary between Representative and Constituent," written the year before; and, alarmed and excited as the Republicans seem to have been at the passage of the Alien and Sedition Laws, it is more than probable that these gentlemen should, on some occasion, have urged Mr. Jefferson to prepare a similar paper—or one that could be used in a similar way—on the subject of these laws.

In 1815 young Breckinridge wrote to Mr. Jefferson, asking him for material for a biographical notice of his father, which some one in Kentucky wished to write. Mr. Jefferson's letter in reply will not be found out of place here, explaining, as it does, Mr. Breckinridge's allusion to "a former occasion" in his letter of 1821. This letter is also important as indicating the only occasion on which the elder Breckinridge was ever at Monticello:

Thomas Jefferson to Joseph Cabell Breckinridge, Esq.:

MONTICELLO, June 12, '15.

SIR: Your favour of May 14 has been duly received, and I should willingly contribute to the biography of your estimable father whatever my short acquaintance with him and still shorter memory would enable me to do. But of historical fact this would be little; and of testimony to his merit, only what is known to all who knew him. Our acquaintance first arose soon after my return from Europe. He was so kind as to favour me with a visit, and during its short continuance I had opportunity sufficient to discern the large scope of his mind, the stores of information laid up in it, and the moral direction given to both. His subsequent appointment to Congress renewed my opportunities of estimating his character. He became one of our most valuable bulwarks in stemming the tide which then set so strongly against the Republican principles of our Government, and labored in it with the zeal and abilities for which he was distinguished. The sense I entertained of his high qualifications and merit was sufficiently proved afterwards by my calling him to our aid in the Cabinet of the Government and confiding to him the important office of Attorney-General of the United States; and his death left a chasm in our councils which we sensibly felt and sincerely lamented. In saying this I say no more than was generally known to all, and if my testimony, added to theirs, can strengthen in any degree the establishment of a character which deserved so well of his country, I give it with pleasure and in the spirit of the sincere affection I bore him. Be so good as, with it, to accept the assurance of my high regard and consideration for his family and for yourself.

The two following letters now come under consideration. Both are addressed to W. C. Nicholas:

MONTICELLO, August 26, 1799.

DEAR SIR: I am deeply impressed with the importance of Virginia and Kentucky pursuing the same track at the ensuing sessions of their Legislatures. Your going thither furnishes a valuable opportunity of effecting it, and as Mr. Madison will be at our assembly as well as yourself, I thought it important to procure a meeting between you. I therefore wrote to propose to him to ride to this place on Saturday or Sunday next, supposing that both he and yourself might perhaps have some matter of business at our court, which might render it less inconvenient for you to be here on Sunday. I took it for granted that you would not set off for Kentucky pointedly at the time you proposed, and hope and strongly urge your favouring us with a visit at the time proposed. Mrs. Madison, who was the bearer of my letter, assured me I might count on Mr. M.'s being here. Not that I mentioned to her the object of my request, or that I should propose the same to you; because I presume the less said of such a meeting the better. I shall take care that Monroe shall dine with us. In hopes of seeing you, I bid you affectionately adieu. TH: JEFFERSON.

MONTICELLO, September 5, 1799.

DEAR SIR: Yours of August 30 came duly to hand. It was with great regret we gave up the hope of seeing you here, but could not but consider the obstacle as legitimate. I had written to Mr. Madison, as I had before informed you, and had stated to him some general ideas for consideration and consultation when we should meet. I thought something essentially necessary to be said, in order to avoid the inference of acquiescence; that a declaration or resolution should be passed. . . . As to the preparing anything, I must decline it, to avoid suspicions (which were pretty strong in some quarters on the late occasion), and because there remains still (after their late loss) a mass of talents in Kentucky sufficient for every purpose. The only object of the present communication is to procure a concert in the general plan of action, as it is extremely desirable that Virginia and Kentucky should pursue the same track on this occasion. Besides, how could you better while away the road from hence to Kentucky, than in meditating this very subject, and preparing something yourself, than whom nobody will do it better? The loss of your brother and the visit of the apostle Marshall to Kentucky excite anxiety. However, we doubt not that his poisons will be effectually counterworked. Wishing you a pleasant journey and happy return, I am with great and sincere esteem, dear sir, you affectionate friend and servant, TH: JEFFERSON.

The mistake in the published copy of the first of these two letters, alluded to above, is the slight but obviously misleading one of putting "Mrs. Monroe," instead of simply "Monroe," as in the original.

In the letter of August, 1799, we have a meeting planned which the September letter of that year proves did not take place. In the letter of 1821 we have a description, written twenty-three years after its alleged occurrence, of a not dissimilar meeting. In the September letter (in a passage omitted in the foregoing excerpt) Mr. Jefferson speaks of "Mr. M., who came," and in the letter of 1821 he thinks "Mr. Madison was with us or consulted." In the "great lapse of time," had not what he had planned in writing been all unconsciously transformed in his thoughts and recollections into an actual occurrence? Did not the octogenarian build better than he knew when he alluded to that "great lapse of time" and to "a waning memory"? Might not he, in looking back through the long vista of years—for him so crowded with events and scenes of excitement—have not only misremembered "indifferent circumstances," but have been also somewhat wrong "in substance"?

With this view of the subject more and more strongly possessing my mind, those who know what it is to face a reluctant past, with the determination to wring from it, if possible, a long-kept secret, can appreciate the feelings with which I sat down before the bound volume of Mr. Jefferson's letters covering the years 1798–1799. The search for anything bearing on the subject in hand seemed a hopeless task as I turned over page after page of letter-press copies on almost all of whose time-stained sheets the writing had faded away into illegibility. The intense satisfaction which I felt is not, therefore, to be described when suddenly the monotony of the dingy-hued letter-press copies was broken by the appearance in their midst of a white sheet of letter-paper, covered with Mr. Jefferson's autographic writing; the letters and words being so clear and distinct that a single glance caught names which instantly attracted attention. As it tells its own story, let this messenger of the past speak for itself:

Copy of a letter to Wilson C. Nicholas. Time not permitting a press copy, this was immediately written from recollection and is nearly verbatim.

MONTICELLO, October 5, '98.

DR. SIR: I entirely approve of the confidence you have reposed in Mr. Breckinridge, as he possesses mine entirely. I had imagined it better these resolutions should have originated with N. Carolina, but perhaps the late changes in their representation may indicate some doubt whether they would have passed. In that case it is better they should come from Kentucky. I understand you intend soon to go as far as Mr. Madison's. You know I have no secrets for him. I wish him, therefore, to be consulted as to these resolutions. The post-boy waiting at the door obliges me to finish here with the assurance of the high esteem of Dr. Sir,

Your friend and servant,
TH: JEFFERSON.

WILSON CARY NICHOLAS.

See his letter of October 4, '98, to which this is an answer.

So, then, the author of these famous resolutions had forgotten, when he sat down to write their history twenty-three years later, that they were originally intended for North Carolina, and it does seem impossible to believe, with the above letter before us, that their composition by him could have resulted from any such conference as the one described in his letter of 1821. The choice of North Carolina as the State in which the resolutions should originate was probably made because of a suggestion in regard to that State and Virginia which had been made by John Taylor of Caroline, to which Mr. Jefferson refers in a letter to him of June 1, 1798.

The recovery of the very important letter of October 4, 1798, from Mr. Nicholas to Mr. Jefferson, has so far baffled all efforts in the search which is being made for it. Until it is found, the story of the resolutions must remain incomplete, and in its absence it may seem bold to hazard a conjecture concerning an historical question whose investigation has been but a succession of surprises. If one might be ventured, however, it would be that Mr. Jefferson intrusted the resolutions to his most intimate friend, Mr. W. C. Nicholas; that the latter decided to have them introduced into the Kentucky Legislature by Mr. Breckinridge, and, having an opportunity of sending them to Kentucky, sent a post boy to Monticello, some twenty miles away from his own home, to get Mr. Jefferson's final approval of his course. Whether George Nicholas was called on to take any prominent part in this matter remains an open question, for Mr. Jefferson's allusions to him in his letter of September 5, 1799, would seem to imply that he had been, as the expression in that letter "their loss" refers to his death, on which greater stress still is laid at the close of that letter. And here it is proper for me to say that when my father edited his grandfather's correspondence, and boldly placed at the head of the letter of December 11, 1821, the address To ——— Nicholas, he did so under the impression that the Kentucky Resolutions of '98 had been intrusted to George Nicholas. That this was his impression tended naturally to strengthen the probability that such was the case, for he could have received such an impression only from his grandfather, Mr. Jefferson, and from his father-in-law, Mr. W. C. Nicholas, with both of whom he was, in their declining years, in constant and intimate intercourse. It is easy to see how my father may have been misled by hearing through them of the great talents of George Nicholas, of his boundless influence in Kentucky, and of the zealous and effective warfare which he waged against the Alien and Sedition Laws. His attacks on these were embodied in a vigorously written pamphlet, which Mr. Jefferson considered a strong weapon of attack, for we find him writing about it in February, 1799, and sending it by the dozen to his lieutenants, to be given "to the most influential characters among our countrymen, who are only misled, who are candid enough to be open to conviction, and who may have most effect on their neighbors. It would be useless to give them to persons already sound. Do not let my name be connected with the business." (Jefferson to Monroe.)

John Taylor of Caroline must have been sounded by Mr. W. C. Nicholas as regards the resolutions for the Virginia Legislature, for in a most interesting letter from him to Mr. Nicholas lying before me, dated October 27, 1798, he says: "It is out of my power to meet you at the parsonage. . . . But if you have any scheme of efficacy in hand you will find me apt. But observe I abhor all 'resolutions' and addresses." I find still more interesting words from him—words which explain Mr. Jefferson's allusions, in a letter already quoted, to suspicions "which were pretty strong in some quarters on the late occasion." In an undated letter headed: "J. Taylor to the Vice-President," he says: "Some resolutions have appeared here from Kentucky, not passed but on the eve of passing that Legislature. As soon as they appear authenticated, the great effort will be directed to their approbation in the words of a response. I would not wish my inclinations gratified by the slightest risque on your part—it is obvious that the common cause would thence also be exposed to injury—but whatever can be safely said will be highly gratifying.—Health and happiness."

Curiously illustrating how the years '98 and '99 were confounded by him whenever they came up in connection with the Kentucky Resolutions, Mr. Jefferson has written on the back of this undated letter: "Probably '99, rec'd Dec. 11," when it is quite impossible for it to be any year but 1798.

The last communication from Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Nicholas in connection with this subject during 1798 comes in the following:

Th. J. to Col. W. C. Nicholas.

The more I have reflected on the phrase in the paper you showed me, the more strongly I think it should be altered. Suppose you were, instead of the invitation to coöperate in the annulment of the acts, to make it an invitation to concur with this commonwealth in declaring, as it does hereby declare, that the said acts are, and were ab initio, null and of no force or effect.—Health, happiness and adieu.—November 29, '98.

A perusal of the full text of Mr. Jefferson's letter of September 5, 1799, to Mr. Nicholas shows that this letter was the basis of the Kentucky Resolutions of 1799.

It is a long cry from 1805 to 1887, and yet a letter I have found from Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Nicholas, written March, 1805, shows his situation, between "conflicting" friends, to be so similar to that of his worthy successor, the present chief magistrate of the nation, that the coincidence of this letter coming to light just at this time is too striking for the following quotation from it not to be published:

"I did believe my station in March, 1801, as painful as could be undertaken, having to meet in front all the terrible passions of Federalism in the first moments of its defeat and mortification, and to grapple with it until completely subdued; but I consider that as less painful than to be placed between conflicting friends. There my way was clear and my mind made up. I never for a moment had to balance between two opinions. In the new divisions which are to arise, the case will be very different. Even those who seem to coalesce will be like the image of clay and brass. However, under difficulties of this kind I have ever found one, and one only, rule, to do what is right, and generally we shall disentangle ourselves without almost perceiving how it happens."

Happy the people whose ruler follows this simple rule for "disentangling" himself from the difficulties of his situation; and congratulating ourselves that so it is with us of to-day, I close with an apology for the length of this letter, which an awkward pen could not abridge.

SARAH NICHOLAS RANDOLPH.

P. S.—My letter was written and signed when, on reading it to a friend, it was found that he had, among letters sent him by a member of the Breckinridge family, one from Mr. Nicholas which makes up for the loss of his of October 4, 1798, to Mr. Jefferson. Strangely coming forward at the eleventh hour, as it were, it is the finishing proof of the non-occurrence of the meeting at Monticello, and thus confirms the theory to that effect put forward in the opening of this communication to the Nation, from which the letter itself cannot be omitted.

To John Breckinridge.

WARREN, October 10, 1798.

DEAR SIR: I have been very sick since you left me. . . . I have had a letter from our friend. He approves what I have done. He says you possess his confidence entirely—that he thinks the business had better commence in your State. He regrets that he missed the visit that you and your brother intended him, though he is sensible of the delicacy and motives of the omission. He suggests nothing further upon the subject; indeed, I think that everything is said that can be in the paper that you have. I shall be impatient to hear from you. God bless you and yours. Believe me to be your real friend,

WILSON C. NICHOLAS.

And now that the only missing link in the chain of facts connected with the origin of the Kentucky Resolutions is found and their history made complete by its recovery, I may be pardoned for expressing my gratification that it has fallen to the lot of a descendant reverently to lift the veil which, in obscuring the venerable statesman's memory, has so long concealed from posterity the truth.

AN EXHIBITION OF PHOTOGRAPHS AT LIVERPOOL.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE,
LIVERPOOL, April 18, 1887.

DURING the past twelve months it has been my agreeable duty to select and gather together a series of reproductions, as complete as possible, of the frescoes, easel-pictures, and drawings by Raphael. A somewhat similar collection in the Windsor Library was formed by the late Prince Consort, but photography was in its infancy in his days, and engravings form the chief part of that collection. My work was of novel character, and a description of it may not be without interest, for reasons which will hereafter appear.

Possessed of a preliminary acquaintance with the usual Raphael literature, I went to Berlin, where, in the Print Room of the Museum (and there only in the world, so far as I know), there is a large collection of photographs arranged not, in the first instance, according to galleries, but under the names of the artists whose works they reproduce. If you inquire for photographs of Raphael's works, you are shown a large press containing some score of portfolios, each holding 100 or less mounted photographs. These photographs are grouped under the galleries and private collections in which the originals occur, and include all works ascribed, rightly or wrongly, to the artist. The first thing was to go systematically through these, or rather through the various works on Raphael, one by one, referring to the photograph of every work mentioned and verifying statements made about it. By this means was formed an approximately correct list of all the genuine works by Raphael which have been photographed, and the list was drawn up in chronological order. This part of the work took about six weeks. The one to two thousand photographs purchasable of works ascribed to Raphael reduced themselves to about 500 photographs of genuine works.

The next thing was to go through all procurable photographers' catalogues (those, for example, of Braun, the Berlin Photographic Co., Hänfstängl, Brogi, Alinari, Naya, Perini), in order to see whether genuine works other than those to be found in the Berlin collection were not photographed. A considerable number were thus added.* Correspondence with directors of galleries and owners of works by Raphael enabled me to supply a few omissions.

When the complete list was formed, the photographs were ordered en masse, unmounted. They were mounted at home on uniform cards, and the few that were too big for the normal card, all of them frescoes, were frankly cut in half and mounted on two cards hinged together, the line of severance being almost imperceptible. Seven boxes were made, numbered, and lettered on the back, and the photographs were arranged in these boxes in chronological order, so that all the studies, designs, and cartoons for any picture, however scattered in various collections they might be, were grouped immediately before the picture itself. The entire series was then numbered, spaces being left for works known to exist but not yet photographed. Upon each card the subject of the work was written, and if the photograph represented a study for a picture, that also was stated. The date, if known, was added, and (most important of all) references to pages in the principal lives of the artist, or to special articles in magazines of high scientific standing dealing with the particular work. A cabinet to hold the boxes was all that was needed to make the collection complete. All the cards (except those hinged) being the same size, it was easy to have a number of frames made with movable backs fastened in by bars. The collection, thus framed and chronologically arranged, now hangs for public exhibition on the walls of two of the largest rooms in the Walker Art Gallery at Liverpool, where any of your readers who may chance to pass through the town during the next couple of months will be able to see it for themselves. A catalogue has been printed by the Museum Committee, in which I have endeavored to mention all known works of whatever kind by Raphael, adding the name of the photographer and the number of the photograph to each. Any one who likes to duplicate the collection can do so, for about £150, by help of this catalogue (sold by the Museum), not counting any duties there may be payable on this kind of intellectual luxury.

What has thus been done for Raphael might be done less completely, but fairly satisfactorily, for his chief contemporaries, predecessors, and successors north and south of the Alps. Heliogravure has been and is being employed to reproduce the works of the early engravers. The block-books, too, have been well reproduced. The Arundel Society's publications must not be forgotten. Mediæval miniatures have been photographed in considerable numbers. Early tapestries, such as the large collection at Madrid, have been published in photographic form. If we were to include photographs of ivory carvings, goldsmiths' work, medals, coins, wood carvings, details of sculpture, and architecture—still more, if we were to add casts of small objects and electrotype reproductions—we should have the materials for the formation of a museum of extraordinary interest and no small dimensions. Confining ourselves, however, to the graphic arts, the materials existing in the form of reproductions of works which may be regarded as having attained classical rank, amply suffice for the formation of a collection the educational value of which it is impossible to overestimate. On a small scale such a collection might be formed by a private collector with immense advantage to himself. It would require absorbingly interesting study. Such, however, is the slowness of men to move into new grooves of activity that I have been assured by a photographer that it would not pay him to photograph for sale a pen-and-ink drawing which the day before had been sold for over £500 at Christie's. That is to say, people are so anxious to exclude others from the possession of a piece of paper which bears a unique drawing, that they will bid a purchaser up to £500 before giving way and letting him have it; and yet they care so little about the thing as a work of art that, though they might purchase for half a crown a perfect and permanent reproduction of it (to all intents as good as the original), not a dozen would buy it even at that small price. Vulgarity of heart could scarcely go deeper.

* The Oxford collection is very partially photographed, the Frankfort collection not at all. Braun is said to be about to put an end to this scandalous state of things. Pictures and drawings in private collections in England are, of course, never photographed, notwithstanding the unrivalled opportunities for doing so which the old masters' exhibitions have afforded. Private collections in France are a little better, but still badly recorded. It is a scandal to the National Gallery authorities that no proper photograph of the Ansidei Madonna has yet been published.

The difficulty in the way of the formation of such a collection as I have sketched lies, not in finding materials, but in selection and arrangement. If the collection is to be of any use, it must be formed by a scholar. To purchase all the photographs of works ascribed to this and the other master and to lump them together would be to purchase an expensive chaos. Only genuine or probably genuine works must be represented, and they must be arranged chronologically under the names of the artists by whom they were made. The artists should be grouped chronologically in schools, and a complete catalogue should be prepared. Such a catalogue, made and published for one collection by a competent scholar, might serve for any number of duplicate collections. It seems incredible that, with all the talk about art in the present day, all the interest professed in it, all the trouble and discomfort people go through with the avowed object of travelling hither and thither to see its masterpieces, there should yet be so little real desire for and delight in it that no town has yet attempted to form for itself such a rational collection as the one I have described. There is a photographic chaos here and there, but not one collection historically cosmic. If a single town of importance would lead the way, others would probably follow; and the large commercial and manufacturing towns of America and the north of England are certainly the very places where such collections should be formed.

The chief impediment now to the would-be collector is his natural disinclination to buy photographs which in a few years will have faded away. Evanescent silver-prints are published by photographers because the public likes their nasty color and unpleasant gloss. Braun's autotypes and the heliogravures of the Berlin Photographic Company are infinitely pleasanter to look at, and will last as long as the paper they are printed on. If collections of the kind I advocate were as common as public libraries are (and one such ought to form part of every public library and museum), the demand for permanent photographs would soon create the supply, and Alinari, Brogi, and the rest would find it to their interest to cater for a more educated and discerning public than the one they now supply.

W. M. Conway.

FLAUBERT'S CORRESPONDENCE.

Paris, April 22, 1887.

Gustave Flaubert acquired a great reputation by his novel 'Madame Bovary.' This reputation was not increased by his later works. 'Madame Bovary' remains the type of the modern realistic novel; it has exercised a real influence on our literature. Flaubert may be considered as the father of our naturalists, impressionists, and so forth. His correspondence with Mme. Sand was published a few years ago, and was read with much interest. We have now before us the first volume of a new series, which will embrace his whole correspondence. It extends from 1830 to 1850, and is preceded by a preface of the editor, who is Flaubert's own niece, Mme. Caroline Comainville. Gustave Flaubert was educated with his sister Caroline, who was the mother of this lady. She tells us that he was not a brilliant scholar, and that his college years were miserable; he could never yield to the military discipline which is still kept up in the French lyceums. He composed tragedies from his earliest years, and played them with his sister and his friends.

Flaubert has given a sketch of his own father in 'Madame Bovary,' under the name of Dr. Larivière, who is called in consultation before the dying Emma. He was the son of a veterinary surgeon of Nogent-sur-Seine, and had become a doctor in an hospital in Rouen. He married a Mlle. Fleuriot, who was allied to some of the oldest families of Normandy, but without any fortune, except a little farm which yielded 4,000 francs a year. He became the surgeon-in-chief of the Hôtel-Dieu in Rouen, and Gustave Flaubert was born in this immense edifice. It is probable that he inherited from his father the tendency to experimentation, to the minute observation of the smallest and apparently most indifferent details, which is the characteristic of his literary school. As a child, he could look from his window on the gardens of the hospital, and see, under the trees, the sick walking or sitting on the stone benches, the sisters of charity in their black and white dresses—a melancholy and severe spectacle, which developed in him the sentiment of compassion for human suffering.

Flaubert, who always detested the "bourgeois," was very bourgeois in his habits:

"This man," says his niece, "so concerned for beauty of style, cared very little about the beauty of his surroundings: he used objects and furniture which were heavy and ungraceful; he had not in the least the passion for the bibelot, which is so developed in our time. He loved order passionately, and carried it to mania; he would not work unless his books were arranged in a certain fashion. He kept carefully all the letters which were addressed to him. I have found great boxes full of them. He always had the greatest regularity in his daily work; he put himself to it as an ox is put to the plough, without waiting for the inspiration."

Flaubert's father, having attained a high medical situation, was able to buy a country house at Croisset, on the Seine, where Flaubert spent nearly all his life. When he left the college, his father wished him to adopt a profession; he came to Paris and studied law. He took a little apartment in the Latin Quarter, but the student's life did not suit him. He felt a decided literary calling. He disliked Paris, and, as his health began to suffer, he returned to Rouen. His sister was married; his father died, and he soon remained alone with his mother. He had made in Paris the acquaintance of Maxime Du Camp, who had a more adventurous spirit, and who induced him to make a journey with him into Brittany, and, in 1849, a more important voyage in the East. The personal reminiscences of his niece begin at the time of his return; she was a child, and her uncle undertook to provide for her education. She describes very vividly the life which they led at the country house in Croisset, the habits of her uncle. She called him "mon vieux," and he called her "mon caro." He was a sort of giant, full of kindness, of affection, and he continued to give his niece lessons in history and geography till she was married. He lived for months at Croisset without seeing anybody outside of his family but his intimate friend, Louis Bouilhet. Three or four times a year he left for Paris, and stayed there, a few days only, in the Hôtel du Helder.

In 1856, however, when he decided to publish 'Madame Bovary,' he took rooms on the Boulevard du Temple, and his sister joined him. He sometimes gave little dinners for Sainte Beuve, Sandeau, Mme. Cornu (who was the so intimate friend of Napoleon III.), Théophile Gautier, and a few others. He was a constant guest of the Princess Mathilde Bonaparte, who received artists and writers, and who still has her salon. He was admitted to the famous dinners of Magny, which were composed only of himself, of Sainte-Beuve, Gautier, the two Goncourts, Gavarni, Renan, Taine, the Marquis de Chennevières, and Bouilhet.

In 1860 he began 'Salammbô,' and thought it necessary to make a journey to Tunis, and to see the site of Carthage. His niece was married in 1864, and he found himself more solitary. Mme. Comainville only made two visits a year to Croisset—one in the spring, one in the autumn. He never liked to leave his own house for any length of time. We had always been ignorant of the secret of this extraordinary fondness for solitude, but it has recently been revealed by Maxime Du Camp. With every appearance of health and strength, Flaubert had in him the germ of a frightful disease: he was subject to fits of epilepsy. He was half a doctor; he knew the symptoms of his malady, and when he felt that a crisis was coming, he rushed to Croisset, where he felt less in danger. It seems hard to live with such a sword of Damocles over your head. This perpetual fear, the nervous state which it created and which caused the malady, explain much in Flaubert that otherwise could not be well understood. It explains the great attachment which he felt for his family, and which his family felt for him. They treated him always as a sick man, as a spoiled child; they never crossed him in anything. They admired him and his works, as if their admiration, mixed with pity and tenderness, might work a cure. The family affections which filled the life of Flaubert had one disadvantage—they developed his self-love and his vanity to an almost alarming extent; they isolated him too much from his contemporaries. Flaubert grew up, as it were, in a hothouse. He pretended to be a naturalist, a realist; but, in fact, he saw very little of life. The best pages of 'Madame Bovary' are the descriptions of Normandy, of Rouen, of the Seine, of the pictures which he saw from morning to night. Paris was to him almost a terra incognita. His circle was small; he was morbid, afraid of making new acquaintances, intolerant, narrow-minded. His family overrated him, and he overrated himself—not from any feeling of foolish pride, but from a sort of inability to understand what was outside of his provincial horizon. One thing must be admired in him—he was sincere, he really believed in himself. He also had a warm heart, and his own mental and physical sufferings had developed in him a power of affection, of sympathy, of compassion, which is shown even better in his correspondence than in his novels.

His niece tells us more discreetly than Maxime Du Camp that he was highly nervous: "This love of tranquillity, which he exaggerated afterwards, began already to exercise a sort of tyranny over his smallest actions. After a few days [she is speaking of his visits to her after her marriage] I saw that he became nervous, and I felt that he wished to return to his beloved work. For ten years our lives became in consequence less mingled, except in the month of April, 1871." This year 1871 was the year of the war. Mme. Comainville had taken refuge in England, and when she came back she found Flaubert very much altered. He had abandoned Croisset during the hostilities, for fear of coming in contact in his own house with the invaders, and had taken lodgings in Rouen, on one of the quays. His house at Croisset had been occupied by soldiers; to his great surprise, when he returned to it he found everything as he left it—nothing had disappeared except a few knives, paper-cutters, maps.

In 1875 the husband of Mme. Comainville lost all his fortune in some commercial speculations. Mme. Comainville was married under the régime dotal, common in Normandy, and could only dispose of a part of her fortune to help her husband. Flaubert made up the rest, and, with extreme generosity, gave all that he possessed in order to save the credit of his niece's husband. He kept nothing except a rent which his niece engaged to pay him during his lifetime, and the product of his writings. These writings had never brought him much money; he liked to tell that Michel Lévy had paid him only 500 francs for the right to publish 'Madame Bovary' for ten years. It is true that a few years afterwards he had given him 10,000 francs for 'Salammbô.' Every sacrifice was made in order that Croisset should not be sold. Flaubert could not well have lived anywhere else, and it was decided that he should remain there, and that in Paris he should have rooms in the house where the Comainvilles lived. The intimacy became as great, as complete as ever, and Flaubert spent nearly all his time with his niece. She tells how he discussed with her the most abstruse subjects. He had become very much preoccupied with religious speculations; he felt an extraordinary attraction for conventual life; he admired the hermits—was he not himself a hermit? He longed to know the Buddhists. He often read the Bible, and went into ecstasies over verses of Isaiah, of David. "Reflect," he used to say to his niece, "reflect on this—creuse-moi ça."

Flaubert lost his friends one after another. His relations with Maxime Du Camp had become more and more infrequent, for reasons unknown to us. Mme. Comainville tells us in a note that she had asked Maxime Du Camp to give her the letters of Flaubert which he had in his possession, and that she met with a refusal. She accuses him, on the other hand, of having in his own memoirs published a letter of Flaubert's without the authorization of Flaubert's family. It is easy to judge that the Comainvilles counted for something in the coldness of the two men who had so long been intimate, and who had travelled together in their youth all over the East.

The friendship of Mme. Sand was one of the consolations of Flaubert in the latter part of his life, a friendship which their correspondence shows to have been warm and disinterested in the extreme. He also found much enjoyment in the conversation of Edmond de Goncourt and of Ivan Turgeneff, but he lived more and more solitary in his own family circle. We owe to this love of solitude not only his works, but the long correspondence which he has left; he spent himself, not in conversations, but in letters.

The first part of the correspondence now published shows us a young Flaubert, full of enthusiasm, of plans, of system. He is in the full bloom of youth. His love letters to Mme. X. were hardly worth publishing. We much prefer the letters in which he gives an account of his journeys. They are very graphic, very true—he gives his impressions with an absolute sincerity. They are familiar, also, but at times, especially during his Eastern tour, he becomes unconsciously a great writer. Take this phrase, for instance, lost among many others in a letter writen from Damascus, September 4, 1850: "At midday, at the hottest hour, when light falls perpendicularly, when we go on without speaking on our thin and wiry horses, and when the tired mules stretch towards the wind their gums, whitened by thirst, then is the time when the lizards come out of the hollow trunk of the olive trees, and when on nopal hedges comes forward, with lifted paws, the prudent chameleon, rolling its round eyes."

The journey in the East, which fills half this first volume, is readable; it has great freshness and color, and we can understand, in reading it, what we never did before, why Flaubert was tempted to write 'Salammbô.'

Correspondence.

THE EXCAVATIONS AT CROTONA.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The exploration made in Magna Græcia during the past winter, by Messrs. Clarke and Emerson, under the auspices of the Archæological Institute of America, has been somewhat prematurely brought to public attention in a letter from these gentlemen published in the Nation of April 21, and in a letter from Professor Lanciani in the following number.

A brief account of the excavations on the site of the temple of Hera Lakinia at Crotona, which is soon to appear in the Eighth Annual Report of the Archæological Institute, will show that the work here was attended with discoveries of great interest, and with promise of results of still higher importance, until it was brought to an end by the interference of the Italian authorities, and the reinterment, under their direction, of the objects thus far discovered.

The motive for this action on the part of the Italian Government is stated to have been the failure by the explorers to obtain from the central authorities the requisite permission to conduct the work. It is much to be regretted that there should have been any error or misunderstanding in this respect. Permission to undertake the work was obtained from the local authorities, which it was believed was sufficient (under the general regulations concerning explorations directed to the scientific investigation of a special monument of antiquity, and not to the obtaining of antique remains for the purpose of removing them from the site) to justify the explorers in their entering upon the work without a special permit from the authorities at Rome. The ground on which the remains of the famous temple are found is private property, and the owner, who is also the Mayor of Cotrone, was unwilling that any permit but that of the local authorities should be applied for. The reason of his objection lay in the fact that, some four years since, the Government had desired to expropriate against his will that part of his estate on which the temple stood, and he had successfully maintained his rights in the courts of law. Under these circumstances the course adopted by Mr. Clarke seems to have been neither unreasonable nor unjustifiable. On receiving the first warning, work was at once stopped, and a few days afterwards Mr. Clarke and Mr. Emerson left the site, a party of soldiers of the coast guard having meanwhile seized the antiquities discovered, and thrown them back into the open trenches. The owner of the site has now brought suit against the Government for this action on the part of its officials, and until the suit is decided work cannot be resumed.

It will be matter of deep regret to all students of Greek antiquity in Italy if the investigations happily begun, by competent archæologists, of the most interesting temple in Magna Græcia, should be permanently interrupted by this action of the Italian Government. It would seem that whatever error of procedure on the part of the explorers had been committed, it might have been better corrected than by the summary closing of the work.

I desire to express the grateful acknowledgments of the Archæological Institute to Professor Lanciani for the excellent advice he gave at the outset in respect to the project of investigations in Magna Græcia, and for his cordial furtherance of the design in every mode within his power.—Your obedient servant,

Charles Eliot Norton,
President of the Archæological Institute of America.

Cambridge, May 2, 1887.

WESTERN MORTGAGES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Will you not say a word of warning against the very large investments now being made in these securities? Sooner or later trouble must come. This influx of money among the mortgagors is producing widespread speculation; then will come money troubles in those regions, frantic efforts on the part of Eastern investors to get back their principal, which, under such circumstances, the borrowers cannot pay without ruin; then sci. fa.'s, stay laws, etc., and much suffering on both sides. A little common sense should check all this in time. L.

Notes.

We are glad to learn that by a year from this time we may look for the fourth volume of Schouler's 'History of the United States,' which will bring the narrative down to the close of the Mexican War. This work is one of the most important fruits of that return to historic studies which the rooting out of slavery permitted to the generation that survived the war.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co. publish this week 'Connecticut,' by Prof. Alexander Johnston, in the American Commonwealths Series.

'Final Memorials of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow,' by Samuel Longfellow, illustrated, and containing the journals and letters of the last twelve years of the poet's life; and two novels, 'The Devil's Hat,' by Melville Phillips, and 'Lights and Shadows of a Life,' by Madeleine Vinton Dahlgren, are to be published directly by Ticknor & Co.

Cassell & Co. announce 'The Yoke of Thorah,' by Sydney Luska, and 'Pen Portraits of Literary Women,' by Miss Helen Gray Cone and Miss Jeannette L. Gilder, who deal with English women only, George Sand and Mrs. Stowe excepted.

The édition de luxe of George Eliot's works undertaken by Estes & Lauriat will shortly be begun with 'Daniel Deronda,' for which Frederic Dielman has made a drawing of Gwendolin.

A. C. McClurg & Co. will be the American publishers of the new edition of Wharton and Symonds's 'Sappho,' which will be enlarged, and illustrated with a facsimile of a newly discovered fragment of the works of the poetess from the Egyptian Museum in Berlin.

The poet Cowley is one of the most inaccessible of English classics to the taste of our century, but for mere style and not infrequently for hard-packed sense he is worth some attention; while as an illustration of the vices incident to literary culture he is a most effective example. He is now renovated for a while by being included in the Cambridge Press Classics, by Rev. J. Rawson Lumby, D.D., who edits his Prose Works (New York: Macmillan), with a biographical sketch, notes, etc. The scientific curiosity he evinces and his argument for agricultural schools are noticeable marks of Cowley's mind; but his boast that he had endeavored to plant poetry "almost wholly with divinity" (i. e., of the Church, not the Muses) is a more tell-tale characteristic. For a student of style and a lover of Latinity, this volume holds excellent matter, not excluding the verses, and the editorial work is very copiously and faithfully done.

The elegant Book-Lover's Library, of which we have noticed several volumes, is increased by Henry B. Wheatley's 'Dedication of Books to Patron and Friend' (A. C. Armstrong & Son). It is called in a sub-title "a chapter of literary history," but it consists almost wholly of selections from authors' dedications from the first down to Vernon Lee. There is more elegance than humor and more lying than truth in them, as was to be expected; the author as a generic being would appear more respectable if this whole chapter could be wiped out. Dedications at once genuine and noble are few. Mr. Wheatley, it should be said, makes ample acknowledgment of the existence of Mr. Huth's similar work.

That indefatigable and eminently useful English scholar, Prof. Henry Morley, has begun a magnum opus under the title 'English Writers: an Attempt toward a History of English Literature' (Cassell & Co.). The work is to be completed in twenty volumes, published half-yearly. The first volume is a substantial small octavo of 350 pages, and contains a general introduction, setting forth succinctly the periods of English literature with reference to foreign influences in the main, down to Wordsworth and his group. The remainder of the volume describes, with much detail, the origins of the earliest English as a matter of history simply, and afterwards deals with the literary relics of these people, the old Celtic literature, 'Beowulf,' and other Anglo-Saxon pieces, with considerable thoroughness. Prof. Morley's method of treatment and his very strong moral prepossession are well known, and in this first volume there is nothing that calls for extended comment. It is to be hoped that nothing will occur to interrupt this long task which Prof. Morley has set for himself; his studies have made him ripe for a most valuable labor in a field of which the vast extent and innumerable relations are little realized except by the expert.

It is easy to see how Mr. A. E. Costello might have reduced the bulk of his great volume, 'Our Firemen: A History of the New York Fire Departments, Volunteer and Paid' (New York: Published by the Author). This is his own analysis of chapter xxii., which is entitled "The City's Unprecedented Progress": "Markets and their Ancient Mode of Doing Business.—New York takes Rank as the Third City in Christendom, and Exceeds in Expenditure any other Municipality in the World.—Its Growth and Prosperity Unparalleled.—Ancient Nomenclature of Streets.—Reduction in the Rate of Taxation.—Sales of Real Estate.—Public Works and Construction of Drives and Parks.—The Croton and the Aqueduct." Here is surely an intolerable deal of sack for the one-half-pennyworth of bread tossed at the end to the patient reader. But if we cannot praise the composition of this book, or dwell upon it as literature, we may commend it for a large amount of information, much of it readable, concerning one of the best institutions produced in our municipal development. It is copiously illustrated, and contains a large number of portraits with accompanying biographical sketches.

A volume has been made of the 'History of the Soldiers' Monument in Waterbury, Conn.,' which is told by the Rev. Joseph Anderson, one of the chief promoters of the enterprise. The cost of the shaft and symbolic statuary was defrayed chiefly by popular subscription, the town taxing itself only for the foundation. Dr. Anderson thinks this instance unique in the annals of soldiers' monuments. The unusual success of the design (if one may judge from the photographs) is probably not to be ascribed to the mode of raising the money, but to fortuitous circumstances. We make this remark because the author hopes his 'History' will promote imitation of the Waterbury plan.

The report of the State Geologist of New Jersey for the past year contains a supplementary table of geographical positions, in which we notice some that are adjacent to the State, as, the New York pier of the Brooklyn bridge (lat. 40° 42′ 23.57″; long. 73° 59′ 35.51″); a report on the Archæan rocks, by Dr. N. L. Britton, and on the Palæozoic rocks (Green Pond Mts., etc.), by Mr. F. J. H. Merrill, who also discusses in an interesting manner the yellow-gravel deposit of the southern part of New Jersey. There is the usual survey of the mining progress of the twelvemonth, and a report on the greensand marls is reprinted from an earlier document. The completion of the great Topographic Atlas is set down for next year. Sheets 6 and 7 will meantime undergo a revision, as they were originally partly compiled from local surveys.

The new Register of Cornell University is noteworthy for its definite programme of the School of Law which is to be opened on September 23, and for the announcement that the several branches of history, political economy, social science, and international law have been consolidated administratively, and are to be hereafter named "The President White School of History and Political Science"—a designation eminently proper as a grateful memorial, if a little long to be spoken trippingly.

Our readers cannot fail to be interested in the letter from Prof. Conway which we print on another page. The example which he recommends for imitation in this country opens up a new field for public spirit. In the case of Liverpool, the collection described, although the property of University College, will always be open for inspection to any person desirous of consulting it. A revised edition of the catalogue of the Raphael exhibition in the Walker Art Gallery will be issued in the course of another year.

In Modern Language Notes for May, Julius Goebel prints side by side Henry Carey's "Sally in Our Alley" and Goethe's "Der Goldschmiedgesell," arguing that the former poem suggested the latter, of which the metre is the same and the contents sufficiently similar. Edward Allen Fay, author of a 'Concordance of the Divina Commedia' shortly to appear, prints a list of words used only, so far as he knows, by Dante; and Thomas Davidson sets down some queer unrecorded (Aberdeenshire) Scotch words not found in Jamieson.

Gen. Sherman, by a title which will not be disputed, criticises, in the North American Review for May, Gen. Wolseley's eulogium of Gen. Lee, which has lately been the subject of controversy in these columns. No admirer of Lee can take exception to the spirit in which his character as a man and as a soldier is discussed. Gen. Sherman denies him emphatically a military preëminence over Grant, and very forcibly contrasts the burden laid upon the two in the closing years of the war, when Grant's command embraced the continental range of action. He goes further, and finds in Gen. Thomas, a fellow-Virginian, as good a soldier as Lee, if not a better, with the crowning quality, of course, in Northern eyes, of having resisted the allurements of "State rights," and remained true to his sworn duty to the whole country. And whereas Wolseley discerns a second Washington in Lee, Gen. Sherman recognizes him rather in Thomas, whose physical appearance and phlegmatic temper and simple patriotism earned him this comparison during his lifetime.

A colored portrait of Thomas Stevens, whose bicycle ride round the world is familiar to a large circle of readers, makes the frontispiece of Outing for May. The twentieth instalment of his journal narrates his journey through Persia. Mr. Stevens is, it appears from a biographical sketch, a native of England. He is now the cycling editor of Outing. Of this magazine, by the way, the ninth volume lies before us (Oct., 1886—Mar., 1887), and a bare glimpse of its departments reveals its scope. We find papers on amateur photography, archery, army life, ballooning, base-ball, canoeing, chess, cricket, croquet, fishing, foot-ball, rowing, sparring, the wheel, yachting, etc., etc. The professional tone is well kept under, and stories and verse help to lighten the miscellany.

In our recent mention of the April Auk we meant to have referred to some effective criticism of Mr. Ira Sayles's loose defence of the sense of smell in vultures, by Mr. Walter B. Barrows of the United States Department of Agriculture. Corroborative observations by Mr. Walter Hoxie of Frogmore, S. C., appear in the April number of the Ornithologist and Oologist.

We regret the cessation of the Southern Bivouac as an independent existence. It has been purchased by the Century Co., which thus acquires the right to use the Bivouac's notable war papers in its own forthcoming reprint from the Century ('Battles and Leaders of the Civil War').

The English journal Brain is to be hereafter the organ of the Neurological Society of London, Macmillan & Co. becoming the publishers.

The Mercantile Library Company of Philadelphia, in its April Bulletin, continues the useful classified list of historical novels begun in the January number, and promises further continuation. It is to be hoped that when the list is finished it will be printed separately in one pamphlet. To pick the list from the different parts of the Bulletin will be too inconvenient.

L'Art and its Courrier are now the entrenched camp of Wagnerism in France. M. Adolphe Jullien's 'Richard Wagner, sa vie et ses œuvres,' is assiduously kept before the public in the Courrier, which copies all the favorable notices of the press concerning that really excellent work. Now, in L'Art for April 1, M. Jullien takes the floor in person to tell of the performance of the "Valkyrie" at Brussels in March. His article, which is illustrated with portraits and amiable caricatures of the composer, and with scenes from the opera in question, appeared just on the eve of the intended performance of "Lohengrin" in Paris, upon which the Schnaebelé affair suddenly clapped a temporary extinguisher. A portrait of Gustave Guillaumet, who died on March 14 at the early age of forty-six, is given in this number of L'Art. Guillaumet was as happy with his pen as with his pencil.

We might almost say that according to French idiom "Alexandre Dumas intime" could have but one meaning. M. Glinel's paper thus entitled in Le Livre for April deals, as might be expected, with the dramatist's well-known weakness for the other sex. M. Glinel tells decently, with the aid of many original autograph pieces, the story of Dumas's relations with the actress Ida Ferrier, both before and after he married her. As she inspired him to create certain parts for her, and secured the lasting esteem of Théophile Gautier and George Sand, she may well be thus commemorated. The historical paper on the great Leipzig publishers has many portrait illustrations, among which that of the founder Brockhaus is conspicuous as a type of German intellect and solidity.

Brockhaus, by the way, has issued a cheap edition of Schopenhauer's 'Welt als Wille und Vorstellung'—two volumes for $3. A few decades ago, when Hegel, Fichte, and Schelling were looked on as metaphysical deities, a man would have been sneered at for placing the great pessimist on a level with them. But to-day one of the leading German journals, the Frankfurter Zeitung, speaks of 'Die Welt als Wille, etc.,' as "the epoch-making work of the greatest of German philosophers after Kant."

Of the thirteenth edition of Brockhaus' 'Conversations-Lexikon' (New York: L. W. Schmidt) the last (16th) volume is just completed. It has comparatively few articles of especial interest, the most important being those on the United States, Hungary, Vienna, and Periodical Literature—this last being full of details gathered by careful research. The article on the United States is rather meagre and the maps disappointing. The names of places, in the Eastern States especially, appear to have been chosen simply with reference to the ease of displaying them, rather than to their size or importance. From the long list of collaborators the only resident of America appears to have been Prof. W. H. Rosenstengel of Madison, Wis. Simultaneously with the last number of this volume, the publishers have issued the first number of a supplemental volume, which, besides adding new information, is intended to correct all errors discovered in the previous volumes. The longest article is upon Africa, and contains a very full list of books and maps published within the last six years, as well as an account of the recent colonial acquisitions of the different European Powers. A number of towns in the United States which have grown into importance since the printing of the first volume began in 1881, have also been included. Very characteristically there is a plate descriptive of the new rifles introduced into the German and Austrian armies.

The Illustrirte Zeitung for April 16 has a very convenient plan of the German Reichstag, with the seats of the members not only designated by their names, but so colored as to show the party to which they belong. This enables one to see at a glance also the relative strength of the various parties.

Among the latest series of the great house of Firmin-Didot & Cie. is a 'Bibliothèque Instructive et Amusante'; and the title of what is apparently the first volume is amusing, if it is not instructive: 'Aventures Lointaines dans l'Amérique du Sud (Alaska).'

Under the rather misleading title of 'Souvenirs d'un Impresario, par Maurice Strakosch' has been published (Paris: Ollendorff; New York: F. W. Christern) a volume of very airy gossip, in reality not written by M. Strakosch himself, as the preface honestly avows, but taken down by another hand from his table talk, and arranged and set in order and dressed up and ironed out until all the color and savor have departed. As an impresario M. Maurice Strakosch has seen much, and he ought to have much to say; in this empty little book he has not said it. The management of Italian opera is not supposed to conduce to suavity of manner, but nothing can be imagined more mellifluous than the utterances of M. Strakosch as here reported; in speaking of his rivals, he distributes "taffy" with an impartial hand. In his eyes there are no bad singers or operas or managers or composers; all are great, grand, magnificent, and world-renowned. There are a few curious details of M. Strakosch's early life and professional adventures, and of the beginnings of Mme. Adelina Patti's extraordinary career; but most of the anecdotes are twice-told tales.

The Pitt Press Series, of which we have had occasion to speak before, has been enriched by two new French text-books. 'La Bataille de dames,' by Scribe and Legouvé, is an old favorite, and needs no recommendation. 'La Canne de jonc,' by Alfred de Vigny, although written in 1835, is almost new as a school-book. It is one of the short stories in the volume published nine years after the great success of 'Cinq-Mars,' entitled 'Servitude et Grandeur Militaires.' The notes by the Rev. Herbert Bull are very judicious and clear, giving all the information necessary for the pupil to understand the numerous historical allusions, and not neglecting the grammatical difficulties. These two pretty volumes are in every way worthy of the Cambridge (England) University Press, which prints all the publications in the Pitt Press Series, for which Macmillan & Co., New York, are the American agents.

—Commander F. E. Chadwick of the United States Navy contributes an admirable résumé of the history of the steamboat to the May Scribner's. The paper is not so technical as recent naval articles have been, and affords an instructive view of one of the most interesting topics in what one may call the mechanical history of civilization, while at the same time it is studded with practical remarks bearing on current questions. Notwithstanding the great advance and profoundly modifying changes in the construction and operation of steamships within the last score of years, this writer does not think that even a temporary goal has been reached; the introduction of twin-screws he regards as a matter of the near future, and gives as the most powerful motive for this innovation the fact that the great gain in safety would be so strong an element in competition that the whole fleet would be obliged to adopt the new plan as soon as one of the great companies does so. He points out the great destruction of steam-tonnage: Great Britain, in 1885, lost by wreck alone over 3 per cent., which was much below the usual average; in the period 1875-1883, 947 British steamers were totally destroyed by wreck. In fact, the average life of a ship is less than that of a man. Commander Chadwick protests against our own navigation laws, but at the same time ascribes our failure in steamboat construction partly to the conservatism which made us slow to exchange wood for iron as a material, and the paddle for the screw as a propeller, and also in part to the check put on water traffic by our rapidly developed railroads. Another useful article dealing with our material interests is on the perennial subject of our forests, by Prof. Shaler. He touches on nearly all aspects of the place trees have held in the life of man, from the days when they were "the cradle" of our "arboreal ancestor" down to the present, when they are the enemies of tillage. We have suffered less from deforesting because of the humid climate in the East, and the Appalachian woodlands, he thinks, will not be a tempting soil for the farmer; in the West, there is more ground for caution, but in New England, according to his observation, more land is returning to a wild state than being reclaimed. The woodcuts illustrating this article show some noble trees.

—It is seldom that one meets so excellent an illustration of the kinship among the arts as is to be found in M. Coquelin's remarks on "Acting and Actors" in Harper's. He says incidentally that Corot knew no French poetry except "Polyeucte," and he had never read all of that; but this did not prevent him from being "a poet down to the tip of his brush." So with M. Coquelin's criticisms; though he was probably little thinking of it, he is a critic of art and literature as much as of acting in every sentence. Let us take an example. He is writing of the relative importance of the exterior and of the spirit, to the effect that "character is the starting-point for everything," and he goes on: "If you have assimilated the essence of your personage, his exterior will follow quite naturally, and if there is any picturesqueness it will come of itself. It is the mind that constructs the body. If Mephistopheles is ugly it is because his soul is hideous." This is the formula of all artistic creation. Again: "The public tires of nothing so quickly as mere picturesqueness of effect. Your entrance once over, they pay no further heed to you; you have missed fire if you have not style, delivery, and the development of the character to fall back on." Many a novelist is doomed to say amen to that. With respect to the jeunes premières, he says: "Beauty is not essential, but charm is"; it is a maxim. "The part of us which sees should rule as absolutely as possible the part of us which executes," is written for every school of expression among intellectual races; it is the moral law of art. Once more: "Naturalism on the stage is a mistake. In the first place, the public won't have it. It always resents the exhibition of revolting hideousness, of pitiless and naked realities. . . . Just as I would not allow any departure from truth on the plea of picturesque effect, so I would not permit a representation of commonplace or horrible things on the pretext of reality." But in the whole article there is food for reflection to provide the intellects of the realists as long as they choose to ruminate it. A sharp and most significant stroke is made when, apropos of Irving, it is remarked that whereas Garrick found the French unnatural, now the tables are turned. The illustrations are spirited and of the highest excellence; but the text altogether is superb intellectual criticism. In the remainder of the number there are a sketch of the Southern group of writers, with portraits, and a well-illustrated paper on mastiffs.

—The May Century opens with an account of that lucky find of Egyptian research, the mummy chamber of the Ramesside line, of which all the world has heard; and this is continued by a full and exhaustive paper on Rameses II. and his daughter and wife Nefer-ari. The positions and speculations of the writer, with regard to both the Egyptian and Biblical history involved, are most interesting, but less so than the mere series of portraits of Rameses and his relatives, which bring Egypt near to us in a way not less impressive than wonderful. The individuality of the great king is distinctly made out, as is also the family resemblance common to the royal group of which he is the chief figure. It is a physiognomy foreign to Egypt, as has been often observed, and belongs to the higher race-type of a conquering caste. The different lines of blood which met to produce it in the face of Rameses are acutely distinguished, and the whole theory of his descent is ingeniously supported; but the portraits are independent of archæology, and as one goes through the series, from the first representation of the boy-prince of the court, over three thousand years ago, to the last one, made when the undestroyed face of his body in old age was exposed to our camera yesterday, it is impossible not to be amazed at such a survival and identification of the actual features of a man of whom for centuries all knowledge was practically dead. One is curiously reminded of the portraits of Cæsar which were lately gathered by Mr. Ropes; there is the same progress from youth to age, though the features are of course less expressive, at least to our eyes. The most remarkable trait is the union of energy of character with placidity of spirit. The head is one of great distinction in its type, and, could we have chosen, we could have had no better memorial of one of the greatest reigns in the annals of man. The remainder of the number has considerable variety of matter, Prof. Atwater's paper on Food being of most importance. In this instalment he is dangerously technical for the common reader.

—The April number of Les Lettres et les Arts (Paris: Boussod, Valadon et Cie.; New York: Charles Scribner's Sons) contains an article by M. Léopold Lacour, "Pierre Loti," accompanied by three sketches by Loti himself—two of scenes in Senegal, and one a group of a dozen heads of his sailors of the Triomphante, dated "Mers de Chine, Novembre, 1885." The article is not exhaustive, and contains nothing positively new, but it is very readable and is full of interesting things. At the beginning is a small reproduction of the often mentioned photograph of Loti in a clown's costume, as he appeared incognito, one night some years ago, in the ring of the circus of Toulon, and there won what he is said to consider one of the greatest successes of his life by the gymnastic feats for which he is famous. The number also contains the second and concluding part of "Mademoiselle de Bardelys," by M. Paul Perret. Unlike most stories, this one is more delightful at the end than in the beginning. It has the charm of entire unlikeness to any of the fashions of the day in manner and in conception, while not reproducing what has preceded it in either, being as far from the historical novel of Dumas or of Victor Hugo as it is from the minute analysis and deliberate dissection of Bourget or the romantic and lyrical realism of Zola. The enjoyment of the reader is heightened by the aquarelles of Marchetti, which illustrate the story in the very mood and manner of the story itself. Very different from this is "Mariages manqués," by a much more famous writer, M. François Coppée, poet and Academician. It is not in verse, but it is as mildly melancholy and sentimental as M. Coppée's stories in verse are apt to be, and yet the beauty of its direct and simple style alone makes it a pleasure to read it. "Portraits de femmes" is very ingeniously managed to introduce as illustrations some of the pictures of the coming Salon. It is a series of visits to the studios of the artists who will exhibit such portraits this year, in search of that of a certain Countess Zappi, of whom the writer (it is in the form of a letter) thinks herself justified in being jealous. At the beginning is a very attractive corner of what seems to be the studio of Carolus Duran, whose portrait of his young daughter is the most interesting of the illustrations.

—Our accomplished correspondent, Miss Randolph, as a great-granddaughter of Mr. Jefferson and also a lineal descendant of Wilson Cary Nicholas, has every right to speak by authority on the topics to which she brings new light from original and hitherto unpublished documents. The "new light" thrown on the "Resolutions of '98" relates mainly to the genesis of the Kentucky series of that year. An erroneous address —"To —— Nicholas"—prefixed to the letter of Mr. Jefferson under date of December 11, 1821, as published in the Congressional edition of Jefferson's writings, has been the source of a chronic mystification. If the letter was addressed to Nelson Nicholas, as was averred by a tradition in the family of George Nicholas, then it followed, from the purport of Mr. Jefferson's statement, that George Nicholas participated with his brother, Wilson Cary Nicholas, in the alleged conference at Monticello. The fact that George Nicholas was not a member of the Kentucky Legislature of 1798, and therefore could not have "carried them [the Resolutions] through the Legislature of his State," was explained by a supplementary tradition that he received them from Mr. Jefferson and handed them to John Breckinridge, who was a leading member of that year's Legislature. As it is now certain that the letter of December 11, 1821, was addressed to J. Cabell Breckinridge, it follows that, according to Mr. Jefferson's recollections at that date, the persons participating in the alleged conference were John Breckinridge, W. C. Nicholas, and perhaps Mr. Madison. It is in this state of the amended record that Miss Randolph comes with the surprising discovery that the whole story of the "conference" is a myth which had unconsciously formed itself in Mr. Jefferson's memory from a confused blending of proposed deliberations in 1799 with supposed deliberations in 1798. The original documents with which she supports this theory would seem to make it conclusive, in the absence of proof to the contrary. Perhaps the archives of the Breckinridge family may shed some additional light on the question.

—We take leave to subjoin that the letter of Mr. Jefferson to W. C. Nicholas, under date of November 29, 1798, as cited above by Miss Randolph, must relate exclusively to the Virginia Resolutions of 1798. In the light of this letter it is now revealed for the first time that the Virginia declaration, in the shape under which it was submitted to Mr. Jefferson for his criticism, contained a clause inviting the States to "coöperate in the annulment" of the Alien and Sedition Laws. This would have been an invitation which looked to executory proceedings of some kind; and it was, we now learn, at Mr. Jefferson's suggestion that the Virginia Resolutions of '98 were pitched at a lower key so as to make them legislative declarations of opinion, in which the coöperation of the other States was invited. Certain it is that the Virginia series, as actually submitted to the Legislature in December, 1798, three weeks after the date of Mr. Jefferson's note to W. C. Nicholas, was couched, under this head, in the following terms: "The General Assembly doth solemnly appeal to the like dispositions of the other States, in confidence that they will concur with this commonwealth in declaring, as it does hereby declare, that the acts aforesaid [the Alien and Sedition Laws] are unconstitutional, and not law, but utterly null, void, and of no force or effect." These are almost the ipsissima verba suggested by Mr. Jefferson in the letter to W. C. Nicholas. It is known that the words which we have italicised were expunged from the Virginia series before its passage, because of their too menacing tone. It will thus be seen that in shedding new light on the origin of the Kentucky series, Miss Randolph has also thrown a cross light on the digest of the Virginia series; and for both of these elucidations the students of history will confess their obligations.

Three Thousand Miles through Brazil. By J. W. Wells. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. 1886.

Brazil: its Condition and Prospects. By C. C. Andrews, ex-Consul-General to Brazil. D. Appleton & Co. 1887.

ABOUT fourteen years ago the Brazilian Government contracted with an English company for certain surveys for the final extension of the Dom Pedro II. Railroad, which belongs to the State. The exploring party was divided into two sections, to the second of which the survey of the vast area between the São Francisco and the Tocantins Rivers was intrusted. Mr. Wells, still a very young man, was attached to a subdivision of the second section. From the mouth of the Rio Grande, a tributary of the São Francisco, his party ascended that river to the valley of the Somno, in the Province of Goyaz, which they then followed down to its outlet in the Tocantins. The author's work lasted about thirty months, and covered a length of 3,000 miles in the interior of Brazil, through the Provinces of Rio de Janeiro, Minas Geraes, Goyaz, and Maranhão. His work is an "expanded" diary of that exploration, made, we repeat, fourteen years ago, with a preliminary chapter on Rio de Janeiro, and an appendix containing some statistical information on railways, sugar factories, etc. It is no exaggeration to say that the work would have been much more acceptable had it been compressed into one volume. The scenery described by Mr. Wells is really wonderful, but as one gets tired of the superabundant luxuriance of the tropics, so the reader of his book becomes wearied of so many sunrises, sunsets, and moonlight nights, and of so many villages, all of which are so monotonously alike. That Mr. Wells, however, has given us a very clever book there is no doubt. He cannot claim in any degree the scientific merit of some of his late predecessors, as Agassiz, C. F. Hartt, or even Bigg-Wither or Sir Richard F. Burton; but his work is more picturesque and entertaining than theirs. Indeed, it would have been better if the author, who was young and inexperienced, as he himself says, had abstained from claiming to have discovered important facts in the physical geography of the country, or from blaming the Brazilian Government for having refused to accept one of his plans for the carrying of coffee through the city of Rio de Janeiro. As to his so-called discoveries, he evidently never heard of the work of some of the Brazilian writers and explorers, like Gen. Couto de Magalhães or Sr. Severiano da Fonseca, whose 'Viagem ao redor do Brazil' forms the basis of an interesting article by Dr. H. von Ihring in a recent number of the Deutsche Geographische Blätter of Bremen.

The Brazilian table-lands, Mr. Wells tells us, have a "wonderfully pure, healthy atmosphere," with a bright open country and prevailing fresh breezes. Even the swamps are not all unhealthy, like those of the Upper São Francisco, as they are often formed by running springs of water. In the table-lands of Ceará and Piauhy the atmosphere is so dry that meat can be preserved by simply drying it in the sun without any salt. "And yet," continues the author, "if this is said not to be a country for a white man, then the white man had better die at once, for there exists no finer climate. One can swing an axe or a billhook all day long, and go to work indoors all the evening till late at night, and rise early in the morning fresh for another day: can a man do more, be he black or white?" Such is his opinion of the healthfulness of the table-lands. In the low lands, wherever malaria prevails, the foreign traveller can easily avoid it with a few well-known preventive measures, such as exclusion of night air as much as possible; not leaving home in the morning without taking coffee; not drinking doubtful water, etc. Even the health of Rio de Janeiro is not so bad as is generally believed. Mr. Wells presents statistics showing that in 1885, in a population of 450,000 inhabitants, there were 10,182 deaths, of which 374 were from yellow fever, while consumption took the lead with 1,754 fatal cases. The average proportion of deaths from yellow fever is about 5 per cent. of the total number of deaths. The victims are chiefly foreign young men, recently arrived, who are often careless in their habits.

The author's experience as to the indolence of the natives is not different from that of all other travellers in Brazil. Only absolute want compels the matuto to do any work, which is stopped as soon as a little dried beef, farinha or manioc-flour, rum, and perhaps a new piece of cotton for his wife and daughters, are acquired. Those "primaries" of life once obtained, nothing will induce him to give up his hammock, his sleep, his cachaça or rum, his guitar and dance at night. No wonder, then, that agriculture is very rude. Everything grows luxuriantly and almost spontaneously; coffee and other products are simply planted, not cultivated. There are no rents, no taxes, no wages to pay. When there is any surplus, it is invested in a piece of calico, in a few iron kitchen utensils, or in the family chariot—the bullock-cart. In the villages, life is awfully monotonous: the houses are untidy, the church is a barn-like adobe building, and articles of home production are very cheap (a dozen eggs for two cents, a fat fowl for sixteen cents, and so on), while some "luxuries" are excessively dear. On the lower São Francisco even beans cost about two dollars per bushel, and dried beef seven and a half cents per pound. The people are kind, obliging, and patient under difficulties. There are no highway robbers in Brazil. The tropeiros and the camaradas or guides are good, merry people. As to the blacks, Mr. Wells says that "in spite of all that has been said of the indolence of the negro, I find that in the interior of Brazil the free black is the workingman," the pure negroes being by far the most intelligent and industrious of the inhabitants.

Brazilian fauna and flora have been so often described that one cannot attempt, in a short space, to accompany our author in his appreciative remarks on the wonderful things of that country. The best game birds of Brazil are the jacús, mutuns, wild pigeons, and caiçára, to which the jacotinga might be added. "Snakes are not by any means so abundant in Brazil as it is usually credited with." Every two or three days the traveller meets with some large harmless one, occasionally with a rattlesnake or a jararáca. The most exciting adventure of Mr. Wells was a battle with peccaries at night (ii, 137 et seq.). Indeed, the reader acquainted with the interior of Brazil can afford to smile at the terrors of the battle, ascribing them to the artistic imagination of the author, who has written on them a most interesting chapter. The peccary of Brazil is the Dicotyles labiatus.

The appendix contains many errors which we regret to find in a work by an engineer. We do not know where Mr. Wells found, for instance, that the Cantagallo Railway is earning five per cent. on its capital, for in the year referred to by him it only earned $296,109, or less than three per cent. Then, again, in the case of the Leopoldina Railway, he states that its share capital is $30,969,000 and that the company pays seven per cent., which are two gross blunders. The statistics of the receipts and expenses of the Brazilian railways (ii, p. 343) would be more valuable if he had summarized the partial results, which would show that the Anglo-Brazilian railways, in spite of double administration, spend but fifty-seven and a half per cent. of their gross receipts.

But the greatest curiosity in Mr. Wells's work is that he seldom spells properly a Portuguese word. In his 800 pages there are perhaps 1,600 Portuguese words or sentences, and it is no exaggeration to say that scarcely 1,500 are correctly given. It seems incredible that the author has really spent fifteen years in Brazil, or that he is, as he asserts, "intimately acquainted with its people." He makes the singular agree with the plural, the masculine with the feminine; he takes away accents from where they should be and adds them where they are not wanted, and for one who is acquainted with the Portuguese his book will for ever be memorable as a guide to "Portuguese as She is Spelt." The common feijões, the main food of the natives, becomes feijãos. "Good morning" is bão dias (two errors). The word burro is spelled throughout as buro, and Mr. Wells forms sentences such as buros bem manso (two errors). Ants is formigos. Even poor English beer is christened cerveja inglez. Instead of Sirvam-se, senhores, he says Servem, senhores. Names of such places as Paraopeba, which is the title of one of his chapters, are wrongly written "Parãopeba." The word Ipiabanha, which has no accent, is treated to the luxury of three, thus, "Ipiâbánha," which renders it wholly absurd. The drink of the native Brazilian, the sugar-cane rum, becomes sadly adulterated in the author's hand; it is now aguadente without the r, then it is caçacha, then again cachaca; but, what is worse, he says that this word is pronounced kar-shar-sar! That little insect carrapato, about which he tells us such amusing stories, is spelled carraptão, carapatos, and carapatds. Atôa becomes atoá; fish is peixo; pinguella is pengella; the billhook is falcão (falcon) instead of facão. Boa viagem (bon voyage) becomes bom viagem, and the very word man is written homen, and countryman is spelled throughout the two volumes as matutor instead of matuto. The above are only a few of the far too many mistakes of Mr. Wells's book: it is shameful that two such bulky volumes should be allowed to appear with so great a number.

Mr. C. C. Andrews's work is totally different from that of Mr. Wells. It is not amusing, nor interesting, nor original; but the author has managed to compress into its 350 pages much useful information about Brazil. Indeed, it looks very much like the blending of a very full consular report with a substantial, but gossipy, letter about the general resources, condition, manners, etc., of the empire. To any one intending to visit the sea-coast of that country, Mr. Andrews's work will prove most serviceable, though it contains several errors. He has interesting information about the Presbyterian mission in São Paulo. His remarks about a reciprocity treaty between the United States and Brazil (p. 121) do not represent the true bearings of the difficulty. It is wrong to state that the free admission of coffee into the United States "is substantially a donation" to the Brazilian treasury; for the fact is, the export duty in Brazil is now the same that has been in force for many years when we charged a duty of two or three cents per pound. Then, again, Mr. Andrews is entirely mistaken in supposing that Brazil would negotiate a treaty with us were it not for the straitened condition of her treasury; the fact being that such treaties cannot be negotiated at all on account of the "most favored nation" clause in the treaties of Brazil with most of the European countries. Brazil does not impose an export duty on coffee and sugar with any idea of treating us badly. The empire has no land taxes, and has hardly any of our internal-revenue taxes; the export duty, rightly or wrongly (and we think wrongly), is found there to be the best substitute for those taxes. Another curious mistake of Mr. Andrews is to describe Innocencio da Silva as a Brazilian historian, he being neither, but a Portuguese bibliographer of great merit. In fact, his appreciation of Brazilian literature is very defective.

CRAZY HERALDRY.

America Heraldica. A Compilation of Coats-of-Arms, Crests, and Mottoes of prominent American Families, settled in this country before 1800. Edited by E. de V. Vermont. Illustrated by Henry Rykers. New York. Pp. 192. Quarto. 17 pages of illustrations.

When the early parts of this publication were issued, we felt bound to express our dissatisfaction with it. A careful examination of the completed work confirms and intensifies our condemnation of it. We fully believe that the author has had no unworthy object in view; we accept his statements that no coat-of-arms has been inserted from pecuniary inducements; we admire the zeal and labor shown in editing the work; and we cheerfully acknowledge that the typographical part is highly creditable. But here our praise must stop short, for a more deplorable waste of time and money in a literary enterprise can hardly be imagined. Had the book been privately issued, and circulated only among the editor's friends, it might have received the pitying silence accorded to many records of family pride and ignorance. But the enterprise is a public one; it has been largely advertised and probably widely circulated, and it will go abroad, to nations to whom heraldry has to-day a meaning and a value, as the sole exponent of American ideas on the subject.

In this country, where coats-of-arms are only antiquarian trifles, it is not of the slightest consequence whether our newly enriched citizens paint the wrong arms on their carriages or not. To genealogists, even, such devices have long been of value only so far as they aid in tracing out a pedigree. Whether the United States were settled by noble or ignoble immigrants is not a matter that disturbs the cabinets of Europe to-day, nor does a solution of the point affect our standing as a nation. But we expose ourselves to ridicule and contempt if we make claims without foundation either to superior manliness, intelligence, honesty, or even "blood." This, it seems to us, is the unfortunate position in which the zeal without knowledge of Mr. Vermont has placed us. The finer his book, the more certain it is to attract the attention of competent judges; and the more scornful and unreserved will be their censure. In anticipation, however, of a foreign verdict, we will endeavor to scrutinize the work carefully, and to plead guilty in advance to its faults.

As an authoritative presentation of coats-of-arms belonging to families settled in the United States, it is sadly lacking in completeness and in arrangement. Seventeen pages, each bearing sixteen colored shields, give us two hundred and seventy-two coats, to which are to be added descriptions of over one hundred more. The circular, indeed, names 420 families as embraced in the list; but, judging from the examples admitted within the sacred enclosure, the editor could easily have described eight hundred coats equally entitled to consideration. So, also, the plan of arrangement is very faulty. The coats are simply tumbled in together, without regard to authority, date, locality, or importance. The very smallest amount of judgment should have taught the editor to adopt some plan. He should have taken each of the original colonies by itself, and placed under that head the cases he could cite. He should have made a distinction between the families still represented and those which speedily expired. Above all, he should carefully have shown what families had a well-established foreign pedigree as well as those which had merely used coat-armor from the earliest dates here, and were therefore only presumptively entitled to it. We regret to add, that he should not have inserted a single coat-of-arms for which no respectable authority could be given.

On every one of these points the editor has sadly failed. By neglecting the localities, he has greatly increased the number of doubtful cases, because the alleged proofs are out of the reach of ordinary readers. By admitting a few examples of those officials who came here, but left no issue, he increases the number but diminishes the value of his collections. By putting an undue value on the early use of seals, etc., he does injustice to the few families with a pedigree. Above all, by putting into this pretentious volume a large number of coats utterly unfounded and incorrect, he destroys the value of the collection as an authority. We propose to go over the record and to justify our comments, especially as to unfounded coats here inserted.

On plate 1 the Franklin arms are given. There has been no authority ever given for them, and they were doubtless assumed by Benjamin. On plate 2 we find the Hutchinson arms, taken up unwarrantably by the Boston family, and never used by the obscure branch which was entitled to them. The Tyng arms have no authority. The Hancock arms were never heard of till John Hancock took them up. The Eliot arms were never used here, and it is utterly impossible to go further back than the father of the Rev. John Eliot. For the Hoar arms no authority is cited. The Emerson and the Lord arms rest on the authority of tombstones and seals. The Tyler arms were granted in 1774 to two brothers, and not to their numerous cousins.

On plate 3 the De Peyster coat lacks authority, as does the Beekman. The Clinton arms belong to only one of the three New York Governors who used them. For the Stuyvesant and Ludlow coats the authorities cited are vague. The Warren coat was a most unwarranted assumption made in Boston some thirty years ago, one of the regretted episodes of our genealogy. For the Bleeckers, Luquers, and Sinclairs a similar haziness of proof is to be noted. In regard especially to the New York families we desire ample evidences, because Continental heraldry is governed by rules very different from English laws.

On plate 4 the Arnold pedigree is very suspicious; the Coffin arms are a modern assumption without a shadow of right, the Brewster equally false, unfounded, and unused, the Drake arms a mere guess on the part of a local antiquary. For the Dodge arms Mr. Vermont adduces: "Several patents, granting arms or confirming preceding grants, are preserved in the family to this day." He quotes as authority the family meeting in 1879. No such statement occurs in that book, and the arms are entitled to no consideration. The Lawrence arms are another of the ridiculous myths of early genealogy here—often exposed, and now repeated by the careless editor. The Gilman arms are without foundation, and here is a serious misquotation from the 'American Genealogist,' 1875. Mr. Whitmore did not write as follows: "We find the American family [of Gilman] entitled to the arms they bear, as they have not been challenged by the English branch still existing." There is no good proof of the arms as yet.

On plate 5 the authority for the Anderson arms is simply that the engraver, an emigrant who died a few years since, used them. This is truly a typical American coat! The Bartow and the Brown (of Rye) arms lack support; for the Cuylers and Disbrows no pretence of authority is given, nor for the Munsells or Van Wycks. The Pierrepont claim stirred the country to irrepressible merriment a few years ago. Mr. Vermont again misquotes the 'American Genealogist,' 1875, but cannot show the slightest authority for the coat. No proof is given of the Hay claim.

On plate 6 the Andrews, Bell, Chaloner, and Townsend coats are given. In none of these cases is there any evidence or even probability that these arms were claimed by any American family.

On plate 7 the Delano arms, "brought over by the emigrant," will be interesting when found. The Sands and Throops are supposed to bear the arms of Sandys and Scrope—two improbable fictions utterly unsuited to a standard work like this. The Whitney pedigree is magnificently printed, but the author was the victim of a contemptible fraud, and the coat-of-arms unfortunately went with the pedigree. The Read arms need verification, and the Nicoll arms are confessedly something else.

On plate 8 the Curtis arms are simply unknown, and are not even claimed by the authorities cited by Mr. Vermont. So, again, for the Deane arms no authority is given, and anything thinner than the Hayden assumption could not easily be imagined. The Giles arms are unfounded. As to the Loring arms, there is no tombstone in Boston with the coat. A woodcut was foisted into the text in Bridgman's 'Epitaphs,' being the whim or fancy of a local antiquary of the name. The claim is utterly unfounded. The Lyman pedigree has never been traced to any one bearing arms, nor an example of the use here given.

On plate 9, passing over some doubtful cases, we should query the Howard claim.

On plate 10 the Stetson, Fairweather, and Sumner coats have no foundation; the Storrs coat, according to Mr. Vermont, is not known to English heraldry; the Montague coat rests on a manuscript genealogy, which is of course beyond our vision.

On plate 11 the Cromwell coat is confessedly without any authority whatever, and the Fountains need to show their source. The Phelps arms are again confessedly weak, and no authority at all is given for the Van Sittarts. The Van Alst and Polhemus coats get very little explanation from our author, and the Woolseys can only say that they claim to be descended from a near relative of the Cardinal. If report be right, they might as well have claimed him.

On plate 12 the Wetmore arms are a myth, probably assumed by the Rev. James Wetmore when he was in England, about 1725. The Hatch coat cannot be laid to any colonist, and the Roome coat gives ample space to the imagination. For any use of the Goodsell arms we await testimony, and we place the Penningtons and Butlers in the same category.

From page 90 onwards we find the author inserts in the text various coats engraved but not shown on the colored plates, Nos. 13–17. We will follow the text as it stands. The Dickinson coat has no authority; the Linzees may be Lindsays; the Bradfords are in doubt, the Millers at best traditional; and the Sears coat is another unfortunate blunder. The Sewall arms probably were assumed here a century ago, and cannot be substantiated. The Cranston pedigree, cited from the Heraldic Journal, must be wrong somewhere. The Burnham coat is without basis, never used here, and not even claimed. The Herricks are in the same case. Gov. Endicott did not use arms, and nothing is known of his ancestry. The use of any Prescott arms is yet to be found, and the Rogers pedigree even at the present date is not carried to an armiger. Why the Darling coat should be allowed is a mystery, and the Baldwins certainly never claimed arms. The Bartlett genealogy is entirely fragmentary and unreliable, and the arms are a very recent assumption. As to the Lisles, their connection with New England is simply through the Ushers, and their coat is not American in any way. The McVicars, Rasay, Hicks, Betts, Geer, Chandler, French, Jouet, Howland, Cleveland, Holcomb, Rawle, Tuckerman, Seabury, Seymour, and Otis coats are thrust into the collection without even a pretence of authority.

Now we submit that this is a pretty bad showing for a book that is to be the representative of American scholars. We have merely picked out the utterly worthless and absurd cases, leaving still a large number as to which the evidences are not easily accessible, and which therefore must depend upon the opinion we may have of Mr. Vermont's judgment. From the above cited cases, we are constrained to value his opinion very lightly. It is inconceivable that an editor who accepts such examples can properly estimate the weight of evidence. One of his standard authorities is Mrs. Lamb's 'History of New York.' Great as are the merits of that work, very few of her examples of coats-of-arms are fortified by proofs.

We had intended to print Mr. Vermont's whole list of families entitled to arms, and to point out those beyond dispute. But, when we came to sift the evidence, we found so many doubtful cases that it seemed unfair to name the very few we could approve. As we have already intimated, a book like this is an unmitigated nuisance. In a number of cases, especially at the date when genealogy began to be studied here, the compilers of family history exercised little discretion in attempting to prove their English ancestry. They had recourse only to the Peerages, Burke's 'Landed Gentry,' or to county histories; and a similarity of names was held to be proof of identity. They were utterly ignorant of the fact that every one of those names was duplicated infinitely by Englishmen of ignoble birth. Hence a plentiful crop of errors now mentioned with regret, and carefully ignored by the wiser generation of authors. But Mr. Vermont has pushed these errors into the light again, and it is an unpleasant, though necessary, task to put a peremptory denial upon them. Hence the critic is disposed to see no value or use whatever in the enterprise, especially as the editor has not apparently contributed a single item to our stock of knowledge. He has simply chopped up various books, picked up facts and errors, and placed the result before the public in a manner provocative of examination and censure. He has not merely put our few diamonds in a rich setting, but he has exhibited scores of paste jewels in expensive frames; and we shall be told that our collection is very tawdry and senseless.

It is to be hoped that the ridicule which awaits this venture will prompt some one to do the task rightly. We hope some one will epitomize the knowledge accessible, will bring together the true pedigrees, the authentic cases of use of arms, and will make a careful search for the unpublished instances to be found in our early wills, deeds, and archives. Then, indeed, we shall have an 'America Heraldica' which may be scanty, but will be cited with respect both here and abroad. It is undoubtedly true that in every colony there were resident gentry, but even in England it was always found necessary to hold official visitations, and we must imitate that example. For New England a fair beginning has been made, but the archives of other portions of the country have been sadly neglected. If Mr. Vermont would establish a claim to our respect we advise him to take his artist to the State-houses and county court-houses of New York, New Jersey, and the Southern seaboard States. Let him copy the armorial seals he finds, giving the dates and contents of the documents. Then let him search the older graveyards for armorial inscriptions. After that, he may copy such manuscript pedigrees as will bear examination, and he will produce a volume for which our praise will doubtless be as unstinted as our present condemnation.

CARLYLE'S INDEBTEDNESS TO GOETHE.

Correspondence between Goethe and Carlyle. Edited by Charles Eliot Norton. Macmillan & Co. 1887.

THE feeling that comes over one most often and most forcibly, in reading these letters, is one of surprise that Carlyle should have been in his early manhood so powerfully attracted by Goethe, and should then have taken up into his own being, to all appearance, so little of the characteristic Goethean temper. But this brings us at once to one of the most puzzling facts in the life of Carlyle, puzzling at least for all those of his readers who are conscious, as he was, of a great intellectual debt to Goethe. How is it that Carlyle, having drawn from the life and writings of Goethe so much which he himself felt and proclaimed to be infinitely valuable, should have failed to get the remainder, which might have prevented him from drifting, throughout the rest of his life, further and further from Goethe's ways of thinking? This is a question we have often pondered, and in so doing we have many times wished for more definite knowledge concerning the precise nature of Carlyle's intellectual relations to Goethe. The allusions to this subject in Carlyle's published works are, to be sure, numerous, but they are vague and general. They are in the Sartor tone, and the Sartor tone, whatever may be its value for other purposes, is rather disappointing to one who is athirst for precise information. What Mr. Froude offers on this subject does not satisfy, and satisfies the less since confidence in him as a biographer of Carlyle has been so seriously shaken. When, therefore, it was rumored some months ago that Mr. Norton would edit the correspondence of Goethe and Carlyle, we at once began indulging in the hope that the letters would tell us what we wished to know. This hope has not been altogether disappointed, although not perfectly satisfied, by the volume before us.

The correspondence opens with a letter of Carlyle, written June 24, 1824, and closes with one of Goethe, dated August 19, 1831. The collection contains in all seventeen letters from Goethe to Carlyle, and sixteen from Carlyle to Goethe; besides these there are included in the volume three letters from Eckermann to Carlyle, one from Carlyle to Eckermann, one from Hitzig to Carlyle, one from Mrs. Carlyle to Goethe, and, finally, a curious testmonial written by Goethe at the request of Carlyle, who was just then an aspirant for the chair of moral philosophy at St. Andrews. The letters of Goethe were naturally counted by Carlyle among his pretiosa; in 1834 he tied them up in a package, placed them in a box with papers relating to Cromwell, and afterwards forgot where they were. After his death they were recovered and placed by Mrs. Alexander Carlyle in the hands of Mr. Norton. The letters of Carlyle, save the last one he wrote, which has not yet come to light, have lain since 1832 in the Goethe Archives at Weimar. They were kindly placed at the disposal of Mr. Norton by H. R. H. the Grand Duchess of Saxe-Weimar. The German letters are given first in the original, then in translation, and the entire collection is edited and printed, it hardly need be said, in admirable taste. An excellent Introduction by the editor, occasional notes, and two appendices, furnish all the help needed to make the correspondence everywhere intelligible.

Carlyle's first letter accompanied his translation of 'Wilhelm Meister.' It returns thanks for the profit which the translator, "in common with many millions, had derived from the Original"; then, dropping all formality of style, it continues:

"Four years ago, when I read your 'Faust' among the mountains of my native Scotland, I could not but fancy I might one day see you, and pour out before you, as before a Father, the woes and wanderings of a heart whose mysteries you seemed so thoroughly to comprehend, and could so beautifully represent. The hope of seeing you is still among my dreams."

Such language as this could not be otherwise than welcome to Goethe. The homage of young men was especially grateful to him in his old age, and here was a conquest in a new and unknown quarter. Besides this, his mind was just then filled with the idea of a world-literature which was to draw the nations together in closer intellectual sympathy. In Carlyle he discerned an able co-worker for this project. He replied courteously to the letter, enclosing some recent poems and expressing a wish to hear more of his correspondent. And thus was begun a correspondence which, as Carlyle himself said some forty years afterwards, "was not in itself momentous at all, but to us then an ætherial and quasi-celestial thing." Nearly three years passed before any further letters were interchanged; from the spring of 1827 they become frequent. Goethe sends not only letters, but also packages with presents of various kinds, "for the valued marriage-pair Carlyle," as the recipient gleefully translated Goethe's phraseology. The arrival of a letter or a packet from Weimar makes from time to time a day of jubilee in the lone house at Craigenputtock. Presently the little drawing-room has become "full" of Goethe. Mrs. Carlyle shares the infection. She receives a necklace from the poet, and makes a Scotch bonnet for Ottilie von Goethe. In her devotion, she sends a lock of her hair to the octogenarian at Weimar, and commits the cruel faux pas of asking for one of his in return. The staple of the correspondence is, however, naturally enough, literature. Goethe sends books which will be "helpful," and makes observations upon them. Carlyle keeps his friend informed of the progress of German literature in England; of the English versions of Goethe's works, their merits and their reception; of the authorship of magazine articles on German subjects.

The letters are certainly interesting and valuable, although they hardly deserve the name of good letters. Goethe had long since passed the period of his best letter-writing, and the letters of the younger man lack the verve of those which he wrote to men whom he felt to be his equals—Emerson, for example. It is doubtless due in part to Carlyle's constant attitude of all but idolatrous veneration that the correspondence really throws but little light on the query suggested at the beginning of our review. It may, however, be worth while to bring together a few of the more striking passages in which Carlyle tries to characterize the nature of his own indebtedness to Goethe. In a letter of April 15, 1827, he writes:

"If I have been delivered from darkness into any measure of light, if I know aught of myself and my duties and destination, it is to the study of your writings more than to any other circumstance that I owe this; it is you more than any other man that I should always thank and reverence with the feeling of a Disciple to his Master—nay, of a Son to his spiritual Father."

Again, August 20, of the same year:

"As it is, your Works have been a mirror to me; unasked and unhoped for, your wisdom has counselled me, and so peace and health of Soul have visited me from afar. For I was once an Unbeliever, not in Religion only, but in all the Mercy and Beauty of which it is the Symbol; storm-tossed in my own imaginations; a man divided from men; exasperated, wretched, driven almost to depair—so that Faust's curse seemed the only fit greeting for human life, and his passionate Fluch vor allen der Geduld! was spoken from my very inmost heart. But now, thank Heaven, all this is altered: without change of external circumstances, solely by the new light which rose upon me, I attained to new thoughts and a composure which I should once have considered as impossible."

Alluding to some expressions of Goethe concerning the approaching end of his own life, Carlyle writes, October 23, 1830:

"Neither in any case do we sorrow as those that have no Hope. He who has seen into the high meaning of ENTSAGEN cherishes even here a still Faith in quite another Future than the vulgar devotee believes or the vulgar sceptic denies. 'God is great,' say the Orientals; to which we add only, 'God is good,' as the beginning and end of all our Philosophy."

Again, in a letter of June 10, 1831:

"For it can never be forgotten that to you [him] I owe the all-precious knowledge that Reverence is still possible—nay, Reverence for our fellow-man as a true emblem of the Highest—even in these perturbed, chaotic times. That you have carried and yet will carry such life-giving Light into many a soul wandering bewildered in the eclipse of Doubt; till at length whole generations have cause to bless you, that instead of Conjecturing and Denying they can again Believe and Know: herein truly is a Sovereignty of quite indisputable Legitimacy, and which it is our only Freedom to obey."

To these quotations may be added one from the 'Reminiscences,' vol. i, p. 179:

"This year (1826) I found that I had conquered all my scepticisms, agonizing doubtings, fearful wrestlings with the foul and vile and soul-murdering Mud-gods of my Epoch; had escaped as from a worse than Tartarus, with all its Phlegethons and Stygian quagmires; and was emerging free in spirit into the eternal blue of ether—where, blessed be Heaven, I have, for the spiritual part, ever since lived. . . . I then felt and still feel endlessly indebted to Goethe in the business; he, in his fashion, I perceived, had travelled the steep, rocky road before me—the first of the moderns."

Such are the descriptions with which we are obliged to content ourselves. Goethe took hold of Carlyle only from his ethical side. He did for the young Scotchman what the Jew Spinoza had done for himself, namely, calmed and clarified his mind at a time when he had utterly lost faith in the value of life; taught him that the sun does not fall from the sky when mortals put away the creed of their fathers, and that a man of honest purpose and wide outlook may ground himself on rational foundations of his own; taught him also to "renounce"—that is, not to make excessive demands upon life in the expectation of happiness; and taught him, finally, that work is one of the best of tonics against the depressing influences of over-solicitude with regard to the world in general. All this was indubitably Goethe, but it was not the whole of Goethe. There remained Art and Science; but for these, with all that they signified to his illustrious friend, Carlyle cared but little. And so, with all his genius, we miss in him several essential traits of that superb portrait which Goethe has drawn in the famous lines:

> "Welte Welt und breites Leben,
> Langer Jahre redlich Streben,
> Stets geforscht und stets gegründet,
> Nie geschlossen, oft gerändet,
> Aeltestes bewahrt mit Treue,
> Freundlich aufgefasstes Neue,
> Heitern Sinn und reine Zwecke:
> Nun—man kommt wol eine Strecke,"

NON-ENGLISH SETTLEMENTS IN NORTH AMERICA.

French Explorations and Settlements in North America, and those of the Portuguese, Dutch, and Swedes, 1500-1700. [Narrative and Critical History of America. Edited by Justin Winsor. Vol IV.] Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. [1886.]

A MOST notable paper in the new volume of the 'Narrative and Critical History of America' is the opening article, by Prof. Shaler, on the physiography of North America. There are many who will wish that work like this had come to their knowledge in the formative period of life, and will count him fortunate among historical students who shall take his bias from this chapter. It deserves to be printed in the forefront of all histories of the United States which shall be written for a generation. A condensed, clear, and suggestive description of the physical features of the continent prefaces a careful summary of the influence which those features have exerted upon men of European origin and on the course of colonization. As regards the direct comparison of Americans of to-day with their European contemporaries, Prof. Shaler holds that "the American people are no smaller in size than are the peoples of Europe from which they are derived; they are at least as long-lived; their capacity to withstand fatigue, wounds, etc., is at least as great as that of any European people; the average of physical beauty is probably quite as good as it is among an equal population in the Old World; the fecundity of the people is not diminished." Contrasting the success of the English colonies with the failure of the French, despite the statesmanlike comprehension of the possibilities of the country shown by the latter, it is pointed out that the French were heavily handicapped by the physical and climatic conditions of their possessions, which denied them the aid of maize, and that this disadvantage was increased by a restrictive system of land tenure, and by a habit of regarding the colonies as trading posts, while the English looked upon their settlements as permanent homes.

The history of the earliest French explorations of the Canadian coast was written by the late George Dexter, and it should count for much that this painstaking and fair-minded scholar has restored the voyage of Verrazano to the place from which the casuistical objections of Mr. Murphy should never have driven it. The voyages of the unfortunate Cortereals are included in this chapter. The explorations of Cartier, and the abortive settlement of Roberval are described by Dr. De Costa, who takes occasion to dissipate the impression that Canada was neglected by the French between 1547 and the close of the century; it is true that no attempt at colonization was made, but private trading voyages were frequent.

The ever-interesting exploits of Champlain are retold by the Rev. Edmund Slafter, to whom we owe the best account of the life of this remarkable man. Mr. Slafter's theory, that Champlain, in taking the warpath with the Huron against the Iroquois, was actuated by a broad national policy, sacrifices the explorer's judgment to his prudence. The early and disheartening attempts to establish trading posts in Nova Scotia made by De Monts, Pontrincourt, and their successors down to the fruitless seizure of the country by Phips in 1670, are described by Mr. C. C. Smith, of the Massachusetts Historical Society, in a chapter entitled "Acadia," which, of course, does not cover the events most widely associated with that name.

The Rev. E. D. Neill, who owns a divided allegiance to Maryland and Minnesota, has related the history of Quebec from its capture by "Kyrcke," a form of the name not instantly suggesting "Kirk," to the time of Frontenac, and depicted with careful detail the course of exploration about the great lakes until 1689, when the French took formal possession of that region. Mr. Neill is of a sympathetic turn, and the hardships of the explorers are realistically represented in his style. A more uncomfortable piece of narrative, or one more suggestive of trackless forests and rugged portages, we have not lately met. As a severe exercise of mind and muscle, we can heartily recommend the perusal of this chapter, with the aid of its necessary concomitant, a big atlas.

The account of the exploration of the lakes is supplemented by a chapter from the editor upon the further work of Joliet, Marquette, and La Salle, with a sketch of the occupation of Louisiana, and reproductions of many of the manuscript maps which bear the names of the explorers. In spite of the labors of M. Margry, the soundness of Joliet's claim to the discovery of the upper Mississippi is assumed both by Mr. Neill and by Mr. Winsor, the latter giving a long note to Hennepin and his works. The internal history of Quebec and Canada at this epoch of westward exploration is related by Mr. George Stewart, jr., in his chapter upon Count Frontenac, that worthy successor of Champlain, who shares with Roger Williams and with Sir William Johnson the credit of being one of the few men of alien race who have understood how to deal with the Indian. The stern character of the northern aborigines and the numerical weakness of the colonies forbade a repetition in the north of the unspeakable iniquities against which Las Casas labored in vain in the south; but, apart from this, there is a difference in the treatment accorded the natives by the Spaniards and the French which it were unjust to ascribe solely to the lapse of time. It is perhaps not saying overmuch, but it must in fairness be said, that the French were preëminent among the peoples who helped themselves to lands in America for the inherent good-nature and the Christian spirit which marked their dealings with the tribes they came to dwell among, regarding them apparently neither as beasts of burden nor as agents of the devil in his war against God's people, but as weaker brethren. The labors of Eliot and his associates in Massachusetts, though worthy of more attention than was yielded them in the preceding volume of this History, were but small in extent and in effect compared with the efforts of the Roman Church in the French possessions. Jesuits, Sulpitians, and Recollects toiled and suffered for the conversion and education of the red men over a territory that stretched from Nova Scotia to Lake Superior, and from the Mohawk well nigh to Hudson's Bay. The story of their achievements and their failures is clearly sketched by Dr. J. G. Shea, whose work on the subject has been an authority for thirty years, and it is full of interest and food for thought. A bibliography of the Jesuit Relations from which most of the facts of the history are drawn, forms an appendage to this chapter.

It is characteristic of the Dutch that, having taken no part in the exploration or settlement of the New World for a century and a quarter after the discovery, they finally entered the game by appropriating the finest commercial and agricultural site along the entire coast, having in 1626 bought the whole of Manhattan Island for the eminently reasonable sum of twenty-four dollars. The history of this settlement and its weal and woe until it was handed over to England in 1674 is told by Berthold Fernow, keeper of the Records of New York, with disappointing brevity. The future importance of the place and the inherent interest of the story demanded fuller treatment, and to give it but a third of the space devoted to New Sweden seems a curious error.

Writing in 1643, the President of the Royal Council of Sweden expressed the hope that the whole Continent of America might in time become subject to the Crown of Sweden. The colony of New Sweden, the inspiration of this pious wish, was founded through Dutch effort and by Dutch settlers in 1638, and extinguished, when it had begun to attract Swedes, in 1655, also by Dutch effort. Down to 1654, when it received an influx of 350 persons, it seems never to have numbered above 200 inhabitants all told. That its historian, Prof. Keen, has succeeded in interesting us through forty-four pages, is a tribute no less to his skill than to the copiousness of the sources.

Mr. Winsor's cartographical contributions to the present volume, which, of course, comprise most of the new matter that it offers, are as follows: Maps of the eastern coast of North America, 1500-1535; Cartography of the northeast coast of North America, 1535-1600; Maps illustrating the exploration of the Great Lakes and the Mississippi Valley; General atlases and charts of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (Mercator, Hondius, Blaeu, etc.); Maps of the seventeenth century showing Canada. The maps bearing upon the Dutch occupancy of New York are described in the critical essay of Mr. Fernow. The book contains two modern maps, and about one hundred and forty reproductions of old maps.

We presume Mr. Winsor could give a reason for not putting the date of publication of these volumes upon the title-page, but we cannot but look upon the omission as unfortunate. The volume before us was copyrighted in 1884, and a part of it certainly was written in or before 1882; we believe we are right in stating that it was published in 1886.

Celebrities of the Century: Being a Dictionary of Men and Women of the 19th Century. Edited by Lloyd C. Sanders. Cassell & Co. 1887.

THE calendar division between our own century and its immediate predecessor has determined admissions to this work, except in the case of lives which barely overlapped the boundary, and whose effectiveness belonged to the earlier period. The living as well as the dead are included. In fulness it falls below the handiest standard of comparison, Thomas's 'Biographical Dictionary,' as it does below 'Men of the Time,' in its line, yet supplements both, whether by new names or by proportion of treatment. The spirit in which it has been composed and edited is liberal, with rare exhibition of insularity or of factiousness, while its tone toward this country is absolutely friendly and very fair, as one may see by reading the Federal and Confederate military biographies. Under Gladstone it is remembered that having at an inopportune moment said that Jefferson Davis had created a nation, he thereby gave pain to many of his followers, though he afterwards apologized for his error. Under Lee the conclusion is ventured, "That his cause was not ultimately successful was simply because, in the nature of the case, the means at his command were inadequate"—which will cause no heart-burnings. Some other readings in American history are more questionable, e. g., under Clay: "His last session in the Senate (1848 to 1851) was almost entirely devoted to the abolition of slavery"; under Theodore Parker: "From 1856 to 1859, as an intimate friend of Garrison and John Brown, he did all that was possible by preaching and the supply of arms to assist the Abolitionist cause during the Kansas War and the raid on Harper's Ferry"; under Wendell Phillips, that, after assuming the presidency of the American Anti-Slavery Society, he "succeeded in winning for the negro full citizenship."

The accuracy of this Dictionary is to be praised, so far as we have tested it; such slips as giving a final e to Mr. Howells's middle name, or making President Cleveland a native of New York, being too trivial to censure. The list of sources at the end of each article is usually fresh and discriminating, but Davis's 'Rise and Fall of the Confederacy' is overlooked, as is John Quincy Adams's Diary; and, as is evident from the notices of Cooper and Calhoun, the American Statesmen and American Men of Letters series were unknown to the editor and his corps. Some omissions strike one, as, Lyman Beecher, Benton, Frémont; Von Holst; Leconte de Lisle, etc. There has been a displacement in arranging the Lawrences, Sir John coming before Sir Henry. On the whole, we have every reason to welcome so convenient a reference-book as this. No one can turn its pages and observe the splendid names which it celebrates without being impressed with the exalted rank of the present century in any comparison with those that have gone before—material, moral, intellectual. Music, poetry, philanthropy, statesmanship, the art of war, the triumphs of man over nature, the progress of discovery and invention, have all been illustrated by names "on Fame's eternal bead-roll worthy to be filed."

Rambles in Old Boston, New England. By the Rev. Edward G. Porter. Illustrated by George R. Tolman. Boston: Cupples, Upham & Co. 1887. 4to, pp. 439.

ALL Bostonians are aware of the fact that Old Boston lies at the North End. At the first settlement of the town, the line of occupation was from the water-front up State Street, northerly along Court Street, under the shadow of Beacon Hill, and then easterly across a creek to that Copp's Hill which terminated the peninsula. A century later, Washington Street was extended southerly, but Boylston Street was decidedly South End. Castle Street, or the present line of the Boston and Albany Railroad, was the absolute terminus of the town. But the most interesting local associations hang around the old town. There dwelt all the colonial Governors and also all their chief opponents. Here lived the rulers of the town meetings and the originators of the town caucuses. Here the spirit of independence was kept alive from the time of Andros to that of Hutchinson; and here the desire for freedom of personal action was artfully and speedily developed into armed resistance to the mother country.

All good Bostonians knew these facts in our grandfathers' days, because they lived on these sites. But in our fathers' time the Mill-pond was filled in, then the South Cove disappeared, and a notable emigration took the old settlers to more southerly localities. The great Irish influx filled up these streets, abandoned by the native-born, and so conveniently situated to house the laborers employed on the adjacent wharves. The stately houses of colonial times became accustomed to Celtic accents, and the Puritan churches allowed themselves to show the golden cross.

Another turn of the wheel, and the Irish colonist, or rather his progeny, born, educated, and developed, has already commenced a new exodus, which finds an ending in the fields of Roxbury and Dorchester. To the first strangers has succeeded a horde of new-comers from southern Europe. Italians and Portuguese have driven out the Irish, underbidding them for work, and crowding them out by mere strength of numbers and clannish feeling. A young man, born here of Irish parents, recently remarked that as a boy he was the only Irish scholar in his school; and to-day, at the age of thirty, he is the only Irish resident on the street, having continued, accidentally, to reside in the house where he was born.

These two tidal waves having swept over the territory, it is not strange that Mr. Porter's book is a necessity and a revelation. It is a necessity, for Yankees really required a guide-book to the place. It is a revelation, for it shows how much of Old Boston has survived, disfigured and dismantled, but still discernible and instructive. His care and patience have been well seconded by the pencil of his artist. We can now at our leisure realize the appearance of colonial Boston, and, if we please, can still visit and examine the glories of the past.

It would be useless to try to enumerate the interesting topics discussed in this volume. The author pursues no set plan of peregrination, but strays here and there, noting every picturesque dwelling and setting down the names of departed worthies. From Sir William Phips to Henry Ward Beecher, from Cotton Mather to Josiah Quincy, from the earliest generation to the present time, something is everywhere gleaned to illustrate his subject. It is a genuine result of enthusiasm tempered by discretion; and while it will amuse every reader for an hour, it also preserves matters rapidly falling into oblivion, and merits a place among the works of our standard historians.

The Pharaohs of the Bondage and the Exodus. By Rev. Charles S. Robinson, D.D. The Century Co. 1887.

THESE lectures, delivered in the Madison Avenue Church, New York, contain a number of interesting details in connection with the recent Egyptian discoveries of Maspero, Brugsch, Naville, Mr. Flinders Petrie, and others, and are so far useful. It is to be regretted that the author has not treated the material in a larger way. His whole interest is theological, and his theology is sectarian. He has no feeling for the grand civilization of old Egypt, and no conception of its higher religious and ethical ideas. He looks on the monuments merely as material for illustrating what he thinks to be the ancient history of the Israelites, which he supposes to be given in the Pentateuch without admixture of legend. His judgment of Egyptian personages is wholly determined by their fancied relation to the Jews. The legendary daughter of Pharaoh, who is said to have adopted Moses as her son, excites his warmest interest, while for Seti I. he can find no adjectives harsh enough to characterize his career; and it evidently has never occurred to him that those same adjectives are virtually applied to King David in the Old Testament narrative. In the same spirit he quotes those Old Testament prophecies against Egypt which he thinks have been fulfilled, and says nothing of those, such as Isaiah xix, 25, which have obviously never been fulfilled. It is a pity that this little volume, so admirably printed and designed for popular reading, should thus ignore the principles of historical criticism. The author, in fact, regards the modern Biblical criticism as an attack on the Christian religion (page 38), which is both a misrepresentation of criticism and treason against Christianity.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The most brilliant novel of the season. In annexing the province of the historian to the domain of the novelist, he has achieved a distinguished success.—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

His highest achievement as yet in the realms of romance. . . . The story is exquisitely told, a story of intense and eternal love, yet love too true, too noble to hold within it obliquity of dishonor. It is a spiritual tragedy, redeemed and saved and directed to lofty issues by the ennobling power of ideal nobleness and truth. . . . It is not too much to pronounce 'Saracinesca' by far the greatest novel of this decade.—Boston Evening Traveller.

'Saracinesca,' we think, is unquestionably Mr. Crawford's best novel.—Washington Capital.

A more perfect picture of modern life in Rome does not exist, even in Italian fiction. . . . Mr. Crawford has written a book that deserves a permanent place in the literature of the world. . . . The character of the heroine is one of the most charming figures to be found in fiction. Poetic in temperament, yet never descending to weak sentimentality, she is a glorious type of majestic womanhood.—Morning Journal.

'Saracinesca' is the best thing he has yet done—if not the best novel of the year.—New York Freeman's Journal.

In Mr. Crawford's matured and most satisfying work. . . . Will give very great pleasure, and it will add vastly to Mr. Crawford's reputation for writing the most readable novels in our language.—Boston Beacon.

Delights and interests more than anything he has written since he surprised the world with 'Mr. Isaacs.' . . . He has in 'Saracinesca' written a powerful story of modern Roman life, which is better even than his 'Roman Singer.'—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

Moves forward with an easy and even flow of which even Bulwer, who wrote novels of adventure very much of this sort, need not have been ashamed.—Boston Courier.

'Saracinesca' is a very remarkable book, and a great advance upon any of the author's previous work. . . . It would be difficult to conceive of a more gracious presence than that of the Duchess Corona. She is so pure and true, so brave under trial, and withal such a thorough woman—no angel, just a passionate, loving, lovable woman—faithful to her high ideal of right, loyal to her husband. . . . If the conclusion of the story is to be as good as the opening, we cannot have it too soon. In any case, this is one of the most effective romances since 'John Inglesant.'—London Academy.

By the same author, price $1.50 each.

LONGFELLOW.
FINAL MEMORIALS OF
HENRY W. LONGFELLOW. By Samuel Longfellow. 8vo. Uniform with the 'Life.' With two new steel plates. In cloth, $3; half-calf or half-morocco, $5.50.

"The beauty of this treasure of a book, which makes us love and honor the lamented poet more and more, and which rounds out the beautiful record of a beautiful life."—Cambridge Tribune.

"What richness of revelation concerning his personal life is to be found in this book. Everything in this volume has the character of a summer afternoon about it. You are attracted to the life of the poet as you are drawn to his poetry, because he makes you forget the cares and anxieties of life."—Boston Herald.

"At the appearance of the 'Life,' we remarked upon the loveliness of spirit, the tenderness of feeling, and the amiability of temper that always characterized the poet. One rides from the present volume of 'Memorials' with a sense of the same qualities in him of whom it treats, and with a feeling that it was good to have spent so much time in the company of so beautiful a spirit."—Advertiser.

"This book introduces the reader into the most intimate life of the beloved poet. His sweetness and charm of nature, his playful gentleness, his fine discrimination, his inclusive sympathies are revealed here in a manner that could hardly be borne by any other character in literary history."—Traveller.

Prof. Johnston was for years a resident of Connecticut, and has written of the State from full knowledge of its history, institutions, and achievements in industry, commerce, education, and social life.

The Poetic and Dramatic Works of Robert Browning.
An entirely New Edition from new electrotype plates, after the latest revised English Edition. In six volumes, crown octavo. Vols. III. and IV. Gilt top, $1.75 a volume; half calf, $3.00.

Volume III. contains THE RING AND THE BOOK; Volume IV. CHRISTMAS EVE AND EASTER DAY, with Men and Women; In a Balcony, Dramatis Personæ, Balaustion's Adventure, Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau, and Fifine at the Fair.

The volumes represent the very best American work—with all the care, the taste, and the sound judgment in book-making which the Riverside Press has come to represent.—Christian Union (New York).

The Blueberry is a valuable fruit, and is a reliable fruit to grow in the Northern States, where the more tender varieties winter kills. It is perfectly hardy, will stand 40 degrees below zero without showing any injury to the most tender buds. Fruit ripens in this latitude about the first of July. Color, a bluish black, when fully ripened. The flavor is equal to the raspberry, a very mild, rich sub-acid, pronounced by most people delicious. The fruit is excellent for pies, or canned for winter use. It grows very stocky; the shining dark-green leaves and the blue fruit make a pleasing contrast. It seems to flourish in all soils and is a prolific bearer. One dozen plants by mail, carefully packed in oil paper, 60 cts.; two dozen by mail, $1.00; 100 by express, $2.50; 1,000, $15.00.

NEW AMERICAN PLAY FOR MALE ACTORS ONLY.

The Gray Tigers of Smithville; or He Would and He Wouldn't. In three acts. Notices Pro and Con: "The characters all new, with plenty of action and fun." "Scene in a Pennsylvania village ten years after the war." "The military features on a humorous side." "Beginning slow, but once started, lively to the very end." "Harder on the actors than the audience." "The mise-en-scène simple enough, but the action decidedly above the ability of the ordinary school-boy." "Just the thing for a G. A. R. P. or a military school of superior rank." "Language often sparkling and quite delightful." "Reads well—perhaps a doubtful compliment." "The first act admits of generous pruning; the others can't lose a syllable." "Hardly grave enough for Sophs., but the kind of an affair for every well-constituted Freshman to revel in." "Not inserting, not thrilling, rather bouffe, and certainly amusing." Mailed to any address on receipt of price, 25 cents. Edward Roth, 1135 Pine Street, Philadelphia.

HOMŒOPATHY.—In England Pleuro-Pneumonia is cured by Homœopathy—in this country by butchery. Very efficacious, the latter: when there are no more cattle there is no more Pleuro-Pneumonia. But the English way is more profitable, for the Homœopathic veterinary remedies Aconitum, Bryonia, Am. Caust., and Arsenicum will restore to sound health 90 per cent. of the afflicted of this disease. The medicines cost 60 cents each; books for treating this and other diseases of animals anywhere from 50 cents to $5.

Word Studies in the New Testament.

By MARVIN R. VINCENT, D.D.

The Synoptic Gospels, Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of Peter, James, and Jude. 8vo, $4.00.

The scope of this scholarly and important contribution to the critical study of the text of the New Testament is broad and comprehensive, the work being the fruit of many years' laborious research. Dr. Vincent outlines the purpose of the work in these sentences from his preface:

"The present work is an attempt in a field which, so far as I am aware, is not covered by any one book, though it has been carefully and ably worked by many scholars. Taking a position midway between the exegetical commentary and the lexicon and grammar, it aims to put the reader of the English Bible nearer to the standpoint of the Greek scholar, by opening to him the native force of the separate words of the New Testament in their lexical sense, their etymology, their history, their inflection, and the peculiarities of their usage by different evangelists and apostles."

The Story of a New York House.

By H. C. BUNNER. Illustrated by A. B. FROST, Cloth, 12mo, $1.25.

A strong story outlining the great social changes wrought in New York city since the early part of the present century, dramatic in development and tender in feeling. The action is brought down nearly to the present time. Concerning the early chapters the New York Evening Post said:

"In Mr. Bunner's 'Story of a New York House,' the first years of the century are picturesquely set before us, and in the treatment one perceives the union of grace and strength which may denote the work of a writer of the first contemporary rank in America."

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MAY 12, 1887.

The Week.

THE approval by the President of rules extending the competitive principle to cover promotion in the civil service, as well as the entrance upon it, is the longest step forward which the reform has taken since the passage of the law of 1883. The spoilsmen of the Democratic party have complained because Mr. Cleveland lived up to the original law, and have only been willing to excuse his course as a disagreeable necessity. His response is a voluntary extension of the system, under the discretion which the law—so fortunately, as it proves—left the President. It was a happy coincidence that Mr. Cleveland should have taken this important step on the day that the Kentucky Democratic Convention's slur upon the reform was published.

With the exception of Tennessee and North Carolina, Kentucky is the most ignorant State in the Union, according to the fairest test attainable, which is the proportion of her white population above the age of twenty-one who are unable to write their names. While in Nebraska and Kansas there are only thirty and thirty-one such men out of every thousand, and in New York and Massachusetts but fifty-five and sixty-two—nearly all of whom prove to be foreigners who came to this country without learning their letters and too old to attend school—in Kentucky 173 men out of every thousand have to make their mark when they sign a document. A correspondent of the Louisville Commercial recently quoted Gen. Fayette Hewitt, the Auditor of the State, as saying of the men who are elected to the Legislature, that "numbers of them can neither read nor write, and not only that, but they pride themselves on the fact, and never fail to let the body know that the people elected them to this honored position, notwithstanding their ignorance." Many of these have been so ignorant that they could not write their names to their vouchers on drawing their pay.

The resolution of the Kentucky Democratic Convention regarding civil-service reform is precisely what one should have looked for from such a body in such a State. We quote it in full, because it is well to put on record what even in Kentucky before many years will be regarded as a political curiosity.

"We favor honest civil-service reform, by which we mean the enforcement of the faithful performance by persons appointed to office of all public duties intrusted to them; and to this end, as well as to the maintenance of the spirit of our representative form of government, we demand the strictest measure of personal and party responsibility, and are opposed to the substitution in room of this of life tenure, a civil pension list, and all other appendages of a bureaucratic system foreign to the genius of our institutions and people."

This resolution, as we have said, is what was to have been expected, and signifies nothing. But there was one feature of the Convention which was not thus to have been counted upon, and which is in the highest degree significant. Congressman Taulbee, who represents the mountain district in Eastern Kentucky, consisting of twenty of the most backward and ignorant counties, and who naturally is a bitter enemy of civil-service reform, went to the Convention resolved to defeat any movement looking towards the endorsement of the reforming President, and he made a speech against any deliverance of that sort. But the Convention adopted a resolution quite as strong as that which Mr. Taulbee had opposed, its language being as follows: "We declare our confidence in the integrity and conscientious devotion to duty of President Grover Cleveland, and congratulate the country and the party upon the accession of a Democratic Administration, national, economic, and clean; and we particularly applaud the President for the fidelity and courage with which he has protected the Treasury from pillage by his exercise of the veto power." Moreover, the leaders of the party—such men as Senator Beck, Speaker Carlisle, and Representative Breckinridge—made speeches which mean much more than any mere resolution could do. While yielding so far to the ignorance and prejudice in the party as to concede that "the Administration has not satisfied us all," they bestowed warm praise upon it as a whole, and declared that the President must be heartily sustained by the Democratic party.

The question, what shall be done with the surplus in the national treasury, is becoming a burning one, there being only $18,000,000 of 3 per cent. bonds subject to call. Congress had this subject before it all of the last session, but did nothing either to reduce taxation or to dispose of the expected accumulations of money. Two methods of emptying the Treasury are open to the Executive in the absence of new legislation, viz., to buy bonds in the open market, or to pay interest on bonds in advance of its maturity, at such rate of discount as the recipients may agree to. The latter method has been resorted to occasionally by many successive secretaries, without any discount, but only at short periods (two or three months) before the interest became due. Now the question may arise whether it is best to pay interest in advance for longer periods, or to buy bonds in the open market at a high and advancing premium. We think that business men will agree that the former method of getting rid of the surplus is the better of the two. There is no limit to the premium that will be asked for bonds if the Government becomes a forced purchaser. In fact, speculation in the 4 per cents has already taken a fresh start on the hypothesis that the Government would soon become a buyer. Whenever the Secretary comes into the market for this purpose he will find it "cornered" against him. The public would be very much dissatisfied if they should see the Treasury made the victim of speculators, and especially bondholding speculators.

The alternative, as we have said, is to pay interest in advance until such time as Congress shall take steps to dispose of the surplus, making such discount for the advance as the bondholders may agree to. Suppose that the Secretary, having the means in hand to pay the interest in advance for six months, say $24,000,000, and a rapidly accumulating reserve, advertises that he will pay the money to all bondholders who will accept it at a discount of 2 per cent. per annum. Nearly everybody can use money at a better rate than 2 per cent. But the Government cannot use a surplus at all except to pay its debts. It has no other possible investment. To hoard money in ever-increasing amounts is to bring on a commercial crisis. Anything is better than that. Logically it would be better to pay the interest in advance without discount than to lock up the circulating medium of the country. But the probability is that the holders of bonds would generally accept the interest in advance at a discount of 2 per cent. Is there any objection legal or moral to such a proceeding? As regards its legality, it may be urged that there is plenty of precedent for it. Although the interest on the public debt has never been paid more than two or three months in advance, the principle is the same as though it were three years. The reason in both cases would be the same, i. e., to avoid the locking up of money, the cramping of business, the crippling of industry. If it be said that Congress when next convened may desire to make other disposition of the money, the answer is that, having got its liabilities for interest out of the way, it can use its current receipts for the desired purpose. The net assets of the Treasury are not impaired.

A law was enacted at the last session of Congress conferring a very peculiar jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims, which throws a significant side light upon our accounting system. It provides that the Court shall, after due notice has been given to the head of the proper department and to the Attorney-General, proceed to hear the petitions of those Government officers, agents, and contractors who allege that they are indebted as such to the United States; that application has been made to the proper department of the Government for an adjustment, that three years have elapsed since the application, and that the account upon which the indebtedness arises remains unsettled. The petitions of guarantors, sureties or personal representatives of such parties are equally entitled under this law to a hearing. It then becomes the duty of the court "to ascertain the amount, if any, due the United States on said account," and the payment of this amount shall discharge such obligation. If not paid, it may be recovered by suit brought at any time within three years. After that time the claim and the original indebtedness shall be for ever barred. It seems at first blush very odd that a debtor should be allowed to bring a suit against his creditor, based upon the account from which the indebtedness springs, but a little reflection enables us to comprehend the mischief of the old system which this law attempts to suppress. In the first place, many agents of the Government are, as the accounting officers will be the first to admit, only nominal or apparent debtors. That is, there are items yet to be credited which will balance their accounts, but a deficiency appropriation is needed in order to warrant their allowance; or vouchers of a certain kind are required to support charges made, which it is impossible to secure, on account of the death of the officer, or those from whom he made purchases; or the accounts have not been received at the Treasury, being in the pigeonholes of the department of which the officer was a subordinate, and through which his accounts were transmitted.

Perhaps the greatest evil designed to be corrected by this law is the indefinite liability of sureties and heirs of Government officers. Owing to the sense of security afforded by the existence of a bond, many instances of the grossest carelessness and tardiness now occur, both on the part of the officer in making his returns and the Treasury accountants in revising them and in pressing their settlement. After many years, suit is instituted against those who have even forgotten that they were sureties. In most of these cases the Government gains nothing, either because of the insolvency of the parties, or because of the adverse instructions of the Court. The English Government discovered long ago that it was wiser to dispense with bonds, and instead to rely upon speedy settlements with disbursing officers.

The campaign against Poverty goes on with vigor, Mr. George having dealt the enemy some heavy blows at the Academy of Music on Sunday evening, and Dr. McGlynn following up the attack at the Cooper Institute on Monday evening. The enemy showed signs of weakness at the Academy by contributing $500 to the attacking party. A portion of this was thrown on the stage from all parts of the house, very much as bouquets are thrown at popular singers. Now $500 is sufficient to start two or three families on the farms in the town of Ludlow, Vermont, that have been abandoned by their owners because they could not earn a living and pay the taxes on them. Since the campaign against Poverty has for its object the confiscation of land and the taxing of farms up to their full rental value, here is a good opportunity to show how the thing would work. Let the $500 be immediately applied to the seizure of these farms and to the purchase of ploughs, seeds, and domestic animals. If the Legislature of Vermont do not put the taxes on the land high enough to kill Poverty, Mr. George can go up there and deliver a lecture on the subject. This would be much more to the purpose than bragging how many votes he got for the office of Mayor last fall.

Another of the great "labor bills" has passed the New York Assembly. It makes ten hours a day's labor for the drivers of street cars. As the drivers are paid by the trip, and need not go on more trips than they choose, the object of the bill is simply to please Labor; but if Labor be pleased with it, Labor is sillier than its worst enemies suppose. If the friends of Labor in the Legislature could be induced to introduce, if not to pass, all possible labor bills at once, it would be a great saving of public time. Among those which have not as yet received attention would be one fixing the amount of money which each laborer should have in his pocket for incidental expenses. The most important of all is, however, the Labor Sleep Bill. The sleep of the laboring man has thus far been shamefully neglected by those who make our laws. Nobody in this State, not even the Labor Bureau, knows how much sleep Labor gets, or concerns himself in the least about it, although it is well settled that eight hours' sleep is each laborer's due. If he does not get it, it shows that there is something wrong in our Government. The Labor Sleep Bill will or ought to provide that each laborer shall have eight hours' sleep, either continuous or desultory, and shall stay in bed till he gets it, and that six Sleep Inspectors, with a salary of $5,000 each, shall be appointed to watch over the execution of the law, and provide for silence around the laborer's couch.

The letter written by the Rev. Dr. McGlynn to the Times denying the alleged interview in which he was represented as defining Archbishop Corrigan's politics in the last national election, contains two statements which possess considerable interest. One is that whereas he (Dr. McGlynn) was opposed to Mr. Blaine in the last election, he will be just as much opposed to him in the next one if he should be renominated. This declaration will sink very deep into the hearts of the Republican campaign managers in this State. The other pregnant sentence we quote in his own words:

"You ask, 'To whom did Dr. McGlynn allude when he spoke of the "precious gang" who were sending out "calumnies on this subject to clergymen all over the country?"' I meant by the 'precious gang' not any number of clergymen, whether bishops or priests, but a lot of political rascals who, as your quotation from my statement shows, had tried by unjustly exciting Catholic prejudice to defeat Gov. Robinson, and were repeating the same art to defeat Mr. Cleveland. A leader of this gang on both occasions, as I well knew, was Mr. Thomas F. Grady, who, I have reason to surmise, was the author of the circular against Mr. Cleveland sent to Catholic clergymen, for a clergyman had told me that Mr. Grady had shown him a copy of it in print that seemed to be a proof with Mr. Grady's manuscript corrections."

Mr. Grady was one of "the enemies he had made," whose hostility at the Chicago Convention contributed so much to Mr. Cleveland's nomination. It is well known that Grady's hostility followed Mr. Cleveland after his nomination with as great virulence as before. Inferences may be drawn from this respecting the late Mr. John Kelly, but it is perhaps best not to disturb his ashes.

The election of 1884 showed that Mugwumpism had gained at least a foothold in Wisconsin, Blaine's vote for President falling more than 2,000 short of Rusk's for Governor, and Cleveland's leading that of the Democratic candidate for Governor in the same proportion. Two years of a Democratic Administration have greatly strengthened the Independent feeling, and its importance is now fully recognized by the Republican managers. The Milwaukee Sentinel, the chief party organ, opposes the renomination of Blaine, and Senator Sawyer, the leading party manager, is out for Sherman as the candidate in 1888. The drift of sentiment is illustrated by the result of a canvass among thirty prominent Republicans of Oshkosh, which showed that Blaine was the first choice of only fourteen, and that a number of these doubt the advisability of nominating him for fear that he would be more badly beaten another time.

Some very interesting figures are published by the Providence Journal from advance sheets of the census of Rhode Island, which was taken in 1885 and is now in process of completion. These show that while there are nearly 86,000 men of voting age in the State, less than 46,000 are returned as qualified voters. This great discrepancy is not due, as might be supposed, solely to the discrimination which the State laws make against residents of foreign birth, for while about 54,000 of the 86,000 are native born, only about 41,000 of them are actual voters, the others, numbering over 12,000, having never taken the trouble to comply with the registration laws. The total number of foreign-born residents of voting age is nearly 32,000, and only about 5,000 of these are actual voters. Over 23,000 of them have never been naturalized, while over 3,400 who have been naturalized are not able to vote because not possessing the $134 worth of real estate required by law. If all the aliens were naturalized, and universal and unrestricted suffrage prevailed, the native-born voter would still outnumber the foreign-born by more than five to three.

The item of greatest interest in this showing is the presence in the State of over 12,000 native-born voters who have the right of suffrage, but who have not taken the trouble to exercise it. This is a much larger proportion—12,000 out of 46,000, more than one-fourth—than can be found in any other State. It is undoubtedly due to the long supremacy of the Republican party in the State, and to the registration laws which that party's managers concocted to enable them to continue in control. These laws require the payment of registration taxes a year or more in advance of election, with the express purpose of keeping the Democratic registration down. So long as there was no hope of success at the polls, the Democratic voters would not pay their own poll-taxes, and their managers would not go to the expense of paying them for them. Democratic success has changed this, and the next election is likely to show a great diminution in the number of stay-at-home voters, and a large increase in the Democratic total, for it is reasonable to suppose that nearly all the 12,000 absentees are Democrats. What is true of Rhode Island is true in a wider sense of the whole country. The Democratic party will enter the next Presidential election with the prestige of success to help and encourage its apathetic voters for the first time in a quarter of a century, and the increase in its vote from this source alone will be an element of no slight importance in deciding the result.

The last number of the New York Lumber Trade Journal—at the close of an article exhibiting some details of the business carried on by American capital in the manufacture and sale of Canadian forest products—asks whether we can afford to cut ourselves off from this source of supply in order that relatively unimportant fishing interests may be fostered? For the three years 1884-5-6, all but 2 per cent. of the total value of the exports from the Ottawa Consular District were forest products. Both in Quebec and Ontario, Americans have taken a leading part in developing this main resource of the country, and many of them have made large fortunes in the business. When it was believed that the Morrison Tariff Bill was likely to pass, much lumber was bought for shipment to the United States, one firm buying eighty million feet. Should non-intercourse be proclaimed, the American owners cannot get this property to market, and we shall not—in a season when all the signs indicate a short supply and high prices—enjoy the relief which this addition to our stock would give. The Northwestern Lumberman says that everything points to higher prices this season. At the Lumbermen's Convention, recently held at Minneapolis, the Secretary reported that there are a billion feet less of manufactured lumber in stock than a year ago, and that last winter's log crop is no larger than that of the winter of 1885–6. A correspondent of the same paper estimates that not less than 130,000,000 feet of timber will be required for culverts and bridges on new railroads built this season, and that an equal amount will be absorbed by the stations and villages along the lines. Nearly all the correspondents from prominent Eastern points say that the indications are that this season there will be more than the average amount of lumber absorbed in building. If under such circumstances we cut off all or the greater part of the material we might get from the Canadian forests, and have to show for it nothing but a higher price for all the fish we eat, it would seem a hard matter for the most inveterate protectionist to cipher out a profit.

Some time ago we published an outline of the Ohio Liquor-Tax Law, showing that the receipts from its successful working were paid into the county treasuries, and that each community was given the power to raise the tax to any limit it chose, or to prohibit liquor-selling altogether. We have now obtained, through the courtesy of its author, Mr. William W. Harper of Chicago, a copy of the Illinois law, in which the principle of each community receiving the full benefit of its own liquor tax is more specifically applied than it is in Ohio. The words of the law are that "it shall not be lawful for the corporated authorities of any city, town, or village in this State, to grant a license for the keeping of a dram-shop except upon the payment, in advance, into the treasury of the city, town, or village granting the license, such sum as may be determined by the respective authorities of such city, town, or village, not less than at the rate of $500 per annum." Each community is given the power to raise the tax to any limit it chooses, and so many communities have availed themselves of this to raise it to the prohibitory limit that, according to the Chicago Tribune, "prohibition has been so generally established by rural communities that it is now the rule over two-thirds of the soil of the State. In thirty or forty counties scarcely an open saloon exists."

The strict enforcement of the Sunday Liquor Law is an excellent thing as a lesson in politics both for the public and the police. It will do much to put a stop to what we may call bunkum legislation—that is, legislation intended to please good people and do bad people no harm, of which there is a great deal. Mayor Hewitt is proving beyond question that a really prohibitory Sunday law cannot be enforced—paradoxical as it sounds—by enforcing it. That is, by showing how much vigilance is needed to enforce it, and what violence rigid enforcement does to the habits of large bodies of decent men and women, he shows that permanent rigid enforcement is impossible. The police could not permanently supply the needed vigilance, and the people would not permanently furnish the amount of acquiescence and submission which is necessary to make even consummate vigilance effective. A few Sundays more of the same sort as the last will probably bring about a more practical state of mind about the liquor question in this city than we have had for many a day. The lesson of the experiment is that absolute legislation about liquor is out of the question—that is, legislation which treats all consumption of alcoholic drinks as a crime, either on one day or seven days of the week. In other words, we may and ought to regulate, but we cannot prohibit, and, therefore, ought not to try.

The new Governor of Washington Territory has had a chance to show what sort of man he is, and he stands the test well. A few days ago fresh trouble with the Chinese was threatened at Seattle, the worst elements of the white population having resolved to drive out the "barbarians." Governor Semple promptly telegraphed to the Commander of the Territorial Militia, ordering him to have his force in readiness to assist the authorities in maintaining the laws, and his manly stand at once restored order. The Post-Intelligencer, the leading newspaper of Seattle, "congratulates the Democratic party on producing a man of such metal, and the Territory upon the good fortune of having such a Governor to appeal to for direction when the honor of the Territory is imperilled." Such a tribute is the only commentary needed upon the recent diatribe against the President for his appointments in Washington Territory from Delegate Voorhees, a disappointed spoilsman.

The question whether the "fall in prices" that has been witnessed during the past fifteen or twenty years is due to a short supply of gold in the commercial world, or to improved means of production and transportation, has received a pretty thorough examination, in the Quarterly Journal of Economics, at the hands of Prof. J. Laurence Laughlin. With great volubility the bimetallists have advanced the idea of an insufficiency of gold to sustain prices, and have gained the adherence of some who are not bimetallists, notably Mr. Goschen, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Giffen, the statistician of the British Board of Trade. The greatest service rendered by Prof. Laughlin in this discussion, as it seems to us, is to be found in the appendix to his article, in which he presents the various tables of prices that are relied upon by the bimetallists to establish their thesis that general prices have fallen. This is the foundation of their argument. If general prices have not fallen, the whole superstructure comes down. It is shown that there is a very wide disagreement both in the manner of constructing these tables and in the results reached by them. The differences are so glaring as to suggest the inquiry whether there is any such thing as "an average of general prices." Undoubtedly we may take a given number of articles, and find out whether a hundred dollars will buy more or less of a given number of pounds and yards of each of them than the same money would buy ten years ago. But if some articles have fallen and others have risen in price, this proves nothing. If, furthermore, the fall of some and the rise of others can be traced to causes other than the gold supply, then the labor spent in tabulating them has been wasted, for all purposes of argument upon the monetary question.

The tables oftenest quoted and most relied upon are those of the Economist, which have followed for a long series of years twenty-two articles, mostly raw materials, leaving out of view everything else that enters into human consumption and traffic. Three of these articles are cotton of different kinds. Of course two of them ought to be left out, and this correction would reduce the number of articles to twenty. Moreover, the Economist does not take into account the relative importance of articles, or the quantities that enter into ordinary consumption. Indigo, for instance, counts for as much as wheat in making up the average. Another authority in the manufacture of tabulated prices gives to wheat the power of 18 as against 1 for indigo, and the latter is much more philosophical in his treatment of the subject than the Economist. Again, the Economist deals only with British prices, leaving the rest of the world out of the reckoning. One of the tables given embraces a list of twenty-three articles of general consumption and traffic in the commercial world which have shown no tendency to fall in price. Among these are such staple commodities as beef, cheese, oats, brandy, and silk. As to those which have fallen, the greater part have been subjected to influences clearly definable, such as cheapened processes of manufacture and transportation, which account for their fall in price without the necessity of looking into the gold supply, or the book of fate, or a pack of cards to determine the causes of the phenomenon. These facts have been brought to the attention of Mr. Giffen and Mr. Goschen before, but they have observed a studied silence respecting them. Mr. Laughlin's presentation is rather more thorough than any former one, because he attacks the tables themselves and knocks their heads together most effectively.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, May 4, to TUESDAY, May 10, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

THE National Civil-Service Commissioners have submitted to the President amendments to the civil-service rules, and he has approved them. They are almost as important as the original rules. The principle of competitive examination will now be applied to promotions in the executive departments, and ultimately in the Government service generally. On May 5 the annual meeting of the New York Civil-Service Reform Association was held in this city, and Mr. George William Curtis was reëlected President. The report of the Executive Committee expresses regret "that Mr. Hans S. Beattie continues to occupy the position of Surveyor at this port. Extensive information, constantly reaching us, shows that the system of administration pursued by him is seriously to the detriment of the public service, and that no proper conduct of the office is to be anticipated as long as he remains its incumbent."

The Inter-State Commerce Commissioners, having finished hearing petitions and explanations in the Southern cities, on April 5 separated for a few days and each went to his home. Commissioner Schoonmaker, to remove popular misapprehensions about the law and the functions of the Commission, said at Pittsburgh on the 7th: "It should be remembered that the business of the country is no longer in the hands of the railroads. The business men should remember that the new law is in the nature of an emancipation to them. On the other hand, the law is not a dictation against the railroads, but against the abuses on them. . . . I do not think the new law is injurious to the interests of the Pacific Slope. The greatest clamor heard of comes from California. There is nothing in the law to prevent any one in the East from making rates to the Pacific Coast, or the reverse, provided they do not ship to intermediate points at higher rates. The law was passed so as to help business and do away with abuses. Now it seems that there is a disposition on the part of some of the people to try and make capital out of the law itself in their pressing demands for special provisions." It is reported that much transcontinental traffic is going by the Canadian Pacific Road. A bill has been introduced in the Canadian Parliament embodying some of the provisions of the United States law. The most important provision is that no railroad company shall charge for carrying freight a short distance a greater rate than for carrying the same class of freight a longer distance. Complaint has been made to the Commission on behalf of the Rev. William H. Council of Huntsville, Ala., a colored Methodist preacher, who paid first-class fare, but was ejected from a regular coach. The Commission is asked to decide whether a discrimination on account of color by an inter-State road falls within the prohibition of the law.

Secretary Whitney has decided to order the repair of the United States steamer Hartford now at Mare Island, Cal. A sentimental interest is felt in this ship because it was Farragut's flagship.

The Kentucky Democratic Convention, at Louisville, on May 5, nominated Gen. S. B. Buckner for Governor, James W. Bryan for Lieutenant-Governor, P. W. Hardin for Attorney-General, Gen. Lafayette Hewitt for Auditor, and Richard Tate for Treasurer. A resolution was adopted full of praise of Mr. Cleveland's Administration, but the platform contains a warped plank about civil service reform. Mr. Carlisle presided over the Convention.

Mr. Charles James Faulkner of Martinsburg was elected United States Senator from West Virginia on May 5, to succeed Mr. Camden. He is a son of the Charles James Faulkner who was appointed Minister to France by President Buchanan, and was arrested and imprisoned in 1861, charged with disloyalty to the Union.

The Connecticut House of Representatives passed a uniform high-license bill May 6, fixing the fees for a full license at $400 and the fee for beer license at $150.

The Committee of the New York Legislature which has been investigating the conduct of the officers of Brooklyn and Kings County has recommended in its majority report that a number of them be removed for corruption in office. The minority report declares that the charges are not proved by the evidence.

Gov. Hill of this State has approved the Saturday Half-Holiday Act, which will make Saturday afternoons, after May 20, legal holidays.

Gov. Hill has vetoed the bill passed by the New York Legislature providing for the election of members of a convention to change the State Constitution.

The Excise Law of New York, which prohibits even the serving of liquor by hotel proprietors to their guests on Sunday, had not been enforced in this city for a great many years, until last Sunday. It was the "dryest" day in New York that has come for a long time. Eighty-eight persons were arrested for selling liquor. It is the almost universal expectation that Mayor Hewitt's enforcement of this law will cause its modification, at least so as to make the serving of liquors at hotels lawful.

A call has been published for a State Convention of the United Labor Party in New York to nominate candidates for the next State election, and the Convention is to sit at Syracuse on August 17. One article of the creed which is printed with the call is, that taxes shall be levied only on land-values.

A party of about 100 Hungarian laborers have gone from the coke region near Connellsville, Pa., to Hungary to spend the five or six months during which they think their strike will last, because they can go and return and live cheaper during that time than by staying in Pennsylvania.

Paul Grottkau, the Anarchist, who made incendiary speeches in Milwaukee a year ago when there was a riot there, has been sentenced to one year at hard labor in the House of Correction.

At a meeting on May 5 of the Third Army Corps Union in this city, Gen. Sickles introduced a resolution, which was unanimously adopted, calling for a meeting of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the Potomac and of the Army of Northern Virginia (Confederate) on the battle-field at Gettysburg, on July 1, 2, and 3, 1888.

The grand jury at Haverhill, O., has found indictments for murder in the first degree against the four men named McCoy (one of them is a saloon-keeper), who killed Dr. Northrup because of his activity against liquor-selling. A murder for a similar cause is reported from Jackson, Miss. James S. Hamilton and three other men killed Roderick Gambrell, who was the editor of a temperance paper. The temperance people in Mississippi are greatly excited by the murder.

Two large manufacturers of barbed wire, Schnabel & Co. at Deering Station, and Sherman & Marsh, at Grand Crossing, Ill., have failed with liabilities amounting to $755,000. The Inter-State Commerce Act, which abolished rebates on heavy barbed wire shipments and enabled other firms shipping by water to sell cheaper, is given as the chief cause of these failures.

In central, northern, and northwestern Texas there was a heavy rainfall May 9 and 10. This is the second rain since May 1. The crop prospect is greatly improved. There will be a largely increased acreage for cotton and corn.

Earthquake shocks were felt on May 3 and the day following from Texas to California and in Mexico. At Sabinal, N. M., which is one of the old settlements in the Southwest, many ancient adobe buildings were shaken down. At the town of Bahispe, in Sonora, Mex., an unverified report is that 150 persons were killed. Recent records of earthquake shocks show a general disturbance from one end of Mexico to the other. A subsequent shock was reported in the San José Mountains, forty miles south of Fort Huachuca, in Sonora. The regions of the greatest disturbance, both in Arizona and in Mexico, are so far from telegraph stations that the topographical changes made by the shocks are not yet known. Unverified reports of volcanic action have come from settlements near all the mountain ranges within the disturbed area.

At the one hundred and nineteenth annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York on May 5 a letter was read from M. Bartholdi, who, in the name of the French delegation which came here when the Statue of Liberty was set up, presented to the Chamber some Sèvres vases as an expression of thanks for the Chamber's hospitality.

The corporators of Clark University to be established at Worcester, Mass., met May 4 and elected the founder, Mr Jonas G. Clark, President, and ex-Attorney-General Charles Devens, Senator George F. Hoar, and ex-Congressman W. W. Rice Vice-Presidents. They will proceed at once to erect buildings so that the first class in the new university may be admitted on the first Monday in October, 1888. Mr. Clark announced his purpose to give another million dollars (he had already given $1,000,000), and expressed his wish that the institution be kept beyond the reach of partisan influence and sectarian bias, and that the courses of instruction should be made to embrace as wide a range as possible of theology, philosophy, science, literature, and art.

John Fitzgerald, President of the Irish National League of America, recently submitted the London Times's facsimile of the alleged Parnell letter, together with documents in the handwriting of Richard Pigott, formerly proprietor of the Dublin Irishman, who some time ago tried to blackmail officers of the League, to a committee, consisting of the Governor, the State Treasurer, and the State Auditor of Nebraska, and the Mayor, the Postmaster, and the cashiers of the banks at Lincoln. This committee has expressed the opinion that the Parnell signature was written by the same hand that wrote the blackmailing letters.

William O'Brien, the editor of the United Ireland, arrived in New York May 10 on his way to Canada to make an agitation against Lord Lansdowne for his treatment of the tenants on his Irish estates. He was enthusiastically received here by his political friends. A deputation of citizens waited on Mayor Howland of Toronto, May 10, and presented a requisition for a public meeting to consider the advisability of prohibiting Mr. O'Brien from speaking in that city. The Montreal Gazette on May 10 warned him that if he insults the Governor-General he does it at his own risk. It says: "The Governor-General stands to us in the place of the Queen. We are bound in honor to protect him against such insult—bound by the strongest of reasons—self-respect and national pride. To insult him is to insult not only the Queen's representative, but Canada and the people of Canada, whose Viceroy he is. Mr. O'Brien is assuming a very serious responsibility. As a landlord we have nothing to do with Lord Lansdowne. The people of Canada are not all Irish, and they have rights that should be respected. We greatly fear that if Mr. O'Brien persists, he will provoke feelings of a totally different order from those which, in his rash design, he contemplated."

Queen Kapiolani of the Hawaiian Islands was entertained at dinner at Washington by the President, and has visited Boston, where she received attentions from the Mayor and many distinguished citizens.

Mr. W. C. Depauw, a plate-glass manufacturer of New Albany, Ind., and one of the richest men in the West, died at Indianapolis May 5, aged sixty-five. He had been generous to several educational institutions. Another man of means who used his riches generously to further educational work was Mr. Oliver Hoyt, who died from injuries got by a fall last week from his carriage. He did business in this city and lived at Stamford, Conn. Robert McKim, a rich banker and philanthropist of Madison, Ind., died May 9. He gave the money for the establishment of the McKim observatory of Depauw University.

Gen. Aaron Fletcher Stevens died at Nashua, N. H., May 10. He was a Brigadier-General of Volunteers in the Union Army.

The House of Commons has occupied itself almost wholly for a week discussing the Times-Dillon incident. Mr. Gladstone's motion to appoint a committee to inquire into the Times's charges against Mr. Dillon was rejected by a vote of 317 to 233, and Sir Edward Clarke's motion that the House decline to treat the Times's publication as a breach of privilege was agreed to. Mr. W. H. Smith's proposition that the Attorney-General should prosecute the Times on behalf of Mr. Dillon has been hooted by the Liberal members. The ill-management of the Tories in this whole matter seems to have given the Parnellites the advantage, in spite of the denial of a committee of inquiry.

After the long delay caused by the discussion of the Times-Dillon incident, the House of Commons, May 9, again went into committee and took up the Irish Crimes Act. An amendment to the effect that magisterial inquiries into cases of alleged crime under the bill be conducted in public, was rejected by a vote of 188 to 131. Progress was made only by the application of the closure rule. A discredited report was published on May 10 that the Government will make an excuse to imprison all the Parnellite members, in order to hasten the progress of the Crimes Bill. On May 10 an amendment to the effect that a person committed for contempt of court be treated as a first-class misdemeanant was rejected, as well as another amendment to limit the penalty for contempt in the case of witnesses to seven days' imprisonment.

An informal meeting of the Cabinet was held on the same day to discuss plans for expediting the passage of the Coercion Bill. It was decided to abandon the attempt to effect a wholesale application of the closure rule at a fixed date. The Ministerialists think that the discussion on the Coercion Bill in committee will last three weeks longer.

Mr. Gladstone's having Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Lord Mayor of Dublin, Mr. Justin McCarthy, and other Irish politicians to dine with him May 7 is commented on as an evidence of the cementing influence on the Liberals and Parnellites of the Times-Dillon incident.

The Court of Queen's Bench at Dublin has decided that the arrest of Mr. Dillon by police inspectors for receiving money under the plan of campaign was lawful.

An application has been dismissed for the release of Father Keller, the priest of Youghal, who is imprisoned at Dublin for refusing to testify regarding his connection with the plan of campaign.

The coercionist cause has received a rebuff in Birmingham. In the newly elected Liberal Council a resolution was adopted condemning coercion, which was practically a vote of censure of Mr. Bright's conduct, who has unofficially expressed his willingness to resign.

It was first made known on May 6 that Sir Henry Holland, Secretary of State for the Colonies, announced in the Colonial Conference in London on April 27 that the Government hoped to arrange with France for a joint Naval Commission for the government of the New Hebrides. This statement amazed the members of the Conference, and all the Australians deprecated any policy which even seemed to recognize French pretensions in the New Hebrides. The Conference has approved the proposal to lay a cable between Vancouver and Australia, and expressed its favor of an extension of the Queen's present titles to "Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, Ireland, and the Colonies and all Dependencies thereof, and Empress of India."

A congress of English-speaking Roman Catholics will meet in London shortly, chiefly to discuss questions growing out of the labor agitation. Cardinal Manning is the leading spirit in the movement.

The American Exhibition in London was formally opened May 9 with an attendance of about 7,000 persons. "Buffalo Bill's" Wild West show proved to be the most attractive feature to a great many visitors.

James Grant, the English novelist, died May 6. Sir William Young, ex-Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, died at Halifax, May 8. On May 9 Samuel Cousins, the famous English engraver, died, aged eighty-six.

The performance of Wagner's "Lohengrin," at the Eden Theatre in Paris, was made the occasion of anti-German demonstrations by a mob. A crowd assembled near the theatre while the performance was going on and shouted "Down with Wagner!" "On to Berlin!" and similar cries. A number of youths were arrested, and other performances of Wagner's productions were postponed. On May 4, the mob marched to the residence of President Grévy and cried out against Germany. These incidents have excited little comment at Berlin. It was reported on May 7 that three German spies had been arrested near Nancy, and that the German Government had strengthened its detective force to watch suspected Frenchmen.

A bill drawn by Gen. Boulanger to provide for a mobilization of the French Army in the fall has provoked serious comment at Berlin.

The Leipsic Supreme Court has prepared an indictment against the persons arrested for connection with the case in which the French Commissary Schnaebelé was implicated. The indictment covers all the evidence in detail collected during several months, and it is said to be as much against France as against the prisoners.

The United States Treasury Agent sent to Aix-la-Chapelle to inquire into the causes of undervaluations of exports has been put to great annoyance, most of the manufacturers refusing to answer his questions. European prices are of little value for use in America, because all European countries make cheaper prices for exports to America than for goods to be sold in Europe, and the Germans alone cannot change the system.

The duty on imported cattle has been increased by Belgium. Its effect will be to increase the duty on all fresh meat from fifty to sixty per cent.; and it is predicted that it will cause great popular discontent, and it may bring about the defeat of the present Government at next year's elections.

Boissières Frères, ship-owners of Havre, have opened a semi-monthly service between that port and Montreal. Six vessels of 4,000 tons will be run.

The steamship La Champagne, from Havre to New York, on May 8 near the French coast came into collision with another steamship. In the panic that followed, several Italian emigrants were drowned. The steamer was badly damaged and was beached.

The Russian duty on iron and steel and on articles manufactured therefrom has been increased.

The Russian Ambassador to Berlin has presented to the Emperor an autograph letter from the Czar assuring him of Russia's continued friendship.

The Russian Government has prohibited the sale of a drama by Count Tolstoi entitled "The Powers of Darkness," which was written for general circulation.

The Pope and the Czar are negotiating through a noble Lombard monk with a view to the reunion of the Greek and Latin Churches. As the Pope is willing to let the Greek Church retain its own manner of worship, it is expected that the negotiations will be successful.

Troops have been sent to take position along the line of railway to be travelled by the Czar when he visits the Don Cossack capital, so that the entire route will be guarded. He has invited the King of Denmark, the King and Queen of Greece, the Queen of Servia, the Prince and Princess of Montenegro, and the Duchess of Edinburgh to be his guests on the journey. The Czarina has given 100,000 rubles to Gen. Gresser, Prefect of St. Petersburg, in recognition of his services in frustrating the recent plot against the Czar's life, and the Czar has granted him a pension of 6,000 rubles as a reward for his services in arresting Nihilists.

Herr Nordenfeldt has made arrangements to sign a contract with the Hungarian Government for the establishment of a factory at Pesth for the manufacture of small arms, and to guarantee the delivery of 400,000 rifles in two years.

A hot sirocco blew all last week through Hungary, parching vegetation and rendering it inflammable. At Toroczko 300 houses, many houses at the village of Meregyo, and all the churches and public buildings at Eperies, were burned. A number of people perished, and the loss of property is reported to be not less than $2,500,000. Emperor Francis Joseph has sent $5,000 for the relief of the victims of the fires.

In the Spanish Congress the question of home rule for Cuba has been formulated and discussed. A threat was made by home-rule members on May 10 that they would cause an agitation for annexation to America if their demands were not granted. It is reported that the Carlists are aiding the Home-Rulers to organize an outbreak.

The Spanish Government has authorized the formation of a coaling station on the Red Sea, with the idea of founding a settlement. The attention of several of the Powers has been attracted by this announcement. The Italian Government has asked Spain for an explanation, and it is reported that the site of the station had already been claimed by Italy.

Mr. Henry M. Stanley, with his expedition for the relief of Emin Bey, arrived at Bauza Mundeka, Congo, March 29. He took a route by way of Stanley Falls for Emin's camp.

The mineral exhibition which was to have been opened at Lima October 1, 1887, has been postponed until July 29, 1888, by the Peruvian Government, because the preparations cannot be finished this year.

On May 2 an explosion in a shaft of a coal mine at Nanaimo, B. C., entombed and caused the death of more than 125 miners. A large proportion of the families in the town lost their bread-winners. There was hope of rescuing some of the imprisoned men for several days, and during that period business was suspended and nearly the whole population assembled near the pit. The Canadian Government will be asked by the members from British Columbia for a grant towards relieving the wives and families of the killed.

THE PACIFIC COAST AND THE COMMERCE ACT.

The Sacramento Record-Union finds the Inter-State Commerce Act not only a bad kind of protective tariff, but extremely bad politics, so far as the Pacific Coast is concerned. "Protection of A in America," it says, "in his industry, as against the products of the industry of B in a foreign land, is one thing, but the protection of A in Ohio at the expense of B in California, both being citizens of a common country, with the right to trade freely between the States, is a very different thing. It means divorcement of sympathy, commercial estrangement, and possible political dismemberment." Possible political dismemberment is a pretty hard word. It is probably meant to be no more than indicative of a necessary weakening of political ties when any section of the people think that their pecuniary interests have been unjustly sacrificed, or their rights wantonly trampled upon.

Looking at the state of things created on the Pacific Coast by the multiplication of transcontinental lines of railway, and the competition among them for through traffic, we do not see how the long-and-short-haul clause of the Commerce Act can possibly be maintained as to that coast. It must be remembered that we have to deal not with the California that the miners made, but with one that we have made; not with Pacific Coast industries as they existed prior to 1869, when commerce and production conformed to the ancient lines of traffic via Cape Horn and Panama, but with one altogether different. We have put a lot of forces in train which have transformed the face of the country and changed all the currents of life. We have induced, nay required, the people of the Pacific Coast to build the fabric of their industry over in order to fit it to speedy communication with the older parts of the country, and at very low cost. Now we enact a law to deprive them of the low rates of transportation which form an integral part of their business, and which they enjoy by virtue of natural causes, and without harm to anybody else. Can we wonder if intense dissatisfaction is the result?

Attention has been drawn to the absurdity of the long-and-short-haul clause of the Commerce Act by the new schedules of rates adopted by the Canadian Pacific Railway. These rates are fixed just low enough to take the business, but are in every case higher than the rates prevailing before the Commerce Act went into effect. It is true that the Commissioners have suspended the operation of the act temporarily, but the apprehension that it may come in force again has led to the making of time contracts, by virtue of which large shipments are now making over the Canadian road at equal rates with those offered by our own lines. But there are certain kinds of freight, as, for instance, fresh fruits, that cannot be carried so great a distance without spoiling. These require the most rapid means of transit, without which, indeed, the industry must come to an end. In California and Oregon this is a great branch of industry, and no other is growing more rapidly.

Now, the spectacle offered to the eye of the business man—and most Americans are men of business — of the traffic of the Pacific Coast going around through a foreign country in order to reach American markets, and paying at the same time higher rates of transportation than our own railroads would be glad to make, is too absurd to hold the stage very long. We might, through a stern sense of duty, like that of Abraham offering up his young son Isaac, sacrifice the California fruit trade outright, but to see our business carried off by the Canadians over a longer line than any of our own, and at greater cost, will move the national sense of humor to a degree. What has happened in this particular is exactly what ought to have been expected. The Canadian Pacific has one terminus on Puget Sound and another on Lake Superior. It stretches practically from all points on the Pacific to all points on the lakes. A little more coal is required to get the goods to and from its terminus than on our own lines, but on the other hand it costs a great deal to keep hands and machinery idle. The Canadian road can afford to burn a little more coal at the two ends of its route in order to keep itself fully employed along its whole course. It was just as certain that the Commerce Act would cause the result now witnessed, i. e., the transfer of American traffic to the Canadian Pacific Railroad at higher rates than those heretofore prevailing, as that a stone thrown upward will come down. If Mr. Reagan or any other Congressman fancied that merchants would, on grounds of patriotism, pay two dollars for an article that could be had for one, he is probably now undeceived.

The Commerce Act allows the Commissioners to suspend the operation of the long-and-short-haul clause in any particular case. They have suspended it as to the transcontinental lines for a period of seventy-five days. They will have to suspend it again at the expiration of that time, and they might better suspend it altogether than do it piecemeal, since shippers will naturally prefer a route which they can depend upon, rather than one which may be closed to them at the end of a few weeks.

THE COMPOSITION OF THE TRADES-UNIONS.

We gave some account, a short time ago, of the diverting performances of the Illinois Bureau of "Labor Statistics," as set out in its Report for 1886. The volume is full of entertaining matter, though intended by its authors to produce nothing but serious reflection. The figures collected by Commissioners in the state of mind in which the report indicates these gentlemen to have been when preparing their work, are not likely to be very reliable; but on some points which they approach without any theory in their heads, they probably have come as near accuracy as anybody could. The result of their inquiries into the nationality of the members of the trades-unions, and into that of the Knights of Labor, is especially interesting, as throwing some light on a question which has both social and political importance, and which a great many people have been asking with some anxiety during the late labor troubles—namely, the extent to which native-born Americans are wrestling with the labor problem by means of strikes and boycotts.

According to the Report, there are in Illinois 54,247 members of trades-unions. Of these, 21 per cent. are Americans, 33 per cent. Germans, 19 per cent. Irish; English and Scotch together, 10 per cent.; Scandinavians, 12 per cent., and Poles, Bohemians, and Italians, about 5 per cent. The Americans are mostly found in the railroad service, in the cigar manufacture, in the iron-moulding and gas and steam-fitting trades. The Germans are mostly bakers, brewers, bricklayers, masons, carpenters, cabinet-makers, coopers, furriers, harness-makers, metal-workers, and wagon-makers. Curiously enough, however, hardly any of them are found among the sailors on the lakes. The Irish abound in the railroad service, especially the freight-handling, and among the bricklayers, stone-masons, plasterers, butchers, seamen, salt-workers, and printers, but make no great figure as hod-carriers; the Germans strange to say, having secured the lion's share of that calling. The Scandinavians, as might be expected, furnish most of the sailors on the lakes; "the hollow oak" is still their favorite abode.

The Report finds a very platitudinous but probably correct explanation of the paucity of the Americans in the trades in the disinclination of the American to settle down for life in any one calling, and in his strong desire to escape at the first moment from all manual labor properly so called, and engage in clerical work or "trading," in which, partly through education and partly through inherited quick-wittedness, he has a decided advantage over foreigners. He has, too, they might have added, a decided reluctance to engage in prolonged disputes, like strikes, over any business matter. His disposition is to drop quickly what does not seem likely to turn out profitable, and try something else—a trait which the directors of fraudulent banks and railroads find to their advantage, because it prevents the embittered legal pursuit to which they are sometimes exposed in England. The American stockholder, when he finds himself duped or betrayed, always prefers "selling out" to fighting. The American mechanic exhibits the same peculiarity. He does not care for an occupation in which he has to keep striking to get his due.

The fact which the Illinois Report brings out, however, that the Americans constitute 45 per cent. of the members of that more miscellaneous body, the Knights of Labor, of whom there are 33,544 in Illinois, is probably correctly explained by the Report in saying that, "though the order is really composed in the main of working people who have a common interest in maintaining wages, the more universal bond is doubtless the promotion of certain measures of public policy upon which men may readily unite who would have no status in a mere trades-union." The notion that wage-earners "have a common interest in maintaining wages," is of course as absurd as are a great many of the Commissioners' notions. It cannot be each man's interest that every other man should be highly paid. They might as well say that all consumers had a common interest in keeping up prices. But it is doubtless true that a large proportion of the American Knights look on the organization as something in the nature of a political party like the Grangers. We saw something of the same kind in this city last fall, when thousands undoubtedly voted for Henry George who had no sympathy with his land theories, for the simple purpose, as they thought, of protesting against "Machine rule" and breaking it up.

"THE RULE OF HONOR."

A LETTER from an "Anti-Gladstoneite" Englishman, in the Evening Post of Saturday, is interesting in many ways, but principally as an illustration of the queer twist, as we consider it, which the anti-Gladstoneite mind in England has undergone, through its excitement over the Irish question, and on which (as illustrated in the case of Lord Hartington) Mr. Gladstone, in his speech before the Eighty Club, commented with much severity Lord Hartington, who throughout this crisis has been posing, in the eyes both of friends and foes, as a model English gentleman, has accepted two current Tory assumptions. One is, that all charges printed in the Times have to be treated with respect, because of the generally high character of the paper and large amount of capital dependent on its maintaining this character. The other is, that an offer to prove it in a court of law, and a refusal to produce proof of it anywhere else, is all that can be asked of an honorable man who makes a charge against private character.

The demand made on behalf of the Times we shall not discuss. It will be received with a smile everywhere out of England, and everywhere in England outside anti-Gladstonean circles. The Times is a very respectable newspaper, but the reverence of Englishmen for it is one of the amusing local superstitions. It would be more amusing if it were not that it is part and parcel of the glamour which surrounds anonymous journalism in all countries where it exists. The truth is, and it is a truth which is very clear when stated, that the Times is just as honorable and as wise as the editor, a young gentleman named Buckle, until a year or two ago quite obscure, and as the chief proprietor, an elderly gentleman named Walter, neither of them in any way elevated above the rest of the community in character or talents. If the claims made for the Times on the trust and confidence of the community, when making passionate attacks on the private character of political opponents, were made in behalf of Messrs. Buckle and Walter, as they ought to be, they would convulse people with laughter.

But this opens a field of discussion on which we do not propose to enter now. What most interests us is the notion, that the offer of Messrs. Buckle and Walter to prove the authenticity of the Parnell letter in a court of law is the only offer they are bound to make, and justly leaves Parnell, pending its acceptance, under suspicion. This, we say, is a complete reversal of the rule of honor, in fact a complete novelty in the ethics of gentlemen, as Mr. Gladstone intimated in the speech to which we have already referred. It is a notion which probably has grown out of the importance attached in most disputes about property or crime to what is called "legal evidence," and which, in Anglo-Saxon countries, lawyers are apt to talk of, and laymen to accept, as if it were the only evidence with which the human mind is competent to deal. The truth is, that it is not evidence at all in the full logical sense; or rather it is evidence which in Anglo-Saxon countries is greatly restricted in order to adapt it to the capacity of jurors. The law of evidence is mainly a body of rules intended to prevent certain facts from getting before juries which they would not be competent to weigh, and the judge is charged with the enforcement of these rules. Hence great importance has come to be attached by lawyers, and people who live much with lawyers, to evidence being "legal" in order to give it value. Many of them have recently held that even a legislative inquiry, such as that which took place in the matter of the Aldermanic "boodle," should only have been pursued through "legal evidence," as if the affairs of life, either in politics or business, could possibly be carried on without constant disregard of the rules of legal evidence by everybody who attempts to make any plan for the future, or form a working judgment about either persons or things.

The respect for "legal evidence" leads naturally enough to the idea that a court of law is the only place in which a charge can be examined, and its truth or falsehood ascertained. The truth is, however, that a jury is really, as everybody knows, everywhere an indifferent tribunal for the investigation of any charge against character. But a trial at law gives both of the parties the power to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents, and gives the proceeding the superintendence of a judge, which makes it, especially for all complicated transactions requiring a great deal of proof, in a large number of cases the best available method of investigation. There would, for instance, probably be no better way of examining the charges made by the Times, in the articles entitled "Parnellism and Crime," against the whole Irish party, than through the Select Committee of the House of Commons, which has been refused, although the charges have been steadily used by the majority in debate to discredit the Irish members.

But the Parnell letter is a different matter. Here the question is simply whether a signature of Parnell's is genuine or not. The body of the letter is not in his handwriting. In the intercourse of all honorable men in civilized countries, a man's repudiation of a signature imposes on the person who offers it as proof against him, the burden of at once giving his reasons for believing it to be genuine. If the accuser says he will not produce them now, but next spring, or next fall, and in the meantime continues to use the signature for the detriment of the alleged signer, he is among gentlemen all over the world, so far as we know, considered a scoundrel. This is, in fact, the reproach to which Messrs. Buckle and Walter lay themselves open. Their offer to produce their proofs in a court of law if Parnell will bring a suit, is an offer to produce them next autumn or next spring on the expenditure by Parnell of some thousands of pounds. No such suit as is proposed could be tried before next November at the earliest. It would probably not be tried before next February or March. In the meantime the imputation on Parnell's character as a man and a politician would have done its work. Suppose A were a candidate for a place of honor and profit, and the appointment was to be made in July, and B, a rival or enemy, were to produce a letter with a signature resembling his, revealing complicity in a disgraceful transaction, and the candidate repudiated it, what would be said in any company of gentlemen to the holder of the letter who answered, "How this letter came into my hands, to whom I suppose it to have been addressed, and what are my reasons for thinking A wrote it, or for disbelieving his denial, I decline to state. He can sue me if he pleases, and then I will tell all, some time next winter. In the meantime I will act and talk precisely as if he had acknowledged it to be his—that is, as if the very highest proof of its genuineness were in the possession of the public"?

We venture to say that few, if any, men living in decent social circles ever had an experience of this kind, except with a blackmailer or confidence man. Most men who had such an experience would, if in good health, at first blush be disposed to treat the case with a cudgel—all the sooner if B cried out that he knew the letter was genuine because the writer was such a bad man. The whole affair of the Parnell letter is, in fact, as disgraceful an incident as has ever occurred in English politics—as disgraceful to "journalism" as to society.

QUESTIONS FOR THE JUBILEE.

LONDON, April 21, 1887.

AT the centre of that curious fabric of laws, customs, and institutions which we call the English Constitution lies a mystery. The unknown element of political life in England is the Crown. Parliament, as Bagehot has pointed out, has inquired into many things, but no committee has ever sat, or, while the Constitution lasts, will sit, to inquire into the conduct of the Queen. To an English monarch is ascribed by law not only real irresponsibility, but fictitious sovereignty. One result of this has been little noted. As every act of state is done in the royal name, and as in many acts of state the Queen has no more personal concern than has, say, the Archbishop of Canterbury, no one really knows what, if any, are the matters really determined more or less in accordance with the royal will. Hence, no one, except a few statesmen who know the innermost life of the court or the best-kept secrets of the Cabinet, can with any certainty determine what have been the acts, the feelings, or the influence of the lady who has nominally ruled England for half a century. But if you do not know a person's actions or sentiments, you do not know his character. The veil which shrouds the official life of the Queen has also, in spite of the self-revelations afforded by her books, also concealed from public view much of her own personality.

At some future day Victoria will, no doubt, be as well known to historians as is George III. But, for the moment, she is less fully known to her subjects than any other person who has played a part on the stage of political life. Of her conduct and wishes there are and always have been rumors. Hints are dropped that she likes one Premier or dislikes another. It is whispered that her personal intervention facilitated the passage of the last Reform Act, and it is hinted that she favored a policy which was near bringing England to a war with Russia. But to outsiders like myself—and almost every Englishman is an outsider as regards secrets of state—these reports remain rumors and nothing more. They may rest on the highest authority, but the "highest authority" is a personage on whose word no man of sense would risk a penny. The apparent publicity of political life in England makes us forget the reserve maintained by statesmen of all parties with regard to the mysteries of the Cabinet, and no Cabinet secret is so sacred as secrets affecting the Queen.

Hence, when England is just about to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of Queen Victoria's accession, there are a host of questions about the Queen to which intelligent curiosity would desire an answer, but which hardly admit of a satisfactory or certain reply. Three of these inquiries occur to me as worth a few minutes' consideration. Is the Queen popular? What, to judge from history, has been her capacity as a ruler? What influence has her character had on the constitutional history of England?

The popularity of the Queen is, of course, in one sense past a doubt. To whatever part of Great Britain she goes, she is certain of a warm welcome from her subjects. Were she to visit the colonies she would be received with enthusiasm, and (though your readers are on this point far better judges than I) her appearance in the United States would, I conjecture, be welcomed with rapture by all classes of Americans except your Irish citizens. Nor is this personal popularity to be deemed a small thing. It is the result of a life which has, in the eyes of the English people on both sides the Atlantic, been felt to be entitled to respect. Since the death of Queen Anne no occupant of the English throne has commanded as widespread respect among the English people. William IV. was for a short time the "patriot King," but for that brief period he was the hero of a party, and when he ceased to be applauded as a reformer he did not gain any wide esteem with the nation. Of George IV. there is no need to say anything. His father, no doubt, commanded a kind of influence which has never fallen to Queen Victoria. The "good old King" was a real power, but by a large party he was at all times hated. His two predecessors were to the English people unattractive foreigners. Flattery itself would have hesitated to call them popular, lest servility should be mistaken for irony. But when one has allowed to the full for the importance and rarity of general esteem gained by the display of private virtues, the inquiry still remains, whether the Queen is popular in the sense in which a ruler is so called whose wishes have, because they are his wishes, weight with his people.

Would it, for instance, affect the public fortunes of a statesman that he was supposed to have spoken disrespectfully of the Queen? Would the public knowledge of the Queen's personally favoring or opposing the cause of home rule greatly strengthen the hands, as the case might be, of Mr. Gladstone or of Lord Salisbury? The more carefully a critic meditates upon the uncertainties of public opinion, the more doubtful will be his answer to these inquiries. In matters which touch the Queen personally, large classes would, it may be suspected, feel that her wishes ought to command deference. What might be her influence on the results of a doubtful political contest, no man would venture to predict. We here approach a subject to which the attention of your readers has more than once been called in your columns. If Englishmen are in the dark about the character of their nominal sovereign, they are equally in the dark about the character of their real sovereign, namely, the mass of the electors of Great Britain and Ireland. What do the artisans, what do the agricultural laborers, think about the Crown? Are they irritated by the expensiveness of a court, or do they, as Mr. Bagehot seems to have suspected, admire the showy parts of the Constitution? At the present moment, the question has a purely speculative interest. It may within half a century become of pressing importance. Government by Parliament does not fascinate popular imagination as much as it did when Parliamentary government (which is rather a different thing from government by Parliament) was longed for by all Continental Europe as an escape from all the evils of despotism. And it is at least conceivable that in England a king might at times represent the feeling of the electors better than a House of Commons distracted and weakened by the rivalry of parties which, like the groups in the French Chamber of Deputies, seem each to be just strong enough to prevent the creation of a permanent Government, with power to carry on the affairs of the nation with dignity and consistency. It is pretty clear that, during the reign of Queen Victoria, the problem as to the possible influence of the Crown will, happily for the nation, remain a purely academic inquiry. But whoever could fathom the true sentiment about the Queen now prevailing among the mass of the people, would possess a clue to guide him towards the path which English politics will pursue under her successors.

If any one ask of any ordinary Englishman what has been the Queen's capacity as a ruler, he would probably receive the reply that she has fully performed the duties of a constitutional sovereign. This answer is true enough in itself, but most of the persons who use the well-known formula that the Queen fulfils the duties of a constitutional monarch, hardly realize to themselves exactly what the formula means in the mouth of a modern Englishman. Its real significance is, that the Queen, in the opinion of the speaker, has conformed loyally to the advice of ministers, or, in other words, has shown herself at all times prepared, irrespective of her private feelings, to carry out the policy suggested by the men who had most influence in the House of Commons. How far this has really been the case no one, as I have already pointed out, can know for certain; but, assuming that the general estimate of the Queen's conduct is sound, it implies rather more than people generally realize as to her capacity. It shows that, unless she be endowed with a kind of self-control which is of itself a most rare quality, she must have been a person not very keenly interested in the great party questions of the day. It implies, also, a capacity for acquiescence almost inconsistent with moral or intellectual originality or resource. Englishmen have now made the discovery, when it is too late to be of much practical use, that, had the Queen resided half as much in Ireland as she has lived in Scotland, she might have conferred a great benefit on the nation. This idea, which has dawned on Englishmen with characteristic slowness, was grasped more than sixty years ago by that clever voluptuary George IV. It is difficult to suppose that Her Majesty resisted ministerial suggestions that she should visit Ireland; but it is not unfair to infer, from her own course of action, that she did not perceive the importance of making royalty at least popular with the Irish people. In other words, she has not shown in this matter either acuteness or the possession of what may be called individual initiative. But, though a capacity for acquiescence which must have greatly facilitated the performance of many constitutional duties, is almost inconsistent with high talent, the discharge for fifty years, amid general approval, of the functions allotted to a constitutional ruler proves the possession by the Queen of a great deal more of character and judgment than falls in general to the lot of hereditary monarchs. When matters go smoothly, everybody assumes that it is easy to preserve habitual smoothness. But the old saying that, though there is but one way of doing a thing rightly, the ways of doing a thing wrongly are infinite in number, has a very wide application. The Queen has avoided mistakes, and to have avoided mistakes—that is, to have done the right thing at the right moment—is itself a sign of a very special talent. In one matter, moreover, and in one only, Queen Victoria has displayed originality. She has come forward as the exponent of that sympathy with misery and pity for calamity which is the marked moral characteristic of the age. The letters in which the Queen has expressed her sympathy with persons whose calamities have attracted public notice, have probably done more to spread the legitimate popularity of the Crown than any other act for which she can be called personally responsible.

From no monarch who has sat on the English throne does the Queen differ more essentially than from each of the two women with whom her name is most naturally associated. Yet it is, I think, something more than a fancy that Queen Elizabeth, Queen Anne, and Queen Victoria will each be judged by historians to have rendered, in very different degrees and by very different methods, one and the same service to England. They each have facilitated the passage of the country through a difficult period of transition. The truth of this remark in the case of Elizabeth is certain. When she began her reign, the forces of Protestantism and Catholicism were nearly balanced; when she died, the contest between the two was ended. The singular compromise between the two contending powers embodied in Anglicanism was too firmly established to be in the long run overthrown either by the Papacy or by the Puritans. Queen Anne presided over the transition from a monarchical to a constitutional system of government. The presence of a Stuart on the throne suspended the activity of the Jacobites, and smoothed over the difficulties which might well have hindered the union with Scotland. Queen Victoria ascended the throne within a few years after the Reform Act had undermined the aristocratic system of government without establishing a democratic constitution. Each year which has since then elapsed has brought us nearer and nearer to a pure democracy. The transformation from aristocracy to democracy is now all but complete. That it has been accomplished peaceably, by degrees—almost, one may say, imperceptibly—is certainly due in a measure to the fact that the transition has taken place when, by the good fortune of England, we have had on the throne, not a king in whom acquiescence might have seemed wanting in dignity, but a Queen who could let the powers of the Crown be lessened or effaced without sacrificing any claim to respect. THE LOUISIANA LOTTERY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your paper of the 28th of April, you indicted the whole people of Louisiana, and there are two counts in your indictment:

(1.) The large number of saloons alleged by the Prohibitionists, who will not help the temperate and sensible people to pass the high-license law.

(2.) The Louisiana Lottery reëstablished by the Constitution of 1879.

Will you permit me to place the responsibility for the lottery where it belongs, and that is, on the Republican party? The Constitution of Louisiana of 1845, article 116, and that of 1852, article 113, prohibited lotteries and buying and selling lottery tickets, and from 1845 to 1864 it was a criminal offence in Louisiana to draw a lottery or to buy or sell a lottery ticket. When Gen. Sheridan, with the aid of his Federal soldiers, forced on the people of Louisiana, under the Reconstruction Act of the Republican Congress, the Constitution of 1868 and the Warmoth government, this prohibition was repealed, and among the first acts passed by the Republican Legislature, elected and held in power by Federal bayonets, was an act to incorporate the Louisiana Lottery Company for twenty-five years. During the whole term of Republican rule in Louisiana, from 1868 to 1877, the will of the people of Louisiana was suppressed by the United States Army, which was sustained in its action by the Republican party of the nation, and no effort was made to repeal this charter.

A Democratic Legislature in 1879, Act 44, repealed the charter of the lottery company, and made it a penal offence to buy or sell lottery tickets in this State. The same Legislature called a constitutional convention. The Hon. Edward C. Billings (a New England Republican, a graduate of Harvard, appointed United States Judge by President Grant), on a bill in equity filed by the Louisiana Lottery Company, held that the charter of the lottery company was a contract between it and the State, and the act of 1879, repealing the charter and making it a crime to buy or sell lottery tickets, was in derogation of the Federal Constitution and void; and he enjoined the sheriff, the police, and all State officers from enforcing in any way this criminal statute of the State against the Louisiana Lottery Company or its servants and agents (see 3d Wood's Reports, page 222).

Many people were thus made to believe that the Federal power in the hands of the Republican party would maintain the lottery company in spite of the State law abolishing it. While the injunction was in force, the Constitutional Convention assembled with about 132 members, of which 30 were Republicans. When the lottery article was before the Convention, on a motion to strike it out the votes stood 59 to 59, absent 14. Every Republican voted against the motion to strike out except one, who was absent, and he, on the last and final vote for its adoption, was present and voted for it. On the third and last vote to adopt this lottery article, which reëstablished the Louisiana State Lottery as a contract granted in 1868 and prohibits all lotteries after 1895, the vote recorded 71 ayes, among whom was every Republican except two, and they were absent, and every man of the 52 who voted against the article was a Democrat without exception. An effort was made to allow the people to take a separate vote on this lottery article, and that was likewise defeated by Republican votes. If, therefore, the Republicans had been equally divided, or nearly equally divided, on the lottery article, it would have been defeated. A large majority of the Democratic members of the Convention invariably voted against it.

One clause of the charter of the lottery company, which exempted it from State and municipal taxation, has been recently upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States as a contract, the obligation of which cannot be impaired by the State. (See New Orleans vs. Houston, 119th United States Reports, 265, decided 6th of December, 1886.)

Under these circumstances, I submit that neither the present State Administration nor the people of Louisiana can justly be held responsible for the existence of the lottery.—Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. R. Forman.

THE COLOR LINE IN MISSISSIPPI.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In a Mississippi court now in session, a negro teacher was indicted for obtaining money on false pretences, viz., reporting more pupils and more teaching days than he had a right to do. The counsel for the defence was a negro; opposing counsel and all the jury were white. The negro won his case.

That same negro lawyer had a case to-day with a white lawyer as associate counsel.

What a pity, for the negro's sake, that Cleveland was elected! Æ.

THE KENTUCKY STATE CONVENTION AND THE PRESIDENT.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Kentucky State Convention which has just met is perhaps deserving of some notice, as being the first of a series which will take place before the next national Convention. It is interesting, not from any doubt which hangs over the result, but as expressing with tolerable clearness the attitude of Kentucky Democrats towards the altered conditions of public affairs. In a State as completely withdrawn from the influence of new, elevating ideas as Kentucky undoubtedly is, in a State in which the voice of the younger generation is either silent or lost in the ancient Bourbon chorus, it is curious to note that men still realize, however vaguely, the advent of a new order of things. The interest in the Kentucky Convention, in a word, revolves around its attitude toward the President.

I think I do not overstate the case when I say that no man of eminence in Kentucky has committed himself unequivocally to the Mugwump idea in politics; and in saying this I do not except even Mr. Carlisle, who has, as far as I know, never announced his position on the matter in perfectly unambiguous language. On the contrary, our Congressmen and Senators are notoriously opposed to it. Kentucky is perhaps not wholly to blame for this; its teachers have treated it very ill, the teachers from whom it deserved better things. The mossback reigns in unquestioned supremacy, and the Courier-Journal is the accepted idol of the large mass of the Democratic party. Let us give the devil his due: it has vigorously applauded the firm stand of the President against paternal government; his pension veto; his tariff-reform utterances. But, on the other hand, it is besmirched with the taint of every corrupt monopoly in the State, and has disseminated an idea which has done more to brutalize politics and repel the intelligence of the country than any other agency that could be named. It has maligned and maliciously misrepresented the whole civil-service-reform idea; it has congratulated us on every bad appointment the President has made, provided only a Republican gave way to a Democrat; it has insidiously striven to undermine the President, while conscious of atmospheric indications that point to his renomination; and, finally, it keeps at Washington a correspondent who worships at the shrine of the immaculate Higgins, and snarls at the President like an enraged and disappointed cur.

And the platform of the Convention reflects just this state of things. Its endorsement of the President ignores the cardinal feature of his policy; its civil-service declaration is as absurd as ingenuity could make it. And yet, after all—and this is the thing to which I wish particularly to call your attention—the omen is good when a Kentucky politician who still glories in the music of the words "Jeffersonian" and "Jacksonian," realizes that the President, despite the slight resemblance he bears to those now largely mythical heroes, must be renominated. This was clearly the sense of the Convention. They may agree with him or not; they may understand him or not; but they recognize and admit his strength, notwithstanding the fact that it is hard to make his actions harmonize with their traditional notions of a real Democratic President. This recognition strikes me as extremely important; it is, we sincerely hope, the first step towards the comprehension and absorption of his ideas.

WOLSELEY AND LEE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Notwithstanding the comparison suggested between Wolseley and Boulanger, I do not believe that Gen. Walker would maintain that the English soldier whose high reputation and position have been solely the result of professional success, was to be compared with the military politician who has leaped into notoriety by means of the French War Office.

It is hard to differ from so able and courteous an opponent as Gen. Walker, but we should probably not fully agree as to the condition of McClellan's army at Westover, or as to that of Burnside at Fredericksburg, however much we might discuss the question. In his last letter Gen. Walker supports his view of the case by disparaging the testimony of men eminent in the civil and military history of the United States, whose statements were not "opinions," but descriptions of facts by eye-witnesses, or derived from such.

But the point is not there. Lord Wolseley, in an article devoted mainly to other matters, in speaking of the imperfect organization of the American armies and their untrained staffs, referred to Westover and Fredericksburg as instances where these faults prevented Lee from obtaining the full fruits of his success. Lord Wolseley's estimate of the situation is pretty much the same as that, say, of Gen. Hooker in the one case, and of, say, Gen. Palfrey in the other. Gen. Walker takes a different view, and thinks Lord Wolseley wrong. Not only so, but he thinks Wolseley has blundered so inexcusably in following such guides that he speaks of his article as trash unworthy of any one above the grade of subaltern, and of his military criticisms as silly, empty, and vain.

Now, the point Lord Wolseley is illustrating—viz., the defects in organization and especially in the staff service of the armies of both North and South—is one upon which Gen. Walker probably does not differ very widely from Lord Wolseley. These defects were the natural result of the lack of military training among our people. West Point and the other military schools could supply but a small part of the training and experience needed for the thorough management of large armies suddenly called into existence. The remainder had to be got by actual practice in the field. Our armies were therefore very deficient in some respects at first, but improved as the war went on. I entirely agree with Gen. Walker that the former soldiers of both armies should resent unworthy imputations upon the "valor, discipline, and endurance of American soldiers, North and South," but it does not seem to me that Lord Wolseley has made such an imputation. At the first battle of Manassas the ammunition for some Confederate batteries had, in the absence of caissons, to be carried on common farm wagons. I should not think a reference to this clumsy makeshift a reflection upon the Confederate Ordnance Department, nor does the statement of the fact that both sides often suffered during the war from the inexperience of an untrained staff seem to me a disparagement of either of the contending armies.

A word to your Chicago correspondent. I re gret that I should have done anything to "irritate" a gentleman who informs us that he has become a "sincere admirer and warm friend of the people of the South," but I submit that "E. O.'s" irritation proceeds from some confusion of ideas or of dates. Both "E. O." and myself are now citizens of the United States, and have one country, but it was not so twenty-five years ago. After the beginning of the civil war, Gen. Lee's country was the Confederate States; and when the war ended, he had until his death no other status than that of a Confederate prisoner of war on parole. We doubt whether at that time "E. O." considered Gen. Lee his countryman. In discussing Lee's career during the war, it is proper, therefore, to speak of the South as his country, and of ex-Confederates as his countrymen, in a sense very different from any in which these terms could be used of the whole Union. The connection in which these expressions occur in my letter might have shown "E. O." the indelicacy, if not impropriety, of giving them a wider meaning. I have no doubt that many Americans in the North are "proud of Gen. Lee's splendid talents and still more splendid virtues," but I do not believe that the North is willing to adopt Wolseley's estimate of Lee, or that it will do so during this generation. It would, therefore, have been improper to have extended to the whole country a statement which is true enough of the South—even if by so doing one might have avoided irritating "E. O." W. ALLAN.

COEDUCATION.—A STRAW.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The friends of collegiate coeducation have never claimed, we believe, that it is the best method of education for all women, or that it is yet an ideal system. They have asserted that it has its place as well as the separate college for women, and that, as the majority of these latter colleges have been carried on, the tendency of coeducation has been to make women, not of necessity better, but more scholarly. It is at least a significant fact that since the opening of Bryn Mawr College two years ago, the twelve fellowships that have been awarded have without exception been given to graduates of coeducational colleges. It would seem to indicate that until a recent period it has been difficult for a woman to gain as thorough training in a separate college as in one established exclusively for men, and that therefore the urgent petitions of women that the doors of men's colleges should be opened to them have not been wholly unreasonable.—Respectfully, M.

TRANSFORMATION OF SURNAMES.—FINALLY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Last year a young Italian was employed on a farm in this neighborhood. His name was James Fun. On being questioned about his odd surname, he said that in Italy the name of his family was Fano, but soon after his arrival in the United States "the boys" where he worked, hearing him say that he "wished to be American in everything," advised him to change his surname to Fun. He seemed to be proud of the name as of a badge of true American citizenship, and said he should always "go by it." T.

NEWBURGH, April 18, 1887.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have been much interested in reading several letters in the Nation relating to the transformation of names. Some years ago I had occasion to look up the history of a family whose names had been changed in a most singular way, as it seems to me. About 1641 a German named Rahmsauer settled in North Carolina. Some of his descendants afterwards removed to Georgia, then to Alabama, then to Mississippi, then to South Carolina, then to Tennessee, then to Arkansas, then to Louisiana, and finally to Texas, where some of them are now living, near Ft. Worth. I found that in something more than two hundred years the family name had undergone the following changes: Ramsauer, Ramsaur, Ramsour, Ramseur, Ramser, Ramsir, Sirram, Ram, Sheep, Lamb.—Respectfully, C.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Thanks to your correspondent who has answered a question that has been a puzzling one for so long—why the family of Darby, who gave its name to the Darbytown Road that crossed the fields of the Seven-Days' Battles around Richmond, should have spelled their name Enroughty. And, as Winchester, Mass., has told us how M. L'Arrivée has translated his name to Cummings, let Winchester, Va., too, add to the record which the Nation is making on this subject.

An intelligent French stone-mason, when asked how a Frenchman came to be named Betters, explained that in his native country, Canada, his name had been Le Mieux. C. L. C. M.

WINCHESTER, VA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of April 21, 1887, you cite the remarkable instance of the family name of Enroughty being called "Darby." As a native of Henrico County, Virginia, in which the Enroughty families have lived for generations, I can give you the local explanation of the anomaly. It is related that the first Enroughty who settled in Henrico County became so incensed and resentful at the mispronunciation of his surname—some calling it Enruffty, others Enrooty, and others again Enrowty—that he insisted, whenever spoken to, that he should be called "Darby." It is not stated that he told or was aware of the reason (that his family belonged to the sect called Derbyites) mentioned by the learned divine to whom you refer. Whatever the origin of "Darby," the family has ever been tenacious of the name of Enroughty and equally tenacious of the name of "Darby," and if a stranger should happen to call any of them by any name other than that last given, he would immediately be requested to say "Darby." In all writings, bank accounts, and poll-books—indeed, wherever it is necessary to write the true name—it is spelled Enroughty, but invariably pronounced "Darby." We read, in official reports of the operations of Grant's and Lee's armies below Richmond, of "the battle of Darbytown," but, in truth, the locality was Enroughtytown.

Respectfully yours, GEO. SAVAGE.

Notes.

THE second volume of the Rev. H. W. Foote's 'Annals of King's Chapel' is in the press of Little, Brown & Co., Boston. Meantime from the same firm we have the beautiful volume, 'The Commemoration by King's Chapel, Boston, of the Completion of Two Hundred Years since its Foundation, on Wednesday, December 15, 1886. Also, Three Historical Sermons.' All the arts that go to the making any book good of its kind have been employed here, on a not unworthy occasion. The parish of King's Chapel has stood on the same spot for seven generations, and embraces descendants of a subscriber to the first building two centuries ago. In that long interval it has gone over from Episcopacy to Unitarianism, and it would be hard to anticipate the judgment of a Puritan of Andros's day as to which service was the more abhorrent. The memorial volume is very interestingly illustrated with portraits of provincial Governors, ministers of the church, old views of the Chapel, etc.

The publication of Mr. J. E. Cabot's biography of Emerson is, as Houghton, Mifflin & Co. announce, postponed till the autumn.

Novels being in season, G. P. Putnam's Sons will bring out '7 to 12,' by Anna Katharine Green, and 'Told at Tuxedo,' a series of tales by two writers; Henry Holt & Co., 'Miss Bayle's Romance,' an English tale of a Chicago girl, "with American revisions"; Lee & Shepard, 'Drones' Honey,' by Sophie May, who has hitherto written for a juvenile audience.

Mr. Frederick A. Stokes has bought out the interest of his partners in the late firm of White, Stokes & Allen; a new book-publishing firm, C. W. Moulton & Co., has been established in Buffalo; Dr. Daniel G. Brinton retires from the editorship of the Medical and Surgical Reporter of Philadelphia, but will not abandon medical journalism.

"He" and "She"; or, A Point of Honor,' by Mrs. Annie Edwardes, just published by G. W. Dillingham of this city, is an old book issued with a new name—doubtless for the purpose of taking advantage of the popularity of Rider Haggard's 'She.' It was first published a dozen years ago with the title 'A Point of Honor.'

The Messrs. Appleton are issuing, for their Spanish-American trade, a series of books on zoölogy, for primary schools, under the title "El Reino animal para niños." It must have been an oversight that they allowed their editor to print the following (we translate): "Animals are sometimes likened to different people. Porfirio Diaz, on account of his custom of weeping to cover up his evil deeds, is compared to the crocodile, and it is said that his tears are like those of this fierce and deceitful animal." The prospect of a large Mexican sale for this volume would not seem to be bright.

White's 'Selborne,' Raleigh's 'Discovery of Guiana,' and Macaulay's essays on the 'Earl of Chatham,' are the latest additions to Prof. Morley's "National Library" (Cassell & Co.).

A well-conceived 'Vacation Journal: A Diary of Outings from May until November, with Hints and Information for Tourists,' is sent us by A. D. F. Randolph & Co. The information includes the calendar, the moon's phases, the signal-service flags, postal rates, a dictionary of flowers according to their season, the laws of lawn tennis, etc. Poetical selections usher in each day. The volume is daintily got up.

The well-known work of Karl Marx, 'Das Kapital,' has been translated into English and is published here by Scribner & Welford. Although spoken of in Europe as "the Bible of the working classes," it might better be compared with the Talmud. It is incredible that more than one workman in a thousand, even among the German Socialists, should have read it through, to say nothing of understanding it; and when we consider that these two volumes constitute but a third of the whole work, it seems probable that its doctrine must always remain of a highly esoteric character. The platforms of the "Labor" party embody the more practical of Marx's conclusions; as to the premises from which they are derived, so far as they have a logical derivation, they are obtained by confounding capital with money, and assuming that men would risk their accumulations without any expectation of profit.

Marx was not without wit, and his scurrility diffuses a certain lurid light over his otherwise dreary pages. Those who are curious concerning his life and his disciples may be referred to three letters, by the late Friedrich Kapp, which appeared in vol. xxvii of the Nation, pp. 81, 95, and 114.

The Rev. Samuel Orcutt, an indefatigable writer of town histories, offers as his latest production a 'History of the Old Town of Stratford and the City of Bridgeport, Conn.' In nearly 1,400 pages he has brought together a great mass of material in a rather confused and fragmentary form, but relating to nearly everything of interest or importance in the town. There are biographical sketches of all the early settlers and the more prominent citizens down to the present time, as well as valuable lists of the inscriptions in the various graveyards. The last 300 pages are devoted to genealogies, for which the editor acknowledges his indebtedness to the labors of the Rev. B. L. Swan. Stratford originally included the city of Bridgeport and the towns of Huntington, Trumbull, and Monroe, accounts of all of which are given in this work. That of Bridgeport is largely made up of descriptions of the various manufactories of the place, which read almost too much like advertisements for a history, and considerable space is also naturally given to the enterprises of Mr. P. T. Barnum. There are numerous portraits, of the marked American type, illustrations, and plans, and an excellent index. A word of praise should also be given to the typographical execution of this work, which is far above that of most of its class.

Dr. Wilhelm Bernhardt is editing for D. C. Heath a series of 'German Novelettes' (Deutsche Novelletten-Bibliothek), designed to furnish a convenient supply of short material for rapid reading by those who have mastered the elements of the language. The form is convenient, and the notes will be appreciated; but it is a pity that the publishers reconciled themselves to type at once Gothic and of so trying a size.

The license of book-auctioneers in mixing lots sometimes leads to unpleasant juxtapositions. We have before us a "Catalogue of a Portion of the Libraries of the late Rev. Convers Francis and his Sister, Lydia Maria Child, . . . together with Selections from Another Private Library." Scattered through this are a number of erotic titles, of the class euphemistically known to the trade as "Facetiæ," and which could be quite unerringly picked out as derived from "Another Private Library." But is it fair to the reputation of Mrs. Child and her brother to leave room for the suspicion that their collections contained such disreputable publications?

A circulating library of music has been undertaken in connection with the Brooklyn Library, and has proved to meet a real want in that music-loving community. Its composition and working are described by Mr. W. A. Bardwell in the Library Journal for April.

A pleasing portrait of Mrs. Cleveland serves as a frontispiece to the Magazine of American History for May, and accompanies an article by Mrs. Lamb on the successive ladies of the White House, as many of whom as possible are pictured. A girlish likeness of Mrs. Cleveland is also given in the Photographic Times for May 6, and it has not only the charm of youth and beauty, but a peculiar interest as a very successful example of "process engraving." We do not remember any portrait so well rendered as this by purely mechanical lines.

A. Battistella reviews, in a late number of the Milan Perseveranza, a translation of selections from Walt Whitman's verse by Prof. Luigi Gamberale ('Canti scelti di Walt Whitman: Versione e prefazione.' Milan, 1887). We judge from this notice that Gamberale's admiration of the American bard is tempered by a recognition of his shortcomings, but that his reviewer has an even juster sense of the true state of the case. The translation is praised.

The Perseveranza, by the way, which has, we may be permitted to think, fallen off in literary interest since Bonghi was at the helm, has begun publication of a supplementary Rivista Scientifico-Letteraria, in quarto form. In the first number Prof. Cognetti De Martiis introduces with approval to the Italian public Henry George's 'Protection or Free Trade'; an anonymous writer compares Tennyson and Gladstone, apropos of the new 'Locksley Hall' and the ex-Premier's comment on it; Tolstoi and Dostoyevsky are the theme ably presented by "I. B."; Prof. G. Cattaneo discusses "The New Biology"; there is a short story by Memini, etc.—a well-assorted and entertaining table of contents, meriting a more ambitious typography.

That delightful journal of folk-lore and mythology, Mélusine, so ably conducted by H. Gaidoz and E. Rolland, is rounding its tenth year, not, however, without a suspension, which accounts for its being only in its third volume. Last year there sprang up beside it the Revue des Traditions Populaires, organ of the Société des Traditions Populaires. It bears on its pink cover a Mother Goose summoning her flock, and this symbol, somewhat curtailed, accompanies the regular news item concerning the monthly dîner de "Ma Mère l'Oye." It would be hard to draw a line between the matters appropriate to the Revue and to Mélusine, and we can only hope that the competition of the newer periodical does not injuriously affect the pioneer.

It is well known that the privilège for the creation of the Opéra Français was granted in 1671 to the poet Perrin and the musician Cambert and their associates. It has always been believed that they were fraudulently despoiled of this privilège in 1672 by the composer Lulli. Now it seems to be established that in reality the privilège was fairly bought by him. The March-April number of the Revue Historique contains the information that MM. Charles Nuitter and Ernest Thoinan have discovered in the National Archives and those of the Prefecture of Police, and in the études of various notaries, all the documents necessary to complete the history of the foundation of the Opéra in the seventeenth century, and the part taken in it both by Perrin, who was constantly in debt and in prison, and by Lulli, who, it would now seem, has been unjustly accused of robbing him of it for the past 200 years.

The Faculty of Letters of Lyons is about to begin the issue of a Bibliothèque for the publication of independent works, instead of the Revue which it has issued for two years past. The works announced as in press are 'Neuchâtel et la politique prussienne en Franche-Comté 1702-1713,' by E. Bourgeois; 'La Chanson de Roland, traduction archaïque et rythmée,' by L. Clédat; 'Correspondance et mémoires inédits de M. de Biran,' by A. Bertrand.

The tenth, eleventh, and twelfth fascicules of the 'Causeries d'un ami des livres,' by M. L. Derome, have just appeared, thus completing the work, which now forms two very handsome volumes. A short time ago we gave a full account of the earlier numbers of this publication upon the original editions of the Romantiques. The three last published are entitled: 'Michelet et la décadence de l'histoire romantique'; 'L'aile droite de l'école romantique'; 'Eclectiques et Romantiques.' There is also a curious appendix devoted to the lost or suppressed works of Alfred de Musset.

M. Ferraz has recently published the third and last volume of his 'Histoire de la philosophie en France au xixe siècle' (Paris: Perrin). This volume is entitled 'Spiritualisme et libéralisme.' An idea of its extent and direction may be obtained from the following names, which are placed by the author upon the title-page for that purpose: Mme. de Staël, Laromiguière, Maine de Biran, Ampère, Royer-Collard, De Gerando, Cousin, Jouffroy, Guizot, Ch. de Rémusat, Adolphe Garnier, Émile Saisset. The first volume of the work was 'Socialisme, naturalisme et positivisme,' the second, 'Traditionalisme et ultramontanisme.' Only the octavo edition of the last volume is published as yet, but the others are issued also in 18mo.

The large folio edition of the 'Récits des temps mérovingiens' of Augustin Thierry, with the fine illustrations of J.-P. Laurens, which has been published by Hachette in numbers, one récit at a time, is well known. The same house has now issued another edition in a single quarto volume, in which the original designs are reproduced by the Poirel process. This process softens and, as it were, throws a slight veil over the reproductions, while it preserves fully the character of the originals. The Revue Historique praises the "scrupulous archæological exactitude" of the designs, and also their "sentiment profond de l'histoire et des mœurs mérovingiennes."

The veteran Belgian scholar, Kervyn de Lettenhove, has recently published the fifth volume of his 'Relations politiques des Pays-Bas et de l'Angleterre sous le règne de Philippe II.,' quarto (Bruxelles: Hayez). The present volume embraces the first part of the administration of the Duke of Alva (September, 1567–September, 1570).

The Harvard Summer School of Physics will open at the Jefferson Laboratory on July 12, if there is a demand for it. To determine this demand, or to obviate it, a pamphlet 'Descriptive List of Experiments in Physics' has been issued, to indicate the course contemplated for admission to Harvard on elementary experimental physics. This is the first practical step towards aiding the preparatory schools to fulfil a very difficult task. Application for admission to the proposed school should be made to Dr. E. H. Hall, 5 Avon Street, Cambridge, Massachusetts.

—We have expressed so much admiration of M. de Laveleye's 'La Péninsule des Balkans' (Nation, No. 1112), and have so warmly recommended it to our readers as a guide in the intricate field of East-European ethnography and politics, that we shall not be suspected of fondness for carping if we emphatically object to the manner in which it has been introduced to the English public ('The Balkan Peninsula,' translated by Mrs. Thorpe and published in America by G. P. Putnam's Sons). Passing over the inflated title-page, we must condemn the translation as most hastily and carelessly done, and unworthy of the original. Evidently the translator's knowledge of either language was not at fault, but she probably had to do her work too rapidly to allow reflection or revision. That the book was "edited and revised for the English public by the author," of course implies no close examination and comparison of phrase after phrase, and it surely was not the Belgian economist's task to correct verbal errors or to establish rules of English transliteration. He very likely only examined the work "in its new form" to prevent its being distorted in sense and tenor in the process of reducing the two volumes of the original narrative to the compass of the present one. We would fain grant "a lenient judgment in the matter of transliteration, upon which scholars are little agreed," but how could we excuse such a medley of English, French, and barbarous forms as we find pressed together (on pp. 141, 142, 291, 300) in speaking of the Wallach race; "Valaks," "Valaques," "Wallacks,"

"Tzintzars," "Tzintzares," "Wallack Tzintzares," "Valaque Tzuntzares"? The compound forms stand, besides, for Tzintzar Wallachs (Fr. "Valaques-Tzintzares"). Of otherwise inaccurate or unidiomatic renderings we may point out, in a few connected pages opened at random, "The Slavonish-Brod," for Slavonian Brod, or Brod-in-Slavonia (p. 72); "buffaloes and sheep," as translation of "des troupeaux de buffles et de chèvres" (p. 75); and the sentences beginning with "The saddle" (p. 70) and "Shepherds" (p. 75). And yet, even in this version, the book is well worth reading, rereading, and possessing. An additional chapter by the author, on "The Present Position of Bulgarian Affairs," and a fine map of the Balkan Peninsula, enhance its value.

—The Rev. Prof. B. B. Warfield, D.D., late of the Theological Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., and now of Princeton, has recently published in the series of manuals known as "The Theological Educator," instituted by the editor of the Expositor, 'An Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament' (New York: T. Whittaker). The author intends his treatise as "a primer to the art of textual criticism rather than to the science," and as preparatory to the fuller works on the subject, such as Dr. Hort's 'Introduction' and Dr. Gregory's 'Prolegomena to Tischendorf.' There is room for just such a work, for Dr. Hort's 'Introduction' is hard reading, and some students may be repelled by it. Prof. Warfield's little book consists of 225 pages, small octavo, divided into four chapters, which discuss the matter, methods, praxis, and history of criticism. Of these, the second, comprising nearly one-half of the book, is the most important, and is a working over, in a more popular and attractive form, of Dr. Hort's 'Introduction,' Part 2. Those who are familiar with Prof. Warfield's paper on "The Genealogical Method," contributed to Dr. Schaff's 'Companion to the Greek Testament and the English Version,' will find a fuller exposition of this method in the present work, and especially a clear treatment of mixture in manuscripts, which causes so much trouble in the effort to sift readings and to determine the text of the autograph. Excluding the Syrian text—that of most of the cursives, and hence of the so-called Textus Receptus—as it "was made by a revision out of the other three classes, and preserves nothing from antiquity not already in them," the Neutral and the Alexandrian texts are now arranged "as two great sub-classes of a greater class, including them both and standing over against the Western," which last is "the most corrupt of all known forms," while the Neutral is the most correct and the Alexandrian holds an intermediate position (pp. 158–160). It will thus be seen that the author is a follower of Dr. Hort. The last chapter may be characterized as very meagre, and Prof. Warfield might have enlarged it to advantage. Also, the subdivision of the chapters into paragraphs, with distinctive headings, and the addition of an index, would have facilitated the use of the book.

—George Cabot Ward, who died on May 4, after a long illness, was born in Boston sixty-three years ago. He was the son of Mr. Thomas Wren Ward, who more than seventy years ago came from Boston to this city, and, with his relative, the late Jonathan Goodhue, founded the firm of Goodhue & Ward, afterwards so well known as Goodhue & Co. In 1817 he returned to Boston, and ten years later became the American agent of Baring Bros. This agency was exclusively conducted by him until his death, when it devolved upon his son, Mr. Samuel G. Ward. George Cabot Ward was graduated at Harvard, and subsequently studied at Heidelberg, and, after a voyage round the world in a sailing ship, a rare experience in those days, settled in New York and founded the firm of Ward & Campbell, afterwards known as Ward, Campbell & Co. It contained at one time one of the Baring family, but was never, as has been stated, the agent of Baring Brothers. Mr. Ward withdrew from it in 1869, to share with his elder brother, Samuel Gray, who had moved to this city from Boston, the Baring agency, which continued in their hands until George Cabot's illness, when both brothers surrendered it, in January, 1885. George Cabot was, when the war broke out, in 1861, one of the most active and energetic supporters of the Government in this city. He was one of the founders of the Union League Club, its President for one term, and its Treasurer until the decline of his health. He was also one of the Governors, and, we believe, Treasurer, of the New York Hospital, Treasurer of the American Freedman's Aid Society, one of the trustees and most devoted and valuable friends of the Children's Aid Society, and a Director of the Bank of Commerce and of the Union Trust Company. In fact, he was one of the men who are always ready "to pay with their person" for any worthy public object, and, although of a singularly modest and retiring, and one might almost say self-distrustful, disposition, had trusts and responsibilities imposed upon him without stint. He was a man of extraordinary simplicity of character, and had a rare capacity for devotion to the interests of his friends as well as those of the public. His reading was very extensive, and his love of speculation in the field of transcendental philosophy often gave an air of quaintness and abstraction to his conversation which made one wonder that a business life in this city should ever have been to his taste. He took a great interest in the establishment of the Nation in the year 1865, and perhaps had more to do with putting it on a firm financial footing than any other one person. The memories of the war made him a very good Republican down to his last illness, but in no way diminished his sympathy with all efforts in the direction of purer politics. His death deprives New York of one of her most valuable citizens, and one of a type which the existing conditions of business do not foster either in politics or in society.

—The Bibliothèque Universelle et Revue Suisse for April contains the first of a series of "Études de littérature américaine," by M. Remy de Gourmont. The writer has begun these studies at the point which offers the greatest difficulty to a stranger to the country and its people, with "L'humour et les humouristes," which is the subtitle of his article. Irving, Haliburton, and Holmes are the writers examined in the present paper, with much moderation and fairness of temper, but with the inevitable failure to seize just the right shade of character and of expression which sometimes makes the observations of foreign critics such very amusing reading. M. Édouard Sayous, who wrote for his thesis for the doctor's degree in 1866 "La France de Saint Louis d'après la poésie nationale," has returned to his early affections in "La Croisade de Constantinople," which was begun in the Revue for March. The learning and research in these papers are carefully concealed, and it must be a very matter-of-fact person indeed who would not be carried on to the end by the easy and picturesque narrative. The profane in such matters do not always enjoy Villehardouin and the other chroniclers whom M. Sayous has here condensed for their benefit, and the most frivolous student in these scientific days is ashamed to absorb the Middle Ages through the romances of Walter Scott as the happier reader of the past once did; but perhaps the thought of the less entertaining work of M. Sayous in the Revue Historique may reconcile such a one to the enjoyment he cannot help finding in this "Croisade de Constantinople." Among the other noticeable articles is the second and concluding part of M. Honoré Mereu's "Destruction de Rome"—that is, its renovation now in progress. In this the writer is more generous to the renovators than his title would imply, though he is by no means sparing in his blame of either the Roman municipality or its critics, of whom the most violent could not be more severe in their judgments than M. Mereu shows himself at times.

—The Société de l'Histoire du Protestantisme Français has been publishing in its Bulletin during the present year a series of documents accompanied by notes in regard to the burial of Protestants in Paris in the last century. These transcripts are the more valuable inasmuch as the original registers from which they were taken perished at the burning of the Hôtel de Ville. For some years after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes it appears, from a contemporaneous account, to have been the custom to bury Protestants, both natives and foreigners, "dans les champs," the bodies being taken out by night and put where a place could be found for them. At length, in 1726, permission was granted for Protestant foreigners who died in France to be buried in certain designated places under strict police surveillance. Among the last who were buried in conformity to this decree was Commodore John Paul Jones, a certificate of whose burial is given in the March number of the Bulletin. From this and the accompanying notes we learn that at the meeting of the National Assembly, July 19, 1792, the day after his death, a letter was read from his friend Col. Blackden, to the Commissioner of the Police of the district in which Jones had died, asking that he might be buried without expense, "in consequence of a formality yet existing with respect to Protestants." This letter excited much indignation in the Assembly, and a member cried out, "I demand that in order to consecrate the freedom of religion the Assembly send a deputation to the funeral of Paul Jones," a proposition which was immediately adopted. Twelve of the Assembly, including the notorious Bishop Gay-Vernon and a priest, escorted by a detachment of the gendarmerie, attended the burial, which took place the next evening at eight o'clock.

—The funeral of Józef Ignacy Kraszewski, the Polish novelist and miscellaneous writer, which took place a few weeks ago in Cracow, was accompanied by as fervid and general manifestations of sympathy on the part of his compatriots as those which characterized the celebration in the same city, in the autumn of 1879, of the semi-centennial anniversary of the opening of his literary career. In fact, both celebrations were political demonstrations, but half-disguised. The admiration of Kraszewski as an author is universal among Poles, it is true with varying degrees of intensity. He is by far the most prolific of Polish writers, and the 500 volumes of novels, novelettes, historical and travelling sketches, poems, etc., etc., which have flowed from his facile pen have served to amuse, enlighten, and educate two generations; but none of his works is really classical, and Polish literary history will assign him a place below such names as Krasicki, Niemcewicz, Mickiewicz, Slowacki, or Krasinski. It was the indefatigable worker in the interest of the Polish nationality who was glorified at Cracow by myriads of patriotic enthusiasts from all parts of ancient Poland and elsewhere, both in 1879 and 1887. The demonstrations differed only in this, that the first was directed against Russian oppression, which drove Kraszewski into voluntary exile in 1863, and the second against Germany, which punished his patriotic indiscretions by imprisonment in a fortress in the last years of his life. This difference also decided the attitude of the Austro-Hungarian Government towards the celebrations. The martyr of Russia was treated by the Galician authorities, under directions from Vienna, with effusive attentions; not only was the martyr of Bismarck officially ignored, but the addresses in his honor were subjected to a rigid censorship.

LOFTIE'S LONDON.

London. By W. J. Loftie, B.A., F.S.A. [Historic Towns. Edited by Edward A. Freeman and the Rev. William Hunt.] London. 1887. 8vo, pp. viii, 223.

"THE towns to be treated in these volumes," says the prospectus of Messrs. Longman, "will, as far as possible, be selected with reference to the special part each played in the general history of the kingdom. . . . The object of this series, in dealing with such towns and groups of towns as may be chosen for illustration, will be mainly to bring out the general historic position of each. The purely local history of each place, municipal and ecclesiastical, while not neglected, will be dealt with chiefly as it throws light on its general position."

We are glad to see that the author of the first volume of this series diverges from the course prescribed by the above announcement, in that he places the internal municipal history of London in the foreground. Most of the books devoted to the past of particular English towns emphasize the "general historic position" of the latter; very few of them present a clear account of the constitutional development of an English municipality. In this direction England has much to learn from other countries of Europe, especially from Germany and France.

The first chapter of Mr. Loftie's work is entitled "London before Alfred." Its essence is contained in the following extracts:

"Indeed, the two chief events in the history of Roman London, the building of the bridge and the building of the wall, might alone have been mentioned, as they are the only two events of the period which had any permanent effect on its later existence. But for the wall, but for the bridge, Roman London might as well never have been built, so entire is the breach of continuity in the succession of events which follows the invasion of the Saxons" (p. 9). "Except the name of London itself and a fragment of the wall, there is not a trace of the Roman occupation above ground. It rests with those who assert the municipal continuity of Roman and Saxon London to find some sign or proof of it, however slight; but they have failed to do so" (p. 14). "It does not seem to have occurred to any one that exactly a millennium has just elapsed since Alfred founded London. . . . Though we have occasional notices of the existence of London before his time, it is only after 886 that its annals can be written, and it is only from the rudiments of a municipal constitution which Alfred planted, that the mediæval and modern corporation grew" (p. 16).

Though some eminent writers have affirmed the contrary, we believe with Mr. Loftie that there is a want of constitutional continuity between the Roman municipium and the mediæval English borough. In his view of the influence of King Alfred, on the other hand, he is guilty of the very fault for which he condemns the advocates of the Roman theory—that is to say, he positively affirms a fact for which he can give no proofs. Here is all that the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle says on the subject: "The same year [886] King Alfred restored [or set in order] (gesette) London-borough; and all the Angle race, except those held captive by the Danes, turned to him; and he then committed the borough to the keeping of alderman Ethered." Commentators differ as to the meaning of gesette in this passage, but all of them agree in rejecting Mr. Loftie's construction. Nor is there anything in other contemporary or later sources to support his assumption. That Alfred exerted some influence upon the constitution of London is quite probable, but more than this we are not justified in asserting.

In chapter ii, "The Portreeves," Mr. Loftie tries to simplify matters by identifying these officers with the sheriffs, chamberlain, the justiciarius of the charter of Henry I., and the later mayor (pp. 29, 34); but in so doing he only makes confusion worse confounded. He has, in fact, added very little to our knowledge of the portreaves; on the contrary, the reader seeking light on the subject in these pages will be confused or misled. The other salient topic in this chapter is the dissolution of the "cnihten-gild" in the reign of Henry I. Here Mr. Loftie is even more at fault than in his treatment of the portreeves. "There can now be no doubt," he remarks on page 30, "if any doubt existed before, that the governing body of London was the Knightenguild, as Stow calls it. . . . In the reign of Henry I. we find the guild in full possession of the governing rights." Its lands, he tells us, constituted "the very endowment of the portreeve" (p. 34). Now this is all pure conjecture; the author does not produce the similitude of a proof in support of these pregnant statements. Almost all that is known concerning this fraternity is that it was probably aristocratic in its composition, that some prominent London citizens were among its members, and that it was dissolved in the reign of Henry I., the brethren giving the lands of the guild to the Holy Trinity Priory. There is nothing to indicate that it was even a minor constituent part of the municipal organism—that it exercised any civic functions whatsoever. Had it been the "governing body" of London, it is highly improbable that it would have voluntarily extinguished itself in the manner described. What we have said holds true, whether we take our data from the City Archives (with which the author has only a very superficial acquaintance) or from Stow, who is Mr. Loftie's main source of information.

Chapter iii, entitled "The Mayors," deals with London in the thirteenth century. The repeated attacks of the King upon the liberties of the citizens are clearly stated, but the account of the constitutional growth of the city is very unsatisfactory. The author has much to say of the struggle between the "communa," or governing gild merchant, and the craft gilds. But the term gild merchant of London never occurs in the sources; and "communa" almost invariably means either the community at large or the commons, the populace. In only one instance was this expression used in an abstract sense, namely, in 1191, after the deposition of William Longchamp, when, we are informed by contemporary writers, the citizens erected a "communa." Instead of attempting to explain just what this meant, Mr. Loftie evades the issue by saying, on p. 39, that "this act was no new establishment of a commune." The struggle that took place in the thirteenth century was simply between the richer citizens, headed by powerful aldermen, and the commons, the vulgus civitatis. Mr. Loftie asserts that the gilds "interfered constantly at every election" of Mayor and other officers (p. 66). The fact is, it was the populace. In the 'Cronica Maiorum et Vicecomitum,' the principal source for the study of this period, we invariably find not the gilds, but the "vulgus," the "populus," the "minutus populus," the "populus vocans se communam civitatis," pitted against the "magnates," or the "aldermanni et discreti viri." To identify the gilds with the populace, without corroborative evidence, is as illogical as it would be to promiscuously identify the populace of to-day with the trades-unions. Mr. Loftie has thrown no new light upon the obscure questions of the inception of the London mayoralty and of the status of the London craft gilds in the thirteenth century—their constitution, their functions, and their relations to the civic authorities. Like many other writers on English municipal history, he has warped the truth by introducing into his narrative facts that are true of the development of many Continental towns, but wholly inapplicable to those of England.

Chapter iv, "The Wardens" (i. e., London under the King's Wardens, 1285-1297), is mainly devoted to the early history of the London Wards. The author's strong proclivity to indulge in gratuitous guessing is very conspicuous in this chapter. On almost every page such expressions as "perhaps," "it may be," "it is possible that," "we may presume," etc., meet the eye. He is particularly fond of employing his fancy in the identification and derivation of personal or topographical names. On p. 81, for example, he derives Aldersgate Ward from a hypothetical Ealdred, whose name, he goes on to say, "may well be that of some contemporary of Alfred, perhaps the first settler in the district." Again, on p. 87, he puts forth this query: "Is Hacon the Alderman still commemorated by Hackney?" The author's identification of the Wards of the time of Edward I. with those mentioned in a list of circa 1115 is, in great part, idle speculation.

The title of chapter v ("The Municipality") like those of chapters iii and iv, is ill-chosen giving one a very inadequate idea of the contents. "The completion of the municipality" would have been a more appropriate heading, for it treats of the changes that took place in the constitution of London down to the middle of the fifteenth century. "From the middle of the fifteenth century the outward form has been but little altered: the municipality was thenceforth complete, and, with a few minor differences, much what it still is." The civic officers and the livery companies are the principal subjects of discussion, but the history of two important constituents of the civic organism, the sheriffs and the court of aldermen, is passed over in silence. The author frequently speaks of the "livery," telling us, for example, how in 1375 it succeeded to the functions of the ward-motes in the election of the Common Council, but he nowhere accurately defines the "livery" as distinguished from the companies at large. This chapter will certainly not give the uninformed reader a clear idea of the present power and position of the companies in the civic polity. In this and other parts of the book we have observed a tendency of the author to indulge in vague and dubious generalities, which at times seem to be put forth merely to veil a lack of knowledge. At all events, they give rise to unanswered queries. Here are some examples. "Under the three Edwards the mayoralty was still in its infancy; and the rank of 'Henry le Waleys, mayor of the city of London,' whom the citizens elected on the restoration of their electoral rights in 1297, was very different from that of Whittington or Frowick in the fifteenth century" (p. 104). But he does not tell us what the difference was. In fact, there was no material difference. "Among the wardens' reformations it is probable we may count the rule under which the election of the mayor was to be made by the commonalty rather than by the tumultuous assembly of the folk-mote" (p. 107). What is meant here by "commonalty"? Contemporary writers, as we have already pointed out, applied this very term to "the tumultuous assembly of the folk-mote." "Unquestionably the work of Walter Hervey was bearing fruit in the gradual formation of voluntary combinations of traders for the regulation of prices, and in obtaining the recognition of the Guildhall authorities." "We find, however, few, if any, traces of companies formed for the purpose of carrying on trade. The 'mistery' met for a different purpose, and was composed of men who traded each on his own account" (pp. 110, 113). What was this "different purpose"? The distinction between trade-gild, mistery, and company must be anything but clear in Mr. Loftie's own mind; and his ideas concerning their raison d'être, their origin, and functions are decidedly hazy. "The point of departure, the place where the history of the country and the town diverges, is the establishment of the communal idea as a working principle," namely, "the right of every free man to a voice in the management of affairs" (p. 118). We have already remarked that it is very misleading to apply the term "commune," or "communal," to the mediæval English town. The primary conception of the "commune" on the Continent was independence from external control in the management of the town government. The participation "of every free man" did not necessarily follow. In fact, it was not until long after the establishment of the "communes" that the government of Continental towns became democratic. Besides, Mr. Loftie forgets that in a preceding chapter (pp. 52-54) he made the "commune" of English towns identical with a "mercantile oligarchy" which had a monopoly of the local government.

Chapter vi, "London and Middlesex," treats of that part of the metropolis not included within the city proper. The author has made what he regards as a great discovery with reference to the signification of Henry I.'s grant of the farm of Middlesex to the Londoners. This was more valuable, he thinks, than any privilege that the latter had ever received from the crown. "It was a proclamation to all England that under the King London was a free city." The people of English towns, he argues, "were in ignorance as to the peculiar liberties of London; and if one came out to tell of them, his words might seem but idle tales; but the farm of Middlesex was a fact which could not be disputed. It was known to all who cared to know anything of English law and civic liberty" (p. 124). This argument, very shadowy in itself, loses all force when we note how inconsistent it is with what the author has elsewhere emphasized, namely, that most English towns received a grant of "the liberties of London" (p. 52), that London was "the municipality on which all the municipalities of England were avowedly or tacitly moulded" (p. 117). The latter statement is incorrect, as London was only one of several radiating centres, or exemplars, of municipal franchises; but there is enough truth in it to render absurd the author's assertion that those very "liberties of London" were "idle words" to the burgesses of England. In all probability the grant of the farm of Middlesex was viewed by the King and the citizens primarily as a simple financial transaction, the latter giving the former £300 a year for the various royal rents and perquisites attached to that county. We should like to see some authority for Mr. Loftie's statement that Kensington, Chelsea, Hackney, and other parts of the metropolis in Middlesex and Surrey, were originally "colonies of the citizens of London" (pp. 134-135). Surely the author might have given us, in this chapter, a brief exposition of the unique and cumbrous machinery by which "the metropolitan area," with its vast congeries of boards and bumbledoms, is governed.

Chapter vii, "The Church in London," consists in great part of a long succession of fatuous conjectures concerning the origin of London parishes. On pp. 154-155 the author makes the following candid admission, which applies to the whole book: "Here, as in so many other points, information fails us, not that ample records do not exist, but that no one has been at the pains of consulting them." Why, instead of indulging in speculative aerial gyrations, did not Mr. Loftie consult these "ample records"? In considering the influences that led to the growth of "London Trade" (Chapter viii) he omits one of the most important, namely, the strength of the English Crown in the Middle Ages. It was this, rather than "the organization of the trades and misteries," that led to internal peace and a sense of security; it was mainly to this, likewise, that we must ascribe "the comparatively peaceful attitude of the craftsmen during the Angevin and Tudor reigns" which the author calls a "very potent element among the causes of London commercial prosperity" (p. 184). The last chapter, "London and the Kingdom," is one of the best in the book, because the author confines himself mainly to the condensation of well-known facts, in doing which he is more efficient than in attempting to add to the sum of knowledge by original research.

There are many errors of fact in Mr. Loftie's work, besides those already noted. We subjoin only a few more. The author betrays a very superficial acquaintance with English municipal history in general. The signification of the Latin villa is not confined to "village" (p. 112); it was applied to municipal towns perhaps even more commonly than was the term burgus. It is not entirely correct to say that there was a "custom which existed in many English cities to refer municipal disputes to the corporation of London" (p. 179). Where doubt existed as to the construction of municipal laws and privileges, Oxford (and perhaps some other towns at present unknown) sent to London, but only to ask what was the corresponding custom, or usage, in the metropolis. Hereford, Bristol, Newcastle, and other municipal centres were appealed to in the same way. Not a single instance of a gild "receiving a town or city in farm" is known, though Mr. Loftie speaks of it on page 186 as a common practice. The author's philology is sadly in need of mending. The adjective "real" has nothing to do with "royal" (p. 26); nor "tailors" with "telarii," weavers (p. 49); nor "mistery," a craft, a trade, with "mastery" (p. 186). The derivation of the first two are well known: "mistery" is from "ministerium," mediæval Latin for craft. "It may be worth while," he says on page 36, "here to mention that in such a form as 'Henry Fitz Ailwin' or 'Eilward Fitz Wizel,' the 'Fitz' is used for the Latin 'Filius.'" By most readers this will certainly be regarded as carrying coals to Newcastle. But Mr. Loftie is not sure of the truth of the above statement, for on page 64 he writes: "Yet 'Fitz,' if it is indicated by Filius in the Latin writers, is growing less and less common." "I do not know," he continues on page 36, "when 'Fitz' became usual in London, but it was before the reign of Henry III." One requires no great knowledge of English history to assure Mr. Loftie that the Fitzes multiplied and flourished in London from the time of the landing of William the Conqueror. "The exact date of the charter [of Henry I. to London] is given by Rymer as 1101" (p. 28). No date is given by Rymer; in the latter's 'Fœdera' this grant is placed between documents of 1132 and 1135. "The great fact of Henry's charter is the recognition of London as a corporation" (p. 32). But on page 124 the author gives us to understand that, after receiving this charter, the burghers were "still unincorporated." The mediæval term "guildable" had nothing to do with gild fraternities (p. 51), but was connected with "gilds," i. e., payments, to the king. Mr. Loftie speaks of an "Act of Parliament" of 1475, giving to the London livery companies "a power which they do not seem to have enjoyed elsewhere" (pp. 114, 115); on page 187 he calls it a "charter." It was neither the one nor the other, but an ordinance of the Common Council of London. It is truly insular to call the churches designed by Wren "a series of models of unapproached beauty" (p. 171). The gilds of England were abolished in 1547, not "in 1557" (p. 185).

The above strictures will, generally speaking, also apply to Mr. Loftie's 'History of London' (2 vols., 1883–1884), of which the volume before us is a condensation. But the latter contains new results, based on the Calendar of the Documents of St. Paul's, in the Ninth Report of the Historical MSS. Commission. It may be admitted that Mr. Loftie, with all his weaknesses, is now regarded "as the chief authority on the history of London" (Athenæum, No. 3091); we hope, however, the Athenæum reviewer is wrong in predicting that this volume "will long remain the handbook to the history of our greatest city."

BISHOP HANNINGTON.

James Hannington, First Bishop of Eastern Equatorial Africa: A History of his Life and Work, 1847–1885. By E. C. Dawson. London: Seeley & Co.; New York: A. D. F. Randolph & Co. 1887. Pp. x, 451. Map. Illustrations. 8vo.

BISHOP HANNINGTON seems to have been a very good specimen of Tennyson's Sir Walter Vivian, a "great, broad-shouldered, genial Englishman." He was frank, fearless, sincere, thoroughly good-humored, and with an overflowing fund of animal spirits. These led him into all sorts of wild, madcap adventures, and made him throw himself impulsively and wholly into everything which interested him for the time, whether it was bird's-nesting, a town-and-gown row, or a religious mission. In some respects he reminds us of Bishop Patteson, whose fate was so like his own. He had neither the latter's mental powers and training nor his high breeding, but to a similar bodily vigor and love of athletic sports he joined that faculty for strongly attaching men, as well as that single-hearted devotion to his work, which characterized the first Melanesian bishop. He is also equally fortunate with the latter in his biographer. Mr. Dawson, indeed, has done his work so well that we lose sight of the fact that, apart from Hannington's tragic death, there was absolutely nothing in his short career deserving such a memorial.

The son of a wealthy Brighton merchant, who was strangely indifferent to the advantages of a regular education, his youth was spent in almost unrestrained freedom. A little smattering of natural history, picked up in endless ramblings on sea and shore, and skill in managing a boat, seem to sum up his acquirements when, at the age of fifteen, his school life closed and he entered his father's office. Yachting excursions and volunteer drill, however, appear to have occupied his time far more than business; and his confession, after six years spent in this manner, that he was "fit for nothing but collecting curiosities," was probably not far from the truth. The mercantile profession was accordingly abandoned, and in 1868 he entered Oxford with the intention of studying for orders. As he was entirely unfitted by temperament and lack of training to be a reading man, he naturally plunged headlong into the least harmful of the dissipations of undergraduate life. When he became "captain of the boats and president of the club," his highest ambition was gratified. "I am at the head of everything," he writes. His genial disposition made him a general favorite, even with the long-suffering Dons, who "extended to him an unwritten license," says his biographer and classmate. On one occasion, "the Principal remonstrated with him by letter upon want of attention to study, and inquired how long he intended to continue 'a gentleman at large.' To this the irrepressible alumnus at once replied, 'I hope that you will in future regard me no longer as a gentleman at large, but a gentleman at "smalls!"'" In a closely contested boat race, of which there is a very spirited description, Dawson, who rowed No. 6, Hannington being 7, perceived by the shouts of laughter from the bank that something unusual was going on in their boat. "As we passed the post, and I turned to congratulate Jim upon our escape, I beheld him overwhelmed with confusion and shame. In his immense energy he had worked his nether garments almost wholly off, and the latter half of that hard-fought race had been rowed by him, not without frantic snatches at his disappearing raiment, garbed almost as slightly as Ulysses and his crew, as depicted upon some ancient vase!" Still, he was not wholly given over to the spirit of fun, as is shown by the following entry in his diary, giving "the details of a single Sunday, which may be taken as a not unfair example of many others: '7 A. M., Holy Communion. 9 A. M., Chapel. 10:30, 'Varsity Sermon by Dr. Goulburn; twenty-mile walk with E. Ashmead-Bartlett. 5:15, Chapel. 7:30, Service in St. Mary's. 9 P. M., Greek Testament Lecture under Burgon.'"

The next year found him at Martinhoe, a little village on the North Devon coast, where he had been "strongly recommended" to retire, that he might pursue his studies under the care of a tutor. "A place of wide-stretching moorland; dark, weather-scarped cliffs, and rocks worn and torn by the ceaseless sweep of Atlantic billows," it had a great fascination for Hannington, and he found as many temptations to neglect his books in clambering about the cliffs and exploring their numerous caves as he did in the diversions of Oxford. Here he spent a large part of the remainder of his undergraduate life, and when, after several failures, he finally succeeded in taking his degree and passing his examination for deacon's orders, he returned to it as curate to his former tutor. Whatever the motive which first prompted him to enter the Church, as soon as he was fairly at work he put his whole heart into his profession, and was henceforth an earnest, devoted clergyman, whose every thought was to do his duty to his people, and who found a vent for his superabundant activity, when the narrow limits of his parish pressed him too closely, in mission labors in various parts of England. There is nothing especially worthy of note in Mr. Dawson's account of the eight years passed at this place and at Hurstpierpoint, to which he was appointed in 1875, as Hannington's diary and letters rarely refer to matters of general interest.

In 1882 he gave up his parish in order to go as missionary to Africa. It is difficult to resist the conviction that this step was due to an impulse rather than to a real call. Undoubtedly he was perfectly sincere in his motives, and in most respects well fitted for the work; but the wild, adventurous life of the African traveller, its hardships, difficulties, and dangers, were so exactly suited to impress his imagination that we cannot help thinking that an unconscious longing for its excitements may have been mistaken for the appeals to a sacred duty. Leaving behind him a wife and three young children, he sailed for Zanzibar in May, 1882, being destined for the Uganda mission on Lake Victoria Nyanza. Mr. Dawson has been quite as successful in describing Hannington's African experiences as those of the previous portion of his life, and there are few more graphic and interesting accounts of African travel than are given in the second part of this work. This is owing chiefly to Hannington's own descriptive powers, which were of no mean order, and also to his faculty for constantly getting into scrapes which more sober travellers would have avoided. He took the ordinary route into the interior through the terrible marshes which have proved so fatal to so many white travellers. Hannington was soon seized with fever, to which was added first dysentery and then rheumatic fever. Although brought to the very brink of the grave, he struggled on until he reached the southern end of the lake. Here a camp was formed, and preparations were made for the voyage to Uganda on the north coast. During the intervals of his attacks of fever, he amused himself by hunting and making collections of birds, insects, and plants. In one of these excursions he had the following adventure:

"At about a mile from camp, he saw some animal moving through the dense mimosa scrub, and, firing, killed it. His prey proved to be a large lion's cub. The gun-bearer, seeing this, fled with every sign of terror, and shouted to him to do the same. It was time indeed to do so. The cries of 'Run, bwana, run!' were accentuated by a double roar, and, looking round, Hannington saw the bereaved parents, a fine lion and lioness, coming toward him with long, bounding leaps over the scrub. An ordinary man, encountering lions face to face in the open for almost the first time, would probably have lost all presence of mind, and, turning to run, have been inevitably destroyed. He deliberately faced round upon his enemy. The enraged lions were distant but a few paces, but they suddenly checked, and both stood, as though transfixed, glaring upon him. So they remained for some time, till Hannington, placing one foot behind the other, and still keeping his eyes fixed upon the yellow orbs before him, gradually increased his distance, and, having placed about a hundred yards between himself and the monsters, quietly walked away. But the indomitable nature of the man comes out more strongly in what followed. Most men would have concluded that they had had enough of such an adventure and have accepted their escape from the jaws of death, or at least would not have renewed the contest without assistance. Hannington was formed of quite another metal. Though the light was waning, he determined that he would return and secure the skin of the cub he had killed; so he retraced his steps. When near enough to observe their motions, he could see that the lion and lioness were walking round about their cub, licking its body and filling the air with low growlings. At this moment an unknown flower caught his eye. He plucked it; took out his note-book, pressed it between the leaves, and classified it as far as he was able; then, with coolness perfectly restored, he ran forward a few paces, threw up his arms, and shouted! Was it that the lions had never encountered so strange an antagonist before? At all events, they looked up, then turned tail and bounded away. He dragged the cub for some distance, till having left the dangerous vicinity he shouldered it and brought it into camp. Acts such as these gave him unbounded influence over his men. They learned to regard him as invincible, and entertained a most wholesome dread of opposing his expressed will."

After various unsuccessful attempts to obtain canoes, Hannington was convinced that further progress, for him at least, was impossible, and set out on his return to the coast. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the painful details of this journey, the record of which reminds us of Livingstone's 'Last Journals.' But for the fact that in all his dreadful sufferings "his patience and cheerfulness never forsook him," he must surely have died. Contrary to every expectation, however, he succeeded in reaching Zanzibar, and, after an absence of a little more than a year, was again at work in his old parish.

But it was not likely that a man who found tent-life in Africa, even under such circumstances, "thoroughly agreeable" to him, would long be content with the humdrum life of an English village. His intense dislike to acknowledge that he had been beaten also added to his restlessness. So it was only natural that with returning strength there came an irresistible desire to make another attempt to labor in the missionary field. The Church Missionary Society not only gladly accepted his renewed offers, but also secured his appointment as Bishop of Eastern Equatorial Africa. This puts his return to Africa on an entirely different footing from his first visit, as there can be little question that he was admirably fitted for this responsible post. He was consecrated in June, 1884, and, by the end of the next January, was in Frere Town, which he intended to make his home. This is a settlement chiefly of liberated slaves on the mainland opposite Mombasa, about 150 miles north of Zanzibar. His first work was to visit the neighboring stations and to make preparations for planting new ones. With this end in view he made a flying trip to Kilima-njaro in the spring, to induce the well-known Chief Mandara to receive a missionary. Having obtained his consent, he conducted to that region the requisite men and material to found a station, his return journey of 120 miles being made "at the extraordinary rate of 40 miles a day"—a pedestrian feat probably unrivalled in the annals of African travels. His next object was to visit the Uganda Mission, which was included in his diocese. After conferring with Sir John Kirk and the authorities at Zanzibar, he determined to make an attempt to reach the lake by the route which Mr. Thomson had just shown was practicable. This was not only the most direct way, but it was also much more healthy than the southern route. So far as he, or any one at the time, knew, the chief danger to be apprehended was from the Masai. If he succeeded in passing safely through their land, it was believed that he would have no difficulty in reaching Uganda. The Bishop, accompanied by a native clergyman and some 200 porters, found Masailand decimated by famine, and the chief obstacle to his progress the lack of food. Although nearly starving, he struggled on, until at length, in October, he got within sight of the lake. Here he left his companion in charge of the caravan and pushed on with fifty men as far as the Victoria Nile, some two days' journey from Rubaga, the capital of Uganda.

At this point, when every danger seemed to have been safely passed, he was seized by the chief of the district, acting under orders from the young King Mwanga, who had succeeded his father on Mtesa's death in 1884. After a few days' imprisonment, enduring patiently sufferings most vividly described in his diary, he was shot, his porters, with the exception of four, sharing his fate. The reason for this utterly unexpected murder is now perfectly clear. The Bishop, coming by the northern route, was regarded by the King as an emissary of the Germans, whose recent annexations of territory had naturally filled him with fear for his own dominions. Acting under the advice of his chiefs and the resident Arabs, who hated the missionaries, he killed the Bishop, to make it plain that this door to Uganda could not be opened.

Mr. Dawson's biography deserves to rank high among works of its class. If he has erred, it has been in giving too many unimportant details of Bishop Hannington's early life, some of which were of a too personal nature to print. The attractiveness of the book, which, we regret to notice, lacks an index, is also increased by the illustrations, many of which are taken from the Bishop's own sketches.

RECENT MATHEMATICAL WORKS.

A Treatise on Algebra. By Profs. Oliver, Wait, and Jones of Cornell University. Ithaca, N. Y.: Dudley F. Finch. 1887. 8vo, pp. viii, 412.

Algebra, an Elementary Text-book for the Higher Classes of Secondary Schools and for Colleges. By G. Chrystal, M. A., Professor of Mathematics in the University of Edinburgh. Part I. Edinburgh: Adam & Charles Black; New York: Macmillan. 1887. 8vo, pp. xx, 542.

The Mechanics of Machinery. By Alex. B. W. Kennedy, Professor of Engineering and Mechanical Technology in University College, London. Macmillan & Co. 1886. 8vo, pp. xv, 652.

A Treatise on Surveying, comprising the Theory and the Practice. By William M. Gillespie, LL.D., formerly Professor of Civil Engineering in Union College. Revised and enlarged by Cady Staley, Ph.D. D. Appleton & Co. 1887. Large 8vo, pp. vi, 549, and tables pp. 127.

AMONG the mathematical works upon our table there are four which seem to demand special notice, both from the character of their authors and from the character of the books themselves. They are all entirely above the ordinary run of text-books. Indeed, from their size and scope they can hardly be considered as text-books at all, if by "text-book" we understand a book intended especially for use in instructing classes in schools and colleges, though they might all be so used by a teacher or professor skilful in the art of selection and omission.

The combination of three persons in the production of a single mathematical treatise is somewhat remarkable. Were it not for the title-page and the notice of copyright, we venture to say that no scrutiny, however close, would lead any one to suspect that more than one person had had a hand in the composition of the Cornell treatise on algebra. There is a similarity and consistency in the treatment of every subject from one end of the book to the other which gives the reader the impression, not that the authors had divided the work between them—one taking one subject, another another—but that some one of the three had given the final form to the whole, working upon materials furnished by the other two, or that each and every part had been the joint product of a sort of cabinet council of all three, nothing being considered as settled until it had received unanimous approval. However they may have combined their labors, the authors have undoubtedly produced a work treating a greater variety of subjects than any single volume with which we are acquainted. It was intended, the authors tell us, when its composition was commenced, "for young men who had already studied the elements of algebra and geometry, and who had had some scholarly training." "At no time have they thought of it as a book for beginners." In the form in which it is now published they say of it: "As a text-book for use in ordinary classes it must be abridged: yet its wide range of subjects makes it all the more valuable to teachers, as a book of reference, and to those bright scholars who wish either to place their knowledge of algebra on a sure foundation, or to make that knowledge a stepping-stone to the higher analysis."

And yet, with all this elaboration, the work is confessedly incomplete. We quote again: "Another edition will contain chapters on theory of equations, integer analysis, symbolic methods, determinants and groups, probabilities, and insurance; with a full alphabetical index." Here is material enough to fill another volume as large as the present one, and that, too, without treating any of the subjects in an exhaustive manner. But from the fact that there is nothing about the present volume to indicate that it is intended to be a "vol. i," and from the language above quoted, most persons will, whether rightly or wrongly, infer that it is the intention of the authors to incorporate the new matter, together with that of the present treatise, in one volume, so that the purchasers of the first edition who might desire to have the complete work, would be obliged to buy again what they had already paid for. More than that, the declaration in its present form is calculated to defeat the object in view by hindering the sale of the present edition, and thus postponing the appearance of the second. A book so multifarious in its contents greatly needs an index, and many, for this reason alone, will wait for the appearance of the second edition. So, also, will many more who may happen to be specially interested in any of the subjects not yet treated.

The authors have given to the word "algebra" an extension altogether beyond its usual signification. Many subjects which the student usually meets for the first time in analytical geometry or the calculus are treated by them. Thus, the theory of infinitesimals, and Taylor's theorem, which are usually first encountered in the differential calculus, are here treated. The chapter on imaginary quantities is a sort of introduction to Hamilton's quaternions, and free use is made of many of the terms invented by him. Our authors have also introduced several new signs, or modifications of old ones, so that a careful preliminary study of the first chapter is indispensable, even to an expert mathematician, in order to read almost any chapter in the work. Any attempt at detailed criticism would be altogether out of the question within the space at our disposal, but we can assure our readers that the work is evidently the product of a profound knowledge of almost every branch of pure mathematics, and its careful study will well repay the professional mathematician.

The title of the second work on our list is certainly somewhat misleading. It is far from corresponding to what is generally understood by an "elementary text-book." In the opening of his preface Mr. Chrystal tells us that the work "is so far elementary that it begins at the beginning of the subject. It is not, however, intended for the use of absolute beginners." But we think we can go much further than this, and affirm with a good deal of confidence that, unless perhaps under the guidance of Mr. Chrystal himself, few students could use it with profit except those who already had as much knowledge of algebra as is usually possessed by undergraduates in the last two years of their college course. Although it forms only the first part of the treatise which Prof. Chrystal intends ultimately to give us, yet as it stands it is far more extensive than any "elementary text-book" on algebra with which we are acquainted. It seems to us best adapted for those students who are pursuing a post-graduate course of mathematics. Prof. Chrystal disclaims the idea of writing a book "on the philosophical nature of the first principles of algebra," but he admits that the opening chapter is the one "which the beginner will doubtless find the hardest in the book." He endeavors to treat every subject that he takes up in an exhaustive manner. He has made free use of graphic illustrations, and, indeed, he seems nowhere to have allowed considerations of space to impose any limitations on the full development of his ideas. Prof. Chrystal gives in the present volume no indication of the subjects he intends to treat in the second part of his work. But those who delight in the manipulation of algebraical expressions, presented often in their most complicated and abstract forms, will undoubtedly wish for its speedy completion.

Both the works which we have noticed belong to the most abstract department of pure mathematics, and are remarkable for their extent, and, each in its own way, for wide departures from the methods, the arrangement, and the subject-matter of ordinary text-books. The remaining two belong to the department of applied mathematics, and are equally remarkable for the skill and clearness and simplicity with which abstract science is made subservient to the needs of practical life.

Nothing drier and more tedious can be conceived than a work on machinery, except to those who are studying it professionally or for some special purpose. But if any book on that subject could be made to interest the general reader, always supposing that he has sufficient preliminary training to understand any work on the subject, it would certainly be Prof. Kennedy's. In his way of presenting things, we are constantly reminded of the clearness and felicity of expression which have contributed so much to spread the fame of Helmholtz and Tyndall. Adopting at the outset a method of explaining the motions of machines which, from a theoretical point of view, is eminently scientific, he carries it out consistently through his whole work. Until the laws of nature are altered, and the principles which govern the motion of all bodies with which we are acquainted become something different from what they have been found to be by the philosophers and mathematicians of the last three or four centuries, the method must be always applicable. Among the numerous advantages of this scientific consistency which have suggested themselves to the mind of the reviewer in the course of the perusal of the work, we have space to mention only one. A new machine is presented to the mechanical engineer who has studied this book. It works, perhaps, in a complicated and apparently novel manner. But he knows at once how to go to work to unravel its complications, to comprehend its motions, and to reduce to simplicity what to the ordinary observer would seem an inextricable puzzle. Another characteristic of the book is the felicitous, or, as the mathematicians like to say, "elegant," manner in which the author illustrates general principles by the explanation of particular cases. These special cases are in most instances taken from machines in actual use, and are explained with a fulness and minuteness of detail the perfect clearness and intelligibility of which saves it from becoming tedious. The book is illustrated with nearly four hundred figures. Of their artistic merit we are not competent to speak, but as real helps to an understanding of the text they are admirable. They are not, as is so often the case in illustrated text-books, mere reproductions from older works, often obsolete or faulty; but Prof. Kennedy says that nine-tenths of them have been drawn by his own hand. As Wagner composed the music to his own libretti, so Prof. Kennedy made the pictures to his own text.

In our opinion, the introduction of this work as a text-book into our schools of technology cannot be too strongly recommended. The great work of Weisbach and others constructed on a similar plan are too extensive for use in an ordinary course of engineering, and they generally bristle with formulæ drawn from analytical geometry and the differential and integral calculus. However desirable it may be that all engineers should be accomplished mathematicians, yet such is not, and for a long time will not be, the fact. Prof. Kennedy's work is not too large for complete study during the ordinary engineering course. In all possible cases it solves problems by graphic or geometrical methods, and, as the author says, can be easily tackled by the engineer who is master of his drawing instruments, while with the tools of analytical mathematics he is often, we might say generally, not so familiar. Our readers, however, must not infer that Prof. Kennedy's book is in any sense superficial. It is practical, but throughout eminently scientific and thorough. Wherever it handles anything in a manner more simple and intelligible than ordinary, it arises from that "scientific tact" which is the result partly of long experience and partly of a "natural gift"—a mental constitution alike rare and invaluable, but which seems more common among Frenchmen than among any other people.

That scientific tact is exhibited in an equally remarkable degree in the last book we have to examine, the author of which was an American professor of the same science as Prof. Kennedy. Gillespie's 'Land-Surveying' was printed for the use of his classes in 1851, but was not published for the general market until 1855. The favor with which it was received and the rapidity with which it supplanted other works, was something extraordinary. The surveyor in a country town with nothing but a common-school education said, "This man has common sense; he knows how to put things so that common people can understand them." The civil engineer, furnished with all the apparatus of modern learning, was equally enthusiastic in his praises of its accuracy and the scientific manner in which the subject was developed, and almost every Government surveyor adopted it as his guide in surveying the public lands, a subject which Prof. Gillespie treated with special care. In the preface to his work, the author promised a second volume on 'Levelling and Higher Surveying.' Parts of this volume were printed for use in class work, but it was not finished at the time of his death. His papers were put in the hands of Mr. Cady Staley, who finished the volume, and published it in 1870. It was marked by the same characteristics as the first volume, though, of course, it interested a much smaller public. Both works have been incorporated in the present large and handsome volume, and as the work stands it is a complete manual of every part of the science, with full directions alike for the farmer who, without instruments, lays out his farm by counting his steps, and for the engineer engaged in a triangulation or a coast survey.

At the place where this review is written we have no copy of the first edition, and cannot speak in detail of the modifications and additions of Prof. Staley. We can only say from recollection that he seems to have been thoroughly imbued with the spirit and methods of the original work, and to have treated it with careful and reverent hands. For thirty years the 'Land-Surveying' of Prof. Gillespie has had no rival; in its present shape it promises to hold that position for an indefinite period to come. There is an Analytical Table of Contents covering eleven of the large pages, but this hardly compensates for the lack of an alphabetical index to so extensive a work.

A Look Round Literature. By Robert Buchanan. Scribner & Welford. 1887.

Mr. Robert Buchanan speaks of himself toward the end of this volume as "a man who is far beyond all literary predilections or passions." This bit of self-criticism is the gem of the book. It is possible, however, that it is not meant to be retroactive, and he might acknowledge that some of these papers, which are collected from his critical utterances for several years past, are not the work of a mind completely emancipated. The article on Rossetti, in which he won his spurs, is, of course, not reproduced, since he has many times expressed his contrition for its errors; but he cannot praise that tenuous poet now without a left-handed dig at Burns's muse, as "the poetry of kicking up one's heels and rolling with milkmaids in the hay." The essay on Goethe, however, is the most rich in unexpected felicities of pugnacity. The "Titanic Tutor," the "Greatest Stage-Manager," the possible "very popular Parson," had he had a trifle less animation and fewer amours, the master of Arnold and Lowell, as he calls him—for this man, Goethe, Mr. Buchanan has an invincible repugnance. There is Thackeray, too, who "based a splendid reputation on the theory of suckling fools and chronicling small beer"; George Eliot, "whose writings reflected, not the lover of humanity, but the superior person"; Emerson, with "no pathos"—and so on, over big and little reputations, saving and excepting only Walt Whitman, the Socrates and Christ of American democracy, in apotheosizing whom his worshipper makes that remark respecting his freedom from "literary predilections or passions."

But, withal, one has a hearty good liking for this mighty Nimrod of a critic, who disturbs the repose of the monarchs of the forest and gives the comfortable deer of our contemporary preserves a taste of wild life. It is not unpleasing to know that the race of the Dekkars and Dennises and Christopher Norths has not died out; and Buchanan, like his prototypes, has at times that facility in blurting out a brutal truth for which the British censor, time immemorial, has had a native genius. The strength of his social and religious convictions, the energy of his beliefs of all kinds, give genuineness and vitality to his words; and the cultivated reader who still has in him a mild strain of the old English blood that loves a fighter, cannot be hard on a sturdy champion engaged in what seems less like serious criticism than a game of literary fisticuffs.

The personality of Buchanan is the real thing in the volume; his opinions—at least the literary ones—are not of so much consequence. He is a good hater, and he does not hide his talent in a napkin; he veneers his solid billingsgate with rhetoric of some color and polish; but all this must not blind us to the fact that he has ideals, and that he does truly regard the great names with which he makes free, and venerates them. He cannot refrain from the ill word; but he never tweaks the ear of a literary god without expressing his high respect for all other parts of his person. There is one portion of the book which is altogether agreeable, and it gains a considerable part of its attractiveness from the writer's personality exhibited more directly than in his criticism. It is that which deals with a few of his private friendships with literary men when he was a struggling youth. Of Thomas Love Peacock, to whom he introduced himself by one of those letters which boys of genius will write, he gives us a very charming sketch. The old man on the lawn teaching his granddaughter Italian, or in his library finding Aristophanes funnier than Dickens, or learning Spanish at eighty years to read those "Autos" of Calderon that Shelley so long ago had praised to him—all this is excellently done, with both taste and feeling. Peacock belongs to a class of Englishmen whose lives too seldom get into literature. He was "a cold scholar"—this epithet of Hogg's will stick to him as long as his name; but he presents a pleasanter picture in his old age. It is a piece of the omnipresent irony of life to find it written of that man to whom Shelley wrote those immortal Italian letters, "Italy he knew not, nor cared to know." He had never been to Paris even. He spoke freely of Shelley, not with much understanding; and his claim to have aided Shelley in forming his poetic style in 'Alastor' is ridiculous. Another interesting person on whom Buchanan throws the light of personal reminiscence is Sydney Dobell, who befriended him on his coming to London, and touched him with his peculiarly sweet and noble nature and also by the sight of his physical frailty, so in contrast with his own "rude flush of health and hope" and "audacity of physical well-being." The human feeling in both these sketches is very simple and true. The "Priory," also, was one of his harbors of entertainment, but George Eliot probably had no more unawed spectator; he represents her as always "on the tripod," on which she had sat so long that "her genius had become frozen at the fountain, and her character was veneered over with the self-pride of insight; so that, with all her apprehensiveness, she lacked sympathy, and with all her moral enthusiasm she was spiritually cold." To Buchanan, with his Lares and Penates of Democracy and Religion, she was a poor kind of Sibyl. Of Democracy and Religion there is always a groundswell in his own work, and there is much humanity in it, too; in criticism he is not well furnished, but if one is experienced enough not to be irritated by it, he will better measure and appreciate the spirit of the man who seems to put his whole heart into all he does.

Principles of Art. Part I. Art in History. Part II. Art in Theory. By John C. Van Dyke, Librarian of the Sage Library, New Brunswick. Fords, Howard & Hulbert. 1887.

The fever for art instruction which seems to prevail among us, growing in part out of the self-recognized inartistic character of our time and race, develops a class of art literature which has no chance of existence in any other country than ours or England, where the conditions are almost identical. It consists mainly of rehashing judgments, opinions, and statements of fact in reference to art, with addition of personal conjectures, appreciations, and observations, in which lies the entire originality of the work. It is not enough to have read many books, even in the case of a person who has a strong personal feeling for art; the mere fact of having collated what is known and what is concluded by other thinkers is no basis for criticism, and does not qualify any one to write on art. In science a student may learn all the facts known up to his day in any specialty, and yet not have the authority necessary to form conclusions and establish generalizations which shall admit him into the category of scientific magnates. Much less, then, in the case of art, where not definite and demonstrable facts form the basis of generalization, but opinions which are their own authority are the material we must build with, can we admit as teacher a man who has only informed himself concerning and collated compendiously what has been written by others. We had to insist on this in the case of Mrs. Mitchell's 'Greek Sculpture'; the collation of authorities may be ever so complete and admirable, as in that work it was, and the comparative judgment of the respective value of the collated opinions be gravely in default, as it was also there. These are distinct elements of critical ability, if, indeed, we must admit the former to be a part of criticism, for the collater and the critic are not necessarily related, as is evidenced anew by the book of Mr. Van Dyke.

This author—whether from youth or insufficient mental breadth it is quite impossible to say—has not attained to that generalizing power which qualifies him to pronounce on so difficult a question, or justifies him in adding another to the many books which confound wisdom on art. It is seldom that a man's opinions in matters of art are of much value before he is forty; very few are authoritative before fifty; and when a man is sixty he will look back on his expressed opinions and feel inclined to burn nine-tenths of them. Mr. Van Dyke is diligent and systematic, and has laid out the scheme of his work largely, but as if it were a scientific treatise which he was constructing. He has wished to write a book for popular use, and for this purpose he has "endeavored throughout these pages to be clear and concise in statement, to be accurate as regards events of history and their effect upon art, and to be intelligible by the choice of the simplest language. The scientific has been avoided; he has not thought to write the hieratic for a small metaphysical priesthood, but rather the plain language of the people for all who are in any way interested in art." But the first thing in any treatise for popular education in art, as in every other branch of human cognition, is to get hold of correct fundamental principles. So far from its being, as most people suppose, easier to make a good book for primary education, the most masterly knowledge and the profoundest grasp of first principles are required for such a work, that no labor may be thrown away by the necessity of eradicating fundamental errors in education.

It is needless to question much the historical part of our author's book—history being matter of science, not of opinion; but we cannot let pass one very grave error, which shows that the writer has failed to comprehend one of the most important facts in art. He says:

"In treating of the ideal in Greek art, the word must not be confounded with 'the ideal' of to-day as it is understood in its contemporary application. Our ideal is but an imaginary type, 'a form seen in the mind,' a memory gathered from many impressions; and in works of art it is likely to be as characterless as it is agreeable to the eye. The Greek ideal was something entirely different. In the first place, the Greek physically was the most perfect man imaginable, . . . In Sparta none but the perfect were permitted to live. . . . To represent the gods, then, the Greek sculptor generalized the human form and was eclectic. He combined the excellences of the many into one perfect whole, and then made a new and individual form."

Now, there is not the slightest evidence that the Greek form was any more perfect in the days of Phidias than now, nor is there the slightest probability that it was. Nor did ideal art ever have a footing in Sparta. Mr. Van Dyke must not take his facts from hypotheses framed to support a false theory of art elaborated by German philosophy; and when he goes on in his historical department to talk as if he had seen statues which we have even no clear description or reproduction of, he needs to be called to order. "The representation of soul and thought in the statues [of the Greek gods] was apparent, but it was passive, not active; reserved, not demonstrative; silent, not boisterous. In addition, the grandeur and sublimity of Phidias's best work was materially heightened by the colossal proportion, as instanced in the Olympian Zeus and the Parthenonic Athena." This may be as good sense as we think it nonsense, but if relevant it is pure assumption. There is no indication of soul or thought in any of the Greek statues, and if there is a way of indicating soul as distinguished from thought, it is a pity Mr. Van Dyke has not given us the recipe. But in the above extracts he has dragged in questions about the ideal which have nothing to do with the history of art, and of which his treatment shows that he is utterly afield as to Greek art at least, for he absolutely fails to understand what the ideal means. We are not surprised, therefore, to find in the theoretical part a condensation of miscomprehension. Thus, quoting Hamerton's definition of the ideal, he says: "Under this definition of Mr. Hamerton's Michael Angelo, Delacroix, Millet, and Corot would be classified as idealists; whereas none of them ever tried to record a type, build up a perfection, or realize a universal conception. . . . For ourselves, then, in our consideration of modern art, we will wholly abandon 'the ideal.' Our theory can get on without it. It had its place, and lived and died in Greece." But there is no true art that is not based on the ideal, and Greek art is simply the greatest or truest art because it is most purely ideal. We are forced to the conclusion that Mr. Van Dyke, with all his diligence in reading and collation, has not taken the time to digest his accumulations, and has no right from the ideal point of view to thrust upon us his crude conclusions.

Finally, such a statement as this—"The architecture of the fifteenth century was favorable to painting because the Renaissance style furnished wall spaces in abundance, and demanded for its completion the services of the painters"—shows such curious ignorance of the relation between the great works of the wall-painters, Giotto, Orcagna, Fra Angelico, etc., and the fifteenth century and Renaissance, that we are persuaded that this is mere haphazard conjecture as to what wall-painting was in the fifteenth and what in the fourteenth centuries.

Baltimore and the Nineteenth of April, 1861. By George William Brown, Chief Judge of the Supreme Bench of Baltimore and Mayor of the City in 1861. Baltimore: R. Murray, Publication Agent Johns Hopkins University.

THIS is a valuable contribution to the history of the rebellion, being a clear and candid account of the memorable and shameful attack upon the Sixth Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers by a mob in the streets of Baltimore on the 19th of April, 1861. The regiment was the first to respond to President Lincoln's call of April 15, 1861, for militia "to maintain the honor, the integrity, and existence of our national Union, and the perpetuity of popular government"; and was en route to the national capital when it was attacked.

The author, Judge Brown, was then Mayor of Baltimore, and not only did all in his power to prevent disorder, but, after the attack began, joined the assaulted troops and gallantly marched through the streets to the depot at the head of the column, and saw the regiment embark upon the cars and move out of the city upon the journey to Washington. In the attacks, four of the soldiers and twelve civilians were killed and thirty-six soldiers wounded. The number of civilians wounded is not known.

Fort Sumter had been taken by the Confederates about a week before, but as the capture had not been attended by loss of life, the author regards the fight in the streets of Baltimore as the more momentous of the two affairs, and he goes so far as to say that the bombardment and capture of Fort Sumter by the Confederates "did not necessarily mean war between North and South"; but that it was the shedding of blood in Baltimore that made "accommodation" impossible. There are many who do not concur in that opinion. The unbearable insult to the Government and the North was offered at Sumter. There was then no question of accommodation—no question about "war between North and South." War was from that moment prevailing, and the only question was when peace would be restored. There is no probability that the outrage of bombarding Fort Sumter could or would have been "accommodated." The collision in Baltimore probably had but little more effect upon the question of peace or war than a drop of blood from a tap on the nose would have in a quarrel between two gentlemen, after one had been deliberately, defiantly, and publicly slapped in the face with the open hand of the other.

The author begins his book by citing a coincidence between the collisions at Lexington, April 19, 1775, and Baltimore, April 19, 1861, and gives it as the point of difference between them that the attack at Lexington was prepared and deliberate, whereas the attack in Baltimore was a sudden "uprising of popular fury." The comparison is interesting, but is hardly sound, from the fact that the action in Baltimore cannot fairly be called a sudden uprising. In fact, this book affords abundant evidence that it was of steady growth. On the eighteenth of April, the day before the attack, as some regular troops and four companies of militia passed through Baltimore, "a large crowd assembled at the station and followed the soldiers in their march to the Washington station, with abuse and threats" (pp. 36–7); and in the evening of that day "a meeting of the States' Rights Convention was held at Taylor's building, where it was alleged very strong ground was taken against the passage of any more troops through Baltimore, and armed resistance to it threatened." One of the resolutions adopted said: "The massing of large bodies of militia, exclusively from the free States, in the District of Columbia is uncalled for, and is a standing menace to the State of Maryland," etc. Stronger evidence even than this that the purpose of attack was not sudden, is afforded by a letter dated April 20, 1861, from the author of this book to Gov. Andrew of Massachusetts. The author said in that letter: "No one deplores the sad events of yesterday in this city more deeply than myself, but they were inevitable. Our people viewed the passage of armed troops to another State through the streets as an invasion of our soil, and could not be restrained." This is about as good a description of the feeling that prevailed at Lexington as at Baltimore. As to the character of the men engaged, the author tells us that a wealthy merchant of long experience, usually a peaceful man, was indicted for participation in the riot, and that one of the leading rioters, then a young man, is now "a peaceful merchant." With these explanations of the riot, taken from the book itself, it cannot be admitted that "the attack by the mob in Baltimore was a sudden uprising of popular fury," in any sense that would mitigate the crimes committed or the disgrace of the occurrence.

The author devotes a chapter to showing that the alleged plot to assassinate Mr. Lincoln when he passed through Baltimore in February, 1861, was mere fiction; and he aims to establish the point that Mr. Lincoln's "midnight ride through Baltimore, and the charge that its citizens were plotting the President's assassination, helped to feed the flame of excitement," and thus contributed to the attack upon the troops which was made two months afterwards. The real cause of the attack, just given, effectually disposes of this attempt to make Mr. Lincoln's action, or the story of the plot to assassinate him, accountable for it.

Judge Brown, a Baltimorean, has, naturally enough, written from a Baltimore point of view. His duties in those dreadful times were difficult and dangerous, and from September 17, 1861, to November 12, 1862, he was held by the Government as a prisoner of state, and confined at Forts McHenry, Monroe, Lafayette, and Warren. Yet he does "nothing extenuate, nor set down aught in malice." He treats his subject calmly, judicially, honestly, ably; and his book, covering events of great importance before and after the attack upon the Sixth Massachusetts regiment, is written with clearness and force. He says of himself: "I was deeply attached to the Union from feeling imbibed in early childhood and constantly strengthened by knowledge and personal experience. . . . I did not believe in secession as a constitutional right, and in Maryland there was no sufficient ground for revolution. . . . It was my opinion that the Confederacy would prove to be a rope of sand." But he adds: "I thought the seceding States should have been allowed to depart in peace, as Gen. Scott advised." In justice to Gen. Scott, it should be noted that allowing the "wayward sister" to depart in peace was not a measure that he advised, but an alternative that he mentioned.

Judge Brown says he believed that their own interests and the necessities of the situation would induce the seceding States, after they had tried it alone, to return "to the old Union, but with slavery peacefully abolished." This is a striking and novel opinion. The reasons for it are not given; nor are they to be found in the formation or action of the Confederate Government, slavery being the foundation upon which that structure was built. It is hardly conceivable that the Southern States could be so short-sighted as to leave the Union at the risk of war, and establish a new government based upon slavery, and then abandon the "institution" and return without it to the Union they had left to perpetuate it.

It sounds strangely in these times to hear that the regularly constituted authorities of Baltimore formally ordered the burning of railroad bridges to prevent the passage of troops to Washington in response to the call of the President; and that delegations—to one of which the author of this book belonged—visited President Lincoln and compelled, or at least induced, him to agree that the forces which he, the constitutional Commander-in-Chief, had ordered to the defence of the capital, should, in a time of public danger, depart from their direct route and pass around Baltimore, in deference to the wishes or the threats of people of that city.

Judge Brown well says that we are now "living in a different land and under a different Constitution," and that the results achieved by the war "are worth all they have cost." On the other hand, he believes the new state of affairs is not without its dangers, and says that "Communism, socialism, and labor strikes have taken the place of slavery agitation," and that "many people have come to believe that this is a paternal Government, from which they have a right to ask favors, and not a republic in which all are equal." He believes, also, that "there is a dangerous tendency towards the centralization of power in the national Government, with little opposition on the part of the people." But, notwithstanding these drawbacks, he says: "I rejoice to believe there is a reserve power in the American people which has never yet failed to redress great wrongs when they have come to be fully recognized and understood." In that belief we heartily concur.

The Genealogical Dictionary of Rhode Island; comprising three generations of settlers who came before 1690. (With many families carried to the fourth generation.) By John Osborne Austin. Albany: Joel Munsell's Sons 1887. Folio, pp. 443.

THIS work is dedicated to the memory of James Savage, and is virtually a reëditing of the Rhode Island names in Savage's 'Genealogical Dictionary of New England.' It is, if we mistake not, the first attempt to do for a single State what Savage did for the original four, and as such it marks an epoch in the establishment of American pedigrees. It will hereafter be the alpha of research on the part of those who claim a Rhode Island descent. Mr. Austin's preface is singularly modest. "The material gathered in these pages," he says, "was drawn from many sources. It is presented to the reader by a clear method, requiring but little explanation, though the plan is a comprehensive one, and the arrangement in some respects original." This plan is as follows: The page, of generous dimensions, is divided into three columns—the first about the width of one of our own, the second about twice as broad, the third narrowest of all. The first column is reserved for the founder, the second for his children, the third for his grandchildren, of whom merely the names are entered. All the information displayed is first-hand, from town and probate records, deeds, court reports, tax lists, etc. Care is taken to give abstracts of wills and inventories. In a summary way we get a picture of early New England life, and Mr. Austin preserves what quaint or humorous touches fall in his way, like this coroner's verdict, "that the lad, the widow Ballou, her son, named Samuel Ballou, going into the river which runneth to the mill in Providence, to wash himself, was by a Providence of God drowned."

The critic feels like multiplying words in order to seem to do justice to so great and so successful a labor as this. Yet it is enough to say that Mr. Austin is a worthy disciple of Savage, bettering (with ampler resources) his example, and evincing his qualities of self-effacement and scrupulous accuracy—brushing aside foolish tradition in favor of evidence that cannot be gainsaid. We have tested this Dictionary in ways which satisfy us that it may be relied upon; its mere typographical punctiliousness is highly praiseworthy. The compiler has supplied two and a half pages of additions and corrections, and time will surely reveal others that must be made; but, owing to circumstances peculiar to Rhode Island, it is doubtful if further research will so greatly alter the record here made up that this Dictionary will ever be superseded. Mr. Austin has at least the satisfaction of knowing that no one could have performed his task better, and that he has not postponed or suppressed a more competent undertaking of the same kind. His Dictionary is printed from type, the edition is limited, and it must soon be considerably enhanced in value.

Years of Experience: An Autobiographical Narrative. By Georgiana Bruce Kirby. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

THE old question, "Have we a Bourbon among us?" could have been answered by the late author of this autobiography in the affirmative, with reference to her own person. An irregular connection gave her Louis Joseph, Prince de Condé, for her great-grandfather, and her family history takes us through all phases of living, from the splendors of Chantilly to California "roughing it." Miss Bruce, however, came into the world a middle-class Englishwoman, with the very smallest trace of French descent. She was plain-featured, with little æsthetic sensibility, early in revolt against the suppression of her sex in the household, against convention generally, and against Calvinism. The account of her home life, though sufficiently dreary, is interesting for its distinctly British stamp, and forms an artistic contrast to the romance of her pedigree. The independence which led her to cross the ocean for a career of her own, shifts the scene to the backwoods of Canada, where spiritual freedom and the charm of the novel landscape put a new phase on existence; and of this the cheerful reminiscence evokes corresponding feelings on the part of the reader. A greater metamorphosis was in store for the young teacher when she took service in the family of the Rev. Dr. Gannett of Boston, and was presently encouraged by him to seek admission to Brook Farm.

The chapters relating to this social experiment are much the most valuable in the book, yet are disappointing as a description of the every-day working of the community. It is extraordinary that, with so many men and women of fine literary gifts among the founders and inmates of Brook Farm, not a single plain, unvarnished report has been written of what went on there, what tests of membership were applied, how labor and wages were apportioned, what the farm products were, the whole course of development into a Fourierite phalanx, and the final collapse. Not even a diary of this character has emerged, and we doubt if any could have been kept except by some one with a sense of humor that would have prevented either his joining or his remaining with the association. We say this not unmindful of the author of 'The Potiphar Papers,' who is commemorated by Mrs. Kirby for his delightful singing and playful masquerading as Fanny Ellsler; or of our esteemed contemporary, the editor of the Sun, gratefully remembered as a stimulating teacher of German at Brook Farm, unconscious of his latent capacity for comic journalism. Mrs. Kirby's recollections are personal rather than systematic, and are vitiated by a feminine disregard of chronological particularity. She vindicates Margaret Fuller against Hawthorne in the best manner, by quoting letters from her which reveal her kind and generous nature. She touches off Lloyd Fuller, Margaret's youngest brother, "a large-headed, loose-jointed lad of sixteen, with some down on his upper lip," who did keep a diary, "principally, it would seem, for the purpose of letting others understand his opinion of them, for he tore pages out, occasionally, and dropped them where those he had criticised severely would be likely to pick them up." To the head of the community and "the master of moral philosophy," sitting in the hall library, Miss Bruce was once moved to confide her satisfaction in her environment:

> "At first he did not hear me; then I spoke louder, leaning over the banisters:
> "'Mr. Ripley, Mr. Ripley, I am perfectly happy.'
> "It had seemed to me abundantly worth while that he, who had been prominently instrumental in bringing this happiness about, should be apprised of the fact. But he only glanced up with an absent expression, and said:
> "'Ah, indeed!'
> "And my high spirits received a sensible check. I had not spoken at an opportune moment, nor could he immediately withdraw his attention from the book he was reading."

Many other amusing passages would invite quotation did space permit. Under the Fourierite régime, "the word went abroad that Brook Farm wanted skilled mechanics in place of transcendental enthusiasts, and they began to come. The women were, as a rule, inferior to the men, and with less executive ability than the late poetic dreamers. It was plain that there could be no congeniality between the new-comers and those who had been so united under the first dispensation. The charm was swiftly dispelled." By and by, "the mechanics who were to be the bone and sinew of the new order, had raised the cry of 'democracy,' 'aristocracy,' in their most senseless acceptance, and had especially assailed Messrs. Ripley and Dana." The end was close at hand.

No change could seem greater than from Brook Farm to Sing Sing prison, where Miss Bruce next sought occupation as an assistant matron with Mrs. Farnham and Mrs. Mary Ann Johnson. This chapter offers a high degree of painful interest, and is in every way profitable reading. Seminary teaching in Illinois followed, and then plantation (white) school-teaching in Missouri, furnishing inside views of slavery; whence, by an easy transition, returning to the East, Miss Bruce became governess in the house of Robert Purvis of Philadelphia. Her final chapter is a bundle of anti-slavery reminiscences, in which we notice some confusion of dates and some improbabilities, for which the lapse of time is responsible.

As this book doubtless went to press without Mrs. Kirby's revision, we will not insist on the typographical errors in which it abounds. None is more remarkable than "Jonesbery" (p. 135) for Jones Very; though "Francis Wright Darnsmont" (p. 278) for Frances Wright Darusmont ranks not far behind.

Studies in Musical History. By Louis S. Davis. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1887. Pp. 164.

ALTHOUGH occasionally somewhat dry and didactic, this brief collection of essays is well worth the attention of music-lovers, few of whom can read it without learning something new and interesting, and without a freshened enthusiasm for what is best in their art. The author is evidently an organist. In the two chapters on his instrument, he points out many of the commonest faults of organists, one of which is the mania for improvising, notwithstanding that there is a vast amount of available music by the greatest masters. "Suppose that any person of ordinary musical talent should call together an audience and improvise for their delectation on the piano, violin, or any other instrument; how long would it be tolerated? Yet in the performance of the most sacred office of music, this impertinence goes unchallenged." In a paper on the Choral, Mr. Davis justly inveighs against the absurd titles, such as Uxbridge, Manchester, Birmingham, etc., given to church hymns, and pleads for the introduction, in place of these vapid productions, of the meaty German chorales. A very few of these "have found their way into our hymnody, and the fact of the popularity of such hymns as Dundee and Old Hundred shows that the introduction of the whole Luther choral would be by the mass of the people welcomed and adopted." "In Germany children are taught to sing the choral just as they are taught to read and write. These hymns are the heritage of the people, and the school-children know them, not by some irrelevant, meaningless title, but by that one text which they were intended to interpret." The "Use and Influence of Bells" is the title of a long chapter in which Mr. Davis, among other things, remarks on the influence bells have had on architecture. It is to them that churches owe their towers, which were originally built in order that the summoning tones might be heard at a greater distance, and less harshly near by. Many are the ecclesiastic and domestic associations connected with bells, and yet the bell has had its day, as Mr. Davis admits. The watch and the newspaper have taken its place as an enunciator of time and of events, and the complaints of invalids and others that bells are a nuisance have not remained unheeded.

Among the other essays in this volume those on "Color and Thought in Music," "Teachers and Taught," and "The Modern Song" are the most readable. The first named contains an excellent page on the influence which association has in determining our musical likings. "A Scotchman once said to me that he would rather hear the bagpipes than any other instrument. I thought it bad, not to say execrable, taste. On me it produced only the effect of sensation, but on him that of beloved association." The following is also worth quoting: "Men want exact thinkers nowadays in music as in philosophy. We don't want love-songs tacked on to psalm tunes, nor sacred texts found in the company of Moody and Sankey."

Les Solutions Démocratiques de la Question des Impots. Par Léon Say. 2 vols. Paris. 1886.

M. SAY has, in his latest work, produced a study which ought to be in the hands of every thinking workingman. The demagogues (and they are not all politicians, for some who profess to teach political economy are strongly tinged with the true demagogic spirit) flatter the laborer that, by a sudden revolution, the social structure may be changed so as to obliterate the distinction between capital and labor, to make the laborer other than he is, and independent of his daily toil. We have been surfeited with treatises on the labor question, ranging from those which tell the workingman to stay where he is and accept his destiny, to those which coddle him and flatter him with the hope that all may be his, did he only act. It is pleasant to light upon such a study as that of M. Say, for it holds out no ready-made scheme of universal happiness; it takes men as they are. Moreover, it carries the war into the camp of the discontents, and, taking up the claim of the enemy, subjects it to analysis and criticism, showing that both practice and theory prove that the means are inadequate to the proposed objects, and are even ruinous and destructive to those who resort to them. This is the true function of the economist; and for this task M. Say is peculiarly fitted, by an inherited aptitude, by careful study, and by a wide practical experience as a banker and a man of affairs. To these qualities he adds a clear and concise style, contrasting strongly with the involved paragraphs of the dreamer who seems hardly conscious himself of what he desires.

Taxation forms a convenient instrument for working injustice under the pretence of effecting a public benefit, and it is as weapons of offence that some of the earliest forms of taxation meet the student, and especially in the customs, where the idea of discriminating between native and foreigner has always availed. It is a like abuse of the tax function to levy taxes upon one class of the community for the benefit of another, or to tax one class and exempt arbitrarily another. Though the tariff may again be cited, that is not a democratic instrument, and it is not the tax which is urged by "democracy"—by which M. Say means the workingmen. Their end, they believe, can be better attained by a graduated income tax, and this is proposed in the platforms of the "labor party" in the United States as well as in France.

The idea of a graduated tax, based upon a division of the population into classes, is an old one, and the crude attempts to frame a capitation tax graduated according to the rank of the taxable, show how naturally the conception of such a tax arises. It is hardly necessary to say that such a tax, no matter how minutely apportioned, is one of the most arbitrary and unequal that can be laid, and it was not long before it was discarded. While this idea of graduating taxes is of ancient date, it was intended to work justice by equalizing burdens; to make it an instrument of injustice is a refinement of modern times which has arisen in a not unnatural manner, and nowhere more logically than in France. For centuries there was a struggle against personal taxes and in favor of taxes on real property. The system of personal taxes lent itself with peculiar readiness to inequality, and, when subject to the capricious rapacity of a king, the greed and interest of a farmer of taxes, or even the general laws of the land controlled by certain classes of the community, the inequality became still greater. So that, at the time of the French Revolution, it would be scarcely an exaggeration to assert that in no two provinces of the kingdom were taxes assessed and collected in the same manner, hardly two persons in the land paid taxes according to the same rule. Property counted for nothing as a basis of assessment—the individual was all; and a glance at Taine's 'Ancien Régime' will show to what an extent personal taxes were engines of oppression. The very name taille or corvée awakens no thoughts unattended by conceptions of dire tyranny.

To abolish this inequality and substitute for it equality was the aim of the democracy which grew out of the Revolution; and in furthering their views they had the support of the economists of that day, to whom the system of personal taxation was no less obnoxious, both in theory and in practice, than it was to the people. The details of what was accomplished need not be recounted; in the end a double tax on income resulted. The capitation tax, by being divided and subdivided according to rank or profession, becomes in reality a tax on income, like the class-tax of Germany, while the principles of a land tax are extended to personal property; and, from taxing the property or capital, it is but one step to taxing the income derived from that property or capital.

Later it is seen that the progress of reform divorces it from justice. Instead of continuing to seek to equalize burdens and sacrifices by applying the principles laid down by political economy, the new democracy turned against their former oppressors—the rich and privileged—and, by the very instrument which, if properly controlled, would produce a new and just tax system, they sought and still seek to pull down capital, which they still regard as their oppressor. Whether persons or property are to be taxed, income or capital, the idea is the same—to impose a heavier burden upon the rich, or rather upon the capitalist, than a true adjustment of sacrifices would demand. In other words, taxation is to become an instrument for effecting a new distribution of wealth, for transferring wealth from those who have to those who have not.

It is through the machinery of a graduated income tax that this new system is to be made effective. But how is the tax to be assessed? To judge by outward appearances is most unsatisfactory, though the French adopted at one time the rents of buildings as a gauge of the occupants' income. Proportionality would seem to be the only safe rule: double or treble the income, double or treble the tax. This is not the rule that has been adopted, for, after a few stages, it becomes unendurable, practically amounting to confiscation. To obviate this difficulty, the supporters of the system frame a scale, say one per cent. on incomes less than $2,000, two per cent. on incomes from $2,000 to $5,000—a scale which is not only purely arbitrary, but results in restoring that personal taxation which prevailed in the last century. Where the scale is high, it is destructive to capital, and where it is low it is unproductive of revenue. In any case there is danger of tapping the stream which supplies trade and industry with the aliment they require, and on which national progress depends. Wherever it has been tried (and M. Say examines in detail the systems of taxing income in England, Germany, France, Switzerland, and Italy), it has failed of its purpose, and has introduced an element of uncertainty, and almost of oppression, which has proved noxious to the best interests of the community. Nor should the efforts to tax incomes made in the United States during the last war be omitted, though M. Say takes no notice of them. The short experience at that time proved how impossible it was to assess and collect an income tax under the Federal Government, even when the idea of graduation had been applied; and certainly no State could attempt a like measure without doing violence to its economic welfare.

The zeal of Proudhon in behalf of the workingman can hardly be questioned, yet no one could be more intensely prejudiced against the graduated income tax. At the other extreme stands Mill, who denounced such a tax as graduated robbery. In the light of such severe condemnation by labor reformers and orthodox economists, and in the face of a full experience which has not shown brilliant results when confined within safe bounds, it were madness to advocate so dangerous a remedy, and one so capable of being abused. Dangerous it would be, for what situation could be more replete with danger than one in which taxes are collected from one part of the community to be expended by another?

Nearly fifty years ago M. Thiers sought to check Socialism by showing how impracticable and mischievous were the schemes advanced by Socialists. M. Say's treatise should be placed with Thiers's 'La Propriété,' for it has the same object in view, and is even more timely and practical.

The Aztecs, their History, Manners, and Customs. From the French of Lucien Biart. Authorized translation by J. L. Garner. 1 Vol. 8vo, pages 342. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. 1887.

THIS book contains nothing new, and yet, despite this most damaging fact, it will be found to have a certain use in so far as it gives us the history of these people as it is usually told, together with an account of their civil and religious polity and their manners and customs, in a more compact and convenient form than we remember to have met with elsewhere.

Brief as this criticism may be, it is all that the work calls for, and we should feel justified in dismissing it without further notice, were it not that, in view of the modern method of investigation, the plan which our author has followed of repeating the accounts of the early writers without a word of explanation or a note of warning (except, perhaps, in one instance), seems to invite comment. And here it may be well to premise that we do not propose to concern ourselves with the story of the wanderings of these people before they finally settled down in the valley of Mexico, nor do we intend to question the accuracy of the account here given of the career of conquest which they are said to have subsequently followed, and which resulted in placing them at the head of the confederacy that opposed the advance of Cortes. All that we are told on these points may or may not be true; but as it can be neither proved nor disproved, it may be passed over with the simple remark that it is not more impossible or improbable than are many of the stories connected with the early histories of Greece and Rome, which we were once taught to regard as fact, but which are now looked upon as fable.

What, however, we do object to, is the false idea which a perusal of these early records must inevitably give of the social and political condition of the ancient Mexicans, unless they are accompanied by a friendly word of caution as to the proper mode of interpreting them. Formerly no such warning was ever given or deemed necessary. We accepted the accounts as they came down to us literally, just as is often done to-day, and hence the prevalence of the extravagant ideas as to the high type of civilization of which these people are assumed to have been the exemplars. For this mistake on our part, the old chroniclers are not wholly responsible. They have not, as a rule, been guilty of any intentional misstatements, neither have they indulged in any very great amount of exaggeration, save when it became necessary to magnify the courage and achievements of the Spanish conquerors; but it is we who, failing to make due allowance for the circumstances under which they wrote, have persistently misunderstood them. Thus, for instance, when one of these old worthies, making use of the only terminology with which he was acquainted, describes an Indian pueblo and its inhabitants in terms that were suited to the Court of Madrid and the Church of Rome, but which were totally out of place in the connection in which they were used, we do not interpret them by what we know of the manners and customs of the Indians who were here when the Europeans first arrived, as indeed we ought to do; but we endeavor to read them by the light of the civilization that prevailed in the Spanish peninsula at the time of the conquest, and this of course, leads us into error. Fortunately, however, all this is now in process of change. The comparative method of study, now so generally employed in investigating questions of this character, has been used by writers like Morgan and Bandelier with brilliant results; and, thanks to their efforts, we are gradually arriving at a correct appreciation of the position which the Aztecs, or, as we prefer to call them, the ancient Mexicans, had reached in the scale of development.

Under this mode of treatment, Montezuma, "the King," disappears, and in his place we have a simple war chief, such as might have been found among the Creeks, the Iroquois, or any other of our "military democracies." Rude communal houses of mud and stone are no longer described as "palaces" with marble columns, etc., and we have ceased to speak of a medicine lodge on top of a mound as a "temple." So, too, we have come to recognize the fact that industries and institutions which were once thought to be characteristic of the Mexicans, and upon which their claim to a higher civilization was based, were not unknown to the Indians east of the Mississippi and south of the great lakes. A counterpart, for example, to the Mexican merchant might have been found in the Huron peddler who travelled hundreds of miles in search of a purchaser for his wares. The famous feather dresses which so captivated the fancy of the Spanish chroniclers did not, probably, differ from the "match coats" that were in such general use among our own Indians, except in the brilliant plumage of the birds from which they were made; and a "public treasure," or general purse, made up by voluntary contributions, or by tribute from conquered tribes, and devoted to the exercise of tribal hospitality and to defraying what may be justly termed public expenditures, was common to the Iroquois, the Creeks, and the Florida tribes as well as to the Mexicans.

But it is unnecessary to pursue this branch of the subject further, though it would be an easy matter to swell the list of these resemblances to an indefinite extent. Enough, however, has been said to show the method of investigation that is now generally adopted, and to foreshadow the conclusion towards which the researches on this point now tend. Indeed, we might even go further, and venture the assertion that among the aborigines of America there prevailed at this time but one phase of development from Canada to Panama. Differences, no doubt, there were among the numerous tribes that held this region, in their domestic arts, their customs, and, possibly, in their forms of worship: but these are believed to be differences of degree and not of kind, and they consequently do not imply a difference in the civilization of the peoples among whom they were found. Probably there exist to-day, and within this city, greater differences, and more of them, than could have been found, at the date of the Spanish conquest, in the whole of the two Americas from Greenland to Tierra del Fuego.

Fine Arts.

SOCIETY OF AMERICAN ARTISTS.—I.

THE ninth exhibition of the Society of American Artists, now open at the Yandell Gallery at Fifth Avenue and Nineteenth Street, is the best the Society has yet held. It is not a large exhibition, containing but 148 numbers in all, but by reason of the high average of the work, and the excellent arrangement of the pictures on the walls, it ranks far above any other exhibition of native art of the present year. The small number of contributions from Europe is remarkable. At other exhibitions of the Society Mr. Sargent, or Mr. Dannat, or Mr. Whistler, Mr. Donoho, or Mr. Harrison, among the members of the Society, have sent pictures of note, and other painters in the foreign colony have forwarded a fair proportion. This year we find only Mr. Davis's two landscapes, Mr. Melchers's small genre, Mr. Metcalf's and Mr. Hitchcock's and Mr. Stark's three pictures, or six in all. A pastel head by M. Rajon is to be added to these, and the rest is home work. As to originality, there are very few conventional canvases. Mr. Metcalf's "Goose Girl," No. 96, an excellent outdoor study of a peasant girl at Grez, with the Grez willows and the familiar River Loing as a setting, is one, however; being exactly like a dozen other pictures painted at Grez by other artists, and painted with the eyes of others. Mr. Beckwith's portrait, No. 6, and Mr. Rice's portrait, No. 110, may be likewise criticised for a leaning to the methods of Carolus Duran. Mr. Blum's "Venetian Palaces," No. 13, is not without resemblance to the work of Rico; Mr. Chase's portrait, No. 30, shows slightly the influence of Whistler; and in Mr. Cox's large decoration, No. 37, there is a suspicion of unconscious imitation of some of the work of the Venetians. It is hypercritical, perhaps, to pick out these few instances for remark, for they are unoriginal to a degree only. In general, as we have said, originality is the stamp of this exhibition, and is all the more striking in that it is so diversified. It is as noticeable in the landscape as in the figure work also.

To begin with the latter, could there be a more personal piece of painting than the "Portrait," No. 16, by Robert B. Brandegee? It is an admirable head, exactly yet freely drawn, broadly painted, without a suggestion of endeavor to be flippantly clever. It is natural, honest, and real. It has some defects, it is true, such as a slight muddiness of color in the shadows, and a lack of simplicity in the modelling of the chin; but these are lost sight of in looking at the head as a whole. It is free from affectation, and has a completeness about it that makes of this painting of the simplest of subjects a real work of art. The "Portrait of Mrs. H.," No. 28, by William M. Chase, exhibits some of the best qualities of good painting. The full-length figure of a lady in walking costume is real and life-like; in the painting of it, all things of moment are properly insisted on, without undue attention to detail. It is one of the eminently original works in the exhibition, though it may not be essentially different in treatment from other portraits by the same artist, who must now be conceded a position by himself. He has a style of his own and is strong enough to have followers. His "Portrait of My Sister," No. 32, is charming. The naïve, girlish pose of the figure is thoroughly in character, and there is a delicacy of observation in the painting of the various parts of the white dress productive of the keenest sort of pleasure. The head is well modelled and fresh in color, and the figure again, as in the other painting, is well drawn. These two portraits are enough in themselves to give Mr. Chase a dominant place in the exhibition, but we find in "Portrait," No. 21, a small half-length of a seated figure of a lady, another delightful little bit of color and the most skilful sort of painting; in "Landscape," No. 29—a simple motive of land and sky—a delicate note of color; and in "Prospect Park, Brooklyn," No. 32, one of the most refreshing and truthful little transcripts of nature, smiling in the sunshine and full of light and air, that it would be possible to imagine. It is only at the Society of American Artists that we are accustomed to see Mr. Chase's work exhibited, and he has never been seen to better advantage than he is this year.

Edmond C. Tarbell, a new name in New York exhibitions, makes an unequivocal success with his "Portrait of Miss S.," No. 121. This young lady, in her well-fitting gown of black silk, standing by a small table with a wrap of silk and fur at her feet behind her, is of a type such as it is not easy to paint successfully. The face is subtle; it is not simply pretty, nor is it of the strikingly handsome style, more common in women of maturer age than this young lady. It is refined and delicate, sweet in expression and rather negative in character—something very American, and yet without the distinguishing marks of race, as we find them in the women of Europe. Now Mr. Tarbell has made of this portrait a picture that is good in every way. From the technical point of view it is simply and directly painted; the figure is well placed on the canvas and is well drawn. It is agreeable, almost handsome in color. From the point of view of the general observer, it is a beautiful picture of a refined and gently bred young lady. There is scarce a fault to find with the painting, it is so even throughout. If it does not possess the personality of the work of Mr. Chase or Mr. Brandegee or Mr. Dewing, it has a charm of its own to distinguish it. This portrait must be classed well up among the best things in the gallery. Dennis M. Bunker, in "Portrait," No. 21, has painted a life-size sitting female figure which is as remarkable for positiveness of type as Mr. Tarbell's is for the absence of it. The head is intellectual, and the face seems to be that of a person of strength of mind and force of character. There is an air of gravity in the simple black costume in which the figure is clad, in the plain arrangement of the hair and the absence of ruffles or ruches about the neck or wrists. The background to this sober figure is a simple mass of gray, as severe and unadorned as the figure itself. It is pleasant to find an artist laying out for himself such a serious study, and Mr. Bunker has in the main been successful in his treatment of it. It is somewhat hard and edgy in parts, like some of Mr. Thayer's work—notably in the turn of the side of the face, which does not round off into the background, but has a papery, flat look. The black of the dress is of a handsome tone. Most remarkable, however, is the important element of drawing.

A small half-length figure of a lady in evening dress of black, with the head seen in profile, "Portrait," No. 49, by T. W. Dewing, is of a sort only to be found at the exhibitions of this Society. That such a delicate bit of refined drawing and color would hold its own in another exhibition, among whatever gaudy landscapes or carmine-cheeked milkmaids it might chance to be placed, no one can doubt; but here, surrounded by congenial company, on a wall adapted to an art exhibition, it may be properly seen, and, thus seen, cannot fail to be appreciated. It is one of the gems of the exhibition.

Such a collection of portraits as these half dozen we have been discussing is enough of itself to place the exhibition on a high level. But there are other portraits here which invite notice: "Portrait of a Young Lady," No. 72, by Miss W. D. Hawley, is an excellent little head, well drawn and simply modelled. "Portrait of a Child," No. 35, by Kenyon Cox, a small profile head of a little girl, though almost devoid of color, is refined in treatment, and is a clever piece of drawing. "Portrait of Mrs. R. W. G.," No. 60, by Wyatt Eaton, a half-length picture of a lady, is remarkable for some excellent qualities of color, notably in the hands, and for an air of repose and dignity in the subject. "Portrait of Mrs. J.," No. 96, by Wilson de Meza, an outdoor study, possesses considerable truth of observation; the head especially being successfully modelled, with the subtle gradations produced by the diffused light of the open air. "Portrait of Miss Phoebe Russell," No. 110, by W. M. J. Rice, a life-size, full-length figure in Florentine costume, though somewhat empty and loose in construction, is broadly painted and good in general effect. "Portrait," No. 62, and "Portrait," No. 63, by Miss Rosina Emmett, and "Portrait," No 147, by Irving R. Wiles, have serious qualities, and are creditable productions even when judged by the high standard which prevails about them. "Portrait of a Child," No. 6, by J. Carroll Beckwith, is as cleverly painted as usual, but it is not of this artist's best. Directly and accurately drawn, it is inharmonious in color. "Portrait Head," No. 51, and "Portrait of Lady and Dog," No. 53, by Thomas Eakins, are curious specimens of the work of a man of reputation whose presence here can only be accounted for on the supposition that traditions have some weight in the Society as well as in less progressive bodies of artists. In sculpture, "Portrait Bust," No. 71, by J. S. Hartley, well modelled and strong in character; "Bust of J. Carroll Beckwith," No. 17, by George T. Brewster, which is fleshy in modelling and life-like, though not over just as a likeness; "Portrait of a Lady," No. 61, a bust in plaster by F. Edwin Elwell, a refined and simply treated head of a young woman; and "Portrait of a Lady, Bust in Bronze," No. 139, by Olin L. Warner, must be noted in the long list of portrait work in the exhibition. It is in portraits more than in any other sort of work that the greatest progress seems to have been made since last year. Of the landscapes we shall have to speak at another time.

Mr. Kenyon Cox, in "Painting and Poetry," No. 37, has carried out a happy idea of painting, in the form of a decoration with life-size figures, the admirable design for the dedication to his well-known illustrations of the 'Blessed Damozel.' It is not greatly to his discredit that he has been only partially successful. The painting of the nude figure which personifies the Art of Painting seems to be perfunctory and without truth of form. The legs and feet are by no means well drawn. The head, which, in his small drawing, was excellent in character, amounting almost to a creation of a new type, is here ordinary and coarse. The best part of this figure is the torso, in which there is really good painting of the nude. Much better in ensemble is the draped figure of Poetry. This large canvas, in spite of faults of detail, is in general exceedingly effective. It is agreeable in tone and finely composed.

"Woman and Swan," No. 123, by Abbot H. Thayer, is, we take it, but another title for "Leda," long a favorite subject with painters: there is such a delightful chance to contrast the flesh tones with the dull white mass of the swan's feathered body, such a rare opportunity to paint a woman's hand nestling caressingly on the bird's white plumage, such graceful lines to be found in the curve of his neck and in the recumbent figure of the woman. Mr. Thayer's picture is an unequal performance. On the one hand, the woman's right thigh and knee, with the muddy brownish flesh color and hot brown patches of paint to represent shadows, are most disagreeable; on the other, her neck and bosom are luminous and beautiful in color and delicate in modelling. The well-poised head is well drawn and simply painted, but it is outlined with an ugly stripe around the edges which cuts it out as sharply as if it were made of paper. This is a picture with excellent qualities and striking faults. Mr. Thayer's work is becoming more and more mannered. It is a long step downward from the "Portrait of a Lady with the Horse," the admirable picture shown by him in one of the Society's first exhibitions, to the "Woman and Swan"; yet if he were a new-comer, the "Woman and Swan" would make him distinguished.

HOMŒOPATHY.—"Strong" drink does not imply "strong" men, nor "strong" language "strong" minds, nor "strong" medicines power over strong diseases. Violence, grossness, and malignity are not power. Though a byword for mildness, Homœopathy's medicines were powerful enough to reduce cholera's death-rate to 7 per cent.; under "strong" medicines it was 50 per cent.; so in yellow-fever and "incurable" pleuro-pneumonia. Ours is the oldest Homœopathic house and its medicines are standard. Many druggists sell them. Price lists, catalogues, etc., sent free.

SCRIBNER & WELFORD, 743-745 BROADWAY, N. Y.

NEW AND POPULAR FICTION.

TO BE PUBLISHED SATURDAY.

In Ole Virginia,

MARSE CHAN, and Other Stories. By Thomas Nelson Page. Including "Unc' Edinburg's Drowndin'," Meh Lady, Ole 'Stracted, "No Haid Pawn," and Polly. Cloth, 12mo, $1.25.

"Three years ago Thomas Nelson Page . . . published 'Marse Chan,' a story of Virginia before and during the war. . . . a truthful, dramatic, pathetic, and at the same time delightfully humorous representation. Consequently Mr. Page enjoys the reputation of having written the most exquisite story of the war that has yet appeared. . . . These stories have been felicitously characterized as 'variant treatments of the same motif,' for which we feel no disposition to quarrel with Mr. Page, being eager to hear the tale as often as he may find ways to tell it, and grateful to him for such beautiful and faithful pictures of a society now become a portion and parcel of the irrevocable past."—Harper's Magazine.

NEW EDITION IN PAPER COVERS.

Face to Face.

By Robert Grant. Price, 50 cents. Also in cloth, 12mo, $1.25.

"A story of very unusual power. Its realistic pictures of summer life at Newport and Lenox are 'written from the inside,' so to speak, and from this graphic panorama the story develops into a profound and thoughtful presentation of the social problem of the day—the war of labor and capital; while the love story running through it is intense and absorbing."—Boston Traveller.

RECENTLY ISSUED.

The Story of a New York House.

By H. C. BUNNER. Illustrated by A. B. FROST. Cloth, 12mo, $1.25.

"Mr. Bunner's most eminent characteristic is an exquisite taste, a faultless literary breeding; and in this book, even more than in its predecessors, is shown his unerring instinct of literary refinement, which yet does not lack in strength and is fully masculine. The story must not be judged as a novel; it is not a figure piece but rather a landscape into which figures are slightly sketched. As such, however, it is one of the artistic successes of the year."—The New York World.

Dr. Sevier.

By George W. Cable. A new and cheaper edition, uniform with 'Old Creole Days' and 'The Grandissimes.' 1 vol., 12mo, $1.25; also in paper, 50 cents.

"It is a story that deepens and broadens and lightens, with an indescribable charm, over its deep study of human nature."—The Critic.

The Jesuit's Ring.

A Romance of Mount Desert. By A. A. Hayes. 12mo, cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

"Mr. Hayes's novel is one of decided interest. The scene is laid for the most part at Bar Harbor, the attractions of which place, both natural and social, are portrayed with the enthusiasm of one who is particularly familiar with them. No more felicitous description of this charming summer resort has ever appeared in print."—New York Sun.

A Child of the Century.

By John T. Wheelwright. 1 vol., 12mo, cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

"It is one of the most thoroughly enjoyable of the recent publications in the line of fiction. It is a well-drawn story of modern life, dealing largely with some of the political questions of the day, and the characters are varied and interesting throughout. . . . We close the book with a sense of keenest enjoyment."—Boston Times.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MAY 19, 1887.

The Week.

ONE of the stock arguments of the Republican organs in 1884 was the assertion that Mr. Cleveland was not qualified to appear with credit on those occasions where the President of the United States is called upon to represent the nation. Save in the wilds of Iowa, where Republican Bourbonism has taken its last refuge, and where newspapers still allude to Mr. Cleveland as "a beefy nonentity," this sort of talk has now ceased. The President's address at the Harvard celebration last summer, and his hearty reception by the cultivated audience there gathered, dealt a hard blow at the campaign theory about Mr. Cleveland's intellectual equipment and the way in which he would be regarded by thoughtful citizens. His admirable address at the unveiling of the Garfield monument last week has destroyed what little vitality the fiction still preserved. Even bitter Republican organs like the New York Tribune and the Philadelphia Press have been compelled to commend it. "President Cleveland deserves hearty approbation and thanks for speaking true and worthy words," says the Tribune. "President Cleveland is to be congratulated upon his address," says the Press; "it was dignified, patriotic, and eloquent." Some of the Bourbon Republican organs refrain from any comment upon the address, but, so far as we have observed, none of them suppressed it; and to allow their readers to see it is to destroy the effect of any future sneers at the President as wanting in capacity to deliver a dignified, patriotic, and eloquent address.

There is usually a reason to be found for every public dinner, if one searches far enough for it. The reason for the dinner given to Mr. Roosevelt last week was stated by Mr. Chauncey Depew with entire frankness. It was, he said, to do honor to "the ideal young man in politics." Now, there are ideal old men in politics, such as Blaine, Sherman, Evarts, and Hoar, not to mention some who were present at the feast last week. This dinner was not for them. It was for the rising generation and for a new deal. So far it was in accord with the teachings of nature, which bestows her most attractive gifts upon the budding plant. But the paucity of political issues other than the claims of young men was painfully apparent in the speeches on Wednesday week. Mr. Roosevelt himself seemed to be searching for such an issue in "the painful and ridiculous vanity of the Mugwumps." His associations with them have been so intimate that his estimate of them ought to have great weight; but this will hardly answer for a political issue, because the Mugwumps, however ridiculous and self conceited they may be, are not candidates for any office. Senator Hiscock was firm in the belief that "tariff for protection, against tariff for revenue only, will be the issue that will divide the parties in 1888." Mr. Depew, the next speaker, was so far from this opinion that he thought it would be necessary to bar the door and imprison the audience if anybody should talk on that dreadful subject. It reminded him of an anecdote in which a sheriff who was about to hang a horse-thief, improved the occasion of a brief respite in the execution to make a few remarks to the spectators on the tariff. Mr. Depew is right in his estimate of the attractiveness of the issue which has so much fascination for Mr. Hiscock. Mr. Blaine sought to make the tariff the moving theme of the last campaign, but without any marked success. It is not to be expected that Mr. Hiscock will succeed in giving tunefulness to the tariff as a political issue when Mr. Blaine failed.

Mr. Cabot Lodge considered the fishery question a hopeful issue, and uttered the lofty sentiment that "whenever the American flag on an American fishing smack is touched by a foreigner, the great American heart is touched." Ex Judge Davis found the true issue in the liquor question. Other speakers considered the inefficiency of the Cleveland Administration a good opening for attack. It was argued that the Democratic party, although in possession of the Executive branch of the Government and also of the House of Representatives, had not been able to carry any measure of party policy even through the branch of Congress controlled by it. This is sad indeed, but we must remember that it is an old Democratic maxim that "the best government is that which governs least." It may turn out that the people prefer a party and an Administration whose chief distinction consists in vetoing the profligate measures of the other party, and in not being able to pass many bills of their own. The scarcity of issues that was so painfully apparent among Republicans at the Roosevelt dinner may be equally marked among Democrats, but the latter possess the advantage of having a man who stands for something at the head of affairs. What he stands for we shall not now attempt to say, but that he stands for something is the general belief of both parties.

The turning of the Times against Mr. Theodore Roosevelt is a sad finale to the great Mayoral melodrama of which Mr. Roosevelt was the hero last fall, but it does credit to the candor and sagacity of the Times. As a reformer in a place in which energy, and courage, and youth were much needed, Mr. Roosevelt was once very useful, but it was a mistake ever to take him seriously as a politician, and the probabilities are that his drafts on public attention in this latter capacity will now steadily diminish. He is rapidly going the way of other young "scholars in politics" of less promise than he, by trying to be "practical"—a rôle for which they have not a quarter of the fitness of Mike Cregan and Johnny O'Brien, and in which their real superiority is utterly wasted. It is a great pity, but their career after all illustrates and enforces the great truth that there is no part for which a young man is less fitted than that of an apologist.

Mr. Theodore Roosevelt's chatterbox abuse of the Mugwumps, of which he has sent a revised edition to the Tribune, is very diverting, considered as the return he makes to the Times for the unstinting support it gave him for the office of Mayor of a great city. Everything about that Mayoral campaign was more or less droll: the candidate, his promises, his aspirations, his qualifications, the kind of backing he got, and the end of the horn at which he came out when all was over. But nothing in it was half as droll as the return he is now making to his chief admirer. "Nine miles in a locomotive and four speeches in one evening" is nothing to it. We have little doubt, however, that there is more to follow. The quality of the chatter indicates clearly that the supply is abundant.

The compromise between Virginia and her English bondholders has fallen through. This is greatly to be regretted, and quite as much for the State as for the bondholders. It is safe to say that the agitation caused by a continuation of the tender of coupons in payment of taxes will greatly endanger the present Government of the State, and make no one more sorry than the Democratic politicians that they did not settle the question once for all this spring. The causes of disagreement between the State and bondholders were both as to the amount of the debt and the nature of the security to be given. Differences of amount are natural and proper subjects of compromise, but if the disagreement in regard to the nature of the security means that the State objects to issuing any bond with tax-receivable coupons, it is raising an objection out of the limits of compromise. It is difficult to see how sensible, not to say sane, men can expect their creditors to place themselves completely at their mercy. To ask such a thing is suspicious on its face, and the results of submitting to scaling in other Southern States are not encouraging. The noble State of Tennessee, for instance, scaled its debt heavily with the consent of its bondholders, and, after one year, defaulted on its interest, and has been in default ever since. If Virginia intends to pay, why should she object to being bound to pay? And although the present Assembly could be trusted to keep its faith, how can it guarantee that its successors will, especially in view of the Southern doctrine that a legislative body has no right to bind its successors—a doctrine as subversive of all public honesty and decency as the doctrine of the middle ages, that it was no harm to break faith with infidels? So apt are Southern Legislatures to repudiate the promises of their predecessors that, in Louisiana, a debt guaranteed with all the solemnity of a clause in the State Constitution was within five years swept aside. With such facts as these staring them in the face, the English bondholders would be foolish indeed if they were to exchange the fruits of their hard-earned victories in the United States Courts for the word of honor of the Old Dominion; while for the State to persist in its demand is to place itself under the suspicion of attempting to trick the bondholders out of all their legal rights.

The verdict of guilty rendered by the jury against the Everests in the Buffalo oil conspiracy case appears to be a verdict in general terms against the Standard Oil Trust—it is a misnomer to call it a company, for there is no corporation of this name. If the Everests had been wholly disconnected from the Standard people, we cannot believe that they would have been found guilty upon the evidence in this case of a plot to blow up the works of a rival concern in another city, to destroy property and to put lives in jeopardy—that is, to commit arson and expose themselves to imprisonment in the penitentiary. Of course this verdict will be reviewed by the court in which it was rendered, and perhaps by the higher courts. It will be safest not to conclude that the Everests belong to the criminal classes from the case as it now stands. It is much more probable that indignation against the Standard Oil monopoly has become so deep-seated and pervading that no jury can be drawn that will not aim a blow at it, even if it be a blow in the dark. The decision rendered in New Orleans on Saturday, on a demurrer in the Cotton Oil case, is much more telling against these new-fangled monopolies called Trusts than the verdict of the Buffalo jury. The judge held that the mere fact that a group of persons were exercising the powers of a joint-stock company, without any act of incorporation, was itself a cause of action against them. We do not see why the Standard Oil Trust may not be dissolved and dissipated into its original elements by an application of this principle.

The State of New York collected for one year a tax on the entire capital stock of the Western Union Telegraph Company—that is, on the value of its property situated and operated in all the other States and Territories as well as in this State. The injustice of the act of 1881, under which this assessment was made, was so obvious and shameful that a change of the law was made in the following year, so as to give the State Comptroller the discretion to tax the entire capital of joint-stock companies, or only that portion employed and situated in this State. Subsequently the law was still further changed by taking away this discretion, and providing that only the latter portion should be taxed. Meanwhile, the tax of 1881 had been enforced against the Western Union Company by a judgment which was affirmed by the Court of Appeals, on the ground that the courts cannot change even bad laws, but can only interpret them. The law of 1881 was not unconstitutional—it was only unjust. The court, however, in affirming the judgment, said that the Western Union Company had a moral claim against the State for a refund of the tax, and that it might properly appeal to the Legislature for the relief which it had failed to obtain elsewhere. A bill is now before the Legislature to create a Board of Claims, to which this as well as other claims may be referred. It does not appear that the Western Union Company has taken any interest in this bill, and it is to be hoped that it will not. What it is entitled to is a refund of this money, not the privilege of going before a board or commission and proving the claim. This has already been proved in the court of last resort and in the conscience of every honest citizen and taxpayer. It is a claim that will come up at every future session of the Legislature, and it will have to be paid, and paid with interest. Why should there be any hesitation about paying it now?

Mayor Hewitt's address to the locomotive firemen on Sunday was one of the best labor addresses workingmen have listened to for some time in this city, simply because it contained one of those chunks of human experience known as "common sense." Common sense is simply the result of human observation applied through many ages to the phenomena of every-day life. One of the most familiar of these results is the fact that human society, in every stage of civilization, has been simply an anti-poverty association. Every son of Adam who has ever lived on the globe and was not a lunatic, has been a member of this organization, and engaged vigorously in the work of abolishing his own poverty. Some seek to abolish it by their own labor and frugality, others by the labor and frugality of other people, but all are foes to poverty. If every man could succeed, of course poverty, as Mr. Hewitt pointed out, would disappear from the earth. Why poverty should have more to fear from the McGlynn-George Association than from the human race in general, has not as yet been satisfactorily explained. Until it has, we would advise no one to contribute to its funds. Nature, who holds the key of all possible wealth, has thus far, when making dividends, been exceedingly indifferent to oratory.

It is the knowledge displayed at the George and McGlynn's meetings of the intentions of the Creator which really, far more than their political economy, gives them their importance. Mr. George was on Sunday able to make a special announcement that "the Creator meant His bounties of nature equally for all men." "Instead of this," said he, "we have allowed them to become the property of a few individuals." There is something very puzzling about all this. In the first place, how did Mr. George find out what the Creator's intentions about the division of property were? There is nothing in Mr. George's history or antecedents, or in his appearance, to indicate how he came to be selected as a special recipient of the confidences of the Almighty. In the second place, if what he says be true, how does it happen that the Creator has allowed his "intentions," as revealed by George, to be frustrated by people like Jay Gould and Russell Sage? The "intentions" of the Creator, as usually understood, mean his fixed will, expressed in the order of nature, which no man can gainsay or resist. According to George, however, not only can the divine plan in the creation of the universe be set aside by monopolists and stock operators, but it cannot be set working again without hiring a hall and starting a society with a dollar membership.

The sectional agitators of the Republican party have suffered a most grievous, and, we fear, a fatal loss, in the late but unmistakable conversion of Jeff. Davis to Union sentiments. In a speech at New Orleans on Friday Mr. Davis said to his Southern auditors: "United you are now, and if the Union is ever to be broken, let the other side break it. The truths we fought for shall not encourage you ever to fight again; but keep your word in good or evil." This is the most serious loss since the Democratic party came into power and failed to begin the payment of "rebel claims," or to do anything else to put the "Confederacy in the saddle again." For a long time, whatever else failed, the venerable bloody shirt shakers like Senator Hoar could fall back upon Jeff. Davis and Bob Toombs, and say that they were just as bad rebels as ever they were. But Toombs is dead, and now Davis has become reconciled. There is nothing left to cling to, and Horace Greeley's memorable prediction may be said to be fulfilled: "Your attempt to base a great, enduring party upon the hate and wrath necessarily engendered by a bloody civil war is as though you should plant a colony on an iceberg which had somehow drifted into a tropical ocean."

The death of Judge Woods of the United States Supreme Court has led some of the Republican organs to deplore that a Democratic President will now have the opportunity to appoint upon the Federal bench "a judge who believes that the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution were unconstitutionally adopted, and that the reconstruction acts were revolutionary, unconstitutional, and void." They apparently forget that a Republican President has set the example of appointing such men, and even of placing upon the Federal bench "rebels" and "traitors" who fought for four years to overthrow the whole Constitution; Mr. Hayes having appointed as United States District Judge David M. Key, who "entered the Confederate Army in 1861, and served through the entire war as Lieutenant-Colonel of the Forty-third Tennessee Infantry," and who in 1868 supported Seymour and Blair upon a platform declaring that "we regard the reconstruction acts, so called, of Congress as a usurpation, and unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void."

The Liquor-Tax Bill, which the Michigan House of Representatives passed on Thursday by a large majority, provides a tax of $800 for all wholesale liquor-dealers and of $500 for all retail dealers, without regard to the kind of liquor they sell. The tax must be paid in advance, before the opening of a store or saloon, and half the proceeds are to go to the county, and half to the city, village, or township from which it is collected. The bill is a very elaborate measure, providing against sales on holidays and Sundays, and against the adulteration of liquors, and making proprietors responsible for the action of their clerks, bartenders, and other employees. The large majority by which it has passed the House indicates its easy passage by the Senate.

The High-License Bill which has been passed by the Pennsylvania Legislature is in some respects different from legislation of this kind which has been enacted in other States. It puts all liquor-stores upon the same basis, requiring them to pay $500 for a license in Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and Allegheny, $400 in all smaller cities, $200 in all boroughs, and $100 in townships. The State is to receive one-fifth of the revenue, the county one fifth, and the city or borough three-fifths. Of the revenue from townships the State is to receive one-fourth, the county one-fourth, and the township one-half. The power to grant licenses is vested in the Courts of Quarter Sessions in all localities, the judges being empowered to decide upon the necessity of the licenses applied for, and to revoke licenses on proof that a place is disorderly. The bill, which has been signed by the Governor, will go into effect on and after June 30. Compared with our "practical" Vedder bill, this is a just and statesmanlike measure. It pays over one-fifth of the revenue to the State, while the Vedder proposition is to tax New York and Brooklyn from two to thirteen times as much as the rest of the State, and turn the whole revenue over to the State Treasury.

It is shocking to learn that the Indian Government has discovered a treasure of $25,000,000 in silver in a secret receptacle in the palace of the late Maharajah of Gwalior. A dispute has arisen between the Government and the Maharajah's heirs as to the disposition of the money; but the mischief is just the same to us, whoever gets it. Here is a stock of silver equal to one year's coinage of our mint suddenly added to the world's supply. We must toil on for twelve months in order to put our own silver-producers in as good a position as they were before. And who knows that other similar discoveries may not be made in Eastern palaces? It is painful to think that our efforts to sustain the market are liable to be frustrated by wretched Indian workmen stumbling upon old vaults containing millions upon millions of buried rupees.

The wear and tear of the gold coinage in Great Britain has at last brought Parliament to consider seriously the question of authorizing the issue of one-pound notes. It is certainly strange that, with the example constantly before them of the convenient and by no means harmful employment of one-pound notes in Scotland, the English Government and people should have adhered to the five-pound limitation on bank notes. We believe the original objection to the one-pound note was largely humanitarian. That is, when counterfeiting was a capital offence, Parliament recoiled from putting the temptation of small notes in the counterfeiters' way. It seemed worth while to hang a man for a five-pound note, but not for a one. The objection has survived, as is not uncommon in England, long after the reason has been forgotten. In matters of finance John Bull is not merely conservative, he is absolutely deaf. He does not even now hear the arguments in favor of small bank notes. He only feels that he has lost a pile of money by carrying so much gold in his breeches pocket, wearing out the gold and tearing out the pocket at the same time. Another solecism has been brought under review by the discussion, and that is the cost of Bank of England notes—i. e., the cost of manufacturing them. No note can be issued from the Bank a second time. If it is taken out by one depositor today and put in by another to-morrow, it must be immediately destroyed. The average cost of manufacturing notes in Belgium, Denmark, and the United States is shown by Mr. S. Montague to be only a half penny, as against 6d. in England. The need of reform in this particular is not as great, perhaps, as the need of one-pound notes, but it is such as to lead the Economist to say that the Bank directors must be prepared to move with the times, or see the work taken in hand by others who are prepared to do so.

The Orangemen in Toronto and Kingston have apparently been cooled off somewhat by holding a "loyalist" meeting, in which O'Brien and the Irish Nationalists were handsomely denounced, so that the fears of a riot are passing away. A good deal of violent language was used at the meeting—much of it by Mr. Goldwin Smith, who appears to grow more and more uncomfortable, for he has been writing to the London Times that Canada is now, to all intents and purposes, an "Irish Republic," which in his mouth means that Canada is becoming an earthly pandemonium. Lord Lansdowne appears to have a much cooler head than the Professor, however, for the Government organ, the Montreal Gazette, which undoubtedly reflects the Governor-General's view of the situation, reprobates some of the oratory at the meeting as "more earnest than wise," and as characterized by the faults which they themselves condemn in O'Brien. It condemns, also, the use of language at the meeting "which will rankle in the minds of other citizens," who, while not approving of O'Brien's methods, nevertheless sympathize with the cause which he represents. The Montreal Herald, which, though Liberal, has been opposed to O'Brien's mission, calls for "facts"; but facts that people will accept as facts, are hardly likely to be furnished from the platform at O'Brien's meetings.

The rumors about the condition of Parnell's health are very serious. No one has as yet spoken on the subject with so much authority as Mr. Justin McCarthy in his despatch in Sunday's Herald. He says:

> "I have seen Mr. Parnell since his return from Dublin, the day before yesterday. I believe he is better, so far as his bronchial attack is concerned, but his general health is far from good. He has aged sadly of late. He is still a young man, but he looks stooped and old and wasted. Ten years ago—even five years ago—he stood like a young athlete in the strife."

This is far from reassuring, and, in fact, seems to indicate that Parnell may, for all practical purposes, be considered hors de combat. There are as good or better men than he among the Irish party in the Commons for the work of resisting coercion bills or harassing the Ministry; but nobody's pledges or promises on the subject of home rule would have half as much weight with the English public as his. Whenever the main question comes up again he will be sadly missed by his followers, should he be unable to appear in his old place. If home rule were carried, too, his loss would be terribly felt when the new Government came to be organized, and the exultation of the rank and file to be restrained. The London Times is in the meantime rapidly lessening the weight of its attacks on him by revealing too many secrets. It now professes to have got at the inner workings of the "Clan na Gael," and is thus enabled to connect all the Irish leaders with more conspiracies and assassinations than ever. Of course this is spoiling the sensation market. Secrets are like stocks and bonds: the more of them you issue, the less you get for them. If you lead people to believe that the supply is unlimited—that is, that your treasury is full of them—you are sure before long to find that nobody will listen to you or let you "unload" on him.

The resignation of the French Ministry is probably much less serious than it looks. They have never had real control of the financial situation, or been really responsible for the budget. The Budget Committee and the Chamber keep the revenue very much in their own hands. The custom has long been, when the Ministers and the Chamber cannot agree about the estimates, to make the appropriation in twelfths—or, in other words, to vote the Ministry one, two, or three months' revenue, and postpone final settlement to some future day, which never comes. In fact, the epithet "makeshift" is the only one which can be properly applied to French financial policy during the last twelve years. The floating debt is enormous and increasing, owing to an annual deficit which each Chamber is unwilling to provide for by increased taxation. The difficulties of reduction in the expenditure are equally great. The cost of the army and navy must keep increasing more or less rapidly as long as the present relations with Germany last. The credit of the country is so good that the conversion of a portion of the rentes would be an easy task, but, as they are largely held by the peasantry, the Government is afraid to lower the rate of interest on them. In like manner the State absorbs the savings-bank deposits, and guarantees them both interest and principal, but actually pays higher interest on them than it can get on the money in the market, and is afraid to cut it down, lest it should offend the depositors, who are mainly artisans and small shopkeepers in the cities. Under these circumstances, no Ministry is really considered responsible for the finances in the sense in which an English Ministry is held to be responsible. M. Goblet has resigned, but he will probably take office again, or, if he does not, it will make no great difference in the situation.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, May 11, to TUESDAY, May 17, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

A BRONZE statue of President Garfield, erected by the Society of the Army of the Cumberland, was unveiled at Washington May 12. It is of heroic size, ten feet six inches in height, mounted on a pedestal, and looks away from the Capitol down Maryland Avenue. It represents Garfield in a graceful standing posture, with his coat thrown back from his shoulder, his right hand resting upon a book supported by a column, and his left holding a manuscript, as if he were addressing the people. The pedestal is eighteen feet high. President Cleveland made a brief address, in which he spoke of "the dangers of a mad chase after partisan spoils," and expressed the hope that the statue would strengthen the "solemn resolve to purge for ever from our political methods and from the operation of our Government the perversions and misconceptions which gave birth to passionate and bloody thoughts." A tablet in memory of the Union General, Sedgwick, has been unveiled at the spot where he fell, near Spottsylvania Court-house, Va.

Mr. James W. Hyatt of Connecticut has been appointed Treasurer of the United States to succeed Mr. Conrad N. Jordan, resigned. Mr. Hyatt is a native and resident of Norwalk. For ten years he was Bank Commissioner of Connecticut by the appointment first of Gov. Ingersoll, and subsequently of both Democratic and Republican Governors. He was National Bank Examiner in Connecticut by the appointment of President Cleveland.

The Inter-State Commerce Law has caused a great increase in the freight traffic on the water ways. The boats on the Miami and Erie Canal cannot carry any large proportion of the freight that is offered. The American Consul at Kingston, Canada, has reported to the State Department that as a result of the increase of freight tariffs on American roads since the law went into effect, Canadian coal dealers are preparing to bring coal from Nova Scotia for all purposes for which it can be used. Orders for hardware and pressed tinware have been changed from American to Canadian houses on account of freight charges, and the tendency in other lines of trade is the same. More petitions both for and against the enforcement of the long-and short-haul clause have been received by the Commission. Commissioner Morrison has expressed the opinion that the desire to repeal the law will not grow, and that governmental supervision of railroad transportation has "come to stay."

The Kentucky Republican Convention on May 11 nominated candidates for State offices. The nominee for Governor is W. O. Bradley. The platform adopted favors national aid to education, a protective tariff, and national appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors. Fault was found with the President for refusing to sign the last River and Harbor Bill and for vetoing the Dependent Pension Bill.

A special session of the Missouri Legislature, which was called to enact more stringent railroad laws, convened May 11.

The last Legislature of Missouri refused to appropriate funds to support the militia, and the Adjutant-General of the State has issued a notice that, at the request of the commanding officer, the First Regiment, National Guard of Missouri, with headquarters at St. Louis, which is composed of eleven companies, was disbanded, to take effect May 23. This leaves St. Louis with no other companies than the French Zouaves and the Light Cavalry Troop.

A sheriff in Iowa who attempted to confiscate the product of a brewery under the prohibition law of the State, was ordered to stop by a revenue collector, who claimed prior right to the beer on the ground that it had not paid the national Government's tax. Thereupon the Attorney-General of the State on May 16 advised the State officers to pay no heed to the internal-revenue collectors. The incident has attracted attention because it may lead to another conflict between State and national authorities about the enforcement of a prohibitory law.

The London holders of Virginia bonds who sent Sir Edward Thornton to Richmond to make an agreement if possible with the Virginia Legislature, have refused the Legislative Committee's propositions. The negotiations are therefore closed for the present.

Gov. Beaver of Pennsylvania has signed the High-License Act of the Legislature. It requires a $500 license in cities of 30,000 population, a $400 license in smaller cities, a $200 license in boroughs, and a $100 license in township hotels.

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts has decided that the act of the Legislature is unconstitutional which forbids a naturalized voter to register within thirty days of naturalization.

The number of immigrants to the United States has increased every month this year. At Castle Garden 133,000 have landed since January 1, a large proportion of whom are Irish.

The Convention of wool-growers of the United States in session at St. Louis adopted resolutions May 14 to make an effort to secure the enactment of a tariff law which would give them greater protection than the present one.

Building at Chicago was almost wholly suspended on May 12 by strikes and lock-outs. The excuse for the disagreement between the contractors and the workmen is the refusal of the former to make Saturday the pay-day, but the chief cause of the trouble is the determination of the labor organizations to limit the number of apprentices, and to manage the business of the builders for them. The effort of the workmen is regarded as sure of failure, and building will be so retarded that a formerly anticipated reduction in rents is not now expected to be made. Work has not yet been begun again.

Speaking before a meeting of locomotive firemen in this city on May 15, Mayor Hewitt said: "I want to make the public declaration that the right of men to organize is absolute; that the duty of men to organize in their respective branches of business is of the highest order, and that they are not true to themselves unless they do it. But, like other good things in this world, this right may be abused. . . . No man and no set of men have the right to set up a new tribunal. Americans, inheritors of a great principle and of a blessing the value of which no man knows until he has been deprived of it, will never tolerate this idea." On the next day Archbishop Corrigan preached on one recent turn the labor agitation has taken. He declared that the idea that the private ownership of land is unjust was a fallacy, and was contrary both to philosophy and common sense, against the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church, and in direct opposition to a decree of the Pope, and that those who favored it knew they were impinging on the ordinances of God.

Hiram B. Everest and his son, Charles M. Everest, have been found guilty at Buffalo of conspiring to destroy the business and blow up the works of the Buffalo Lubricating Oil Company. The case has attracted much attention because the convicted men are interested in the Standard Oil Company.

The trial of Jacob Sharp for bribing twenty-one of the members of the New York Board of Aldermen in 1884 to grant the franchise for the Broadway Railroad was begun in this city May 16.

One of the brakemen on the Panhandle Railroad who were arrested for stealing freight, was convicted at Pittsburgh May 11. Another has made confession.

Work has been resumed on the tunnels under the Hudson River between New York and Jersey City, through which it is expected trains will be run. No work has been done since 1882. The engineer hopes to have one tunnel finished before the end of next year.

Five thousand pounds of opium were seized by customs officers on the Pacific Mail Dock in San Francisco May 13.

Bishop Howe of South Carolina refused to omit the name of a colored clergyman, the Rev. J. H. M. Pollard, rector of St. Mark's Episcopal Church, Charleston, from the list of delegates to the Diocesan Convention in Charleston May 13, and all the lay delegates and two clergymen withdrew from the Convention. The seceders organized a convention of their own. Efforts to reunite the two bodies failed, and the question of admitting colored delegates to Church conventions is under discussion in all the parishes.

Queen Kapiolani of the Hawaiian Islands and her suite have for several days been in New York making observation of public works and methods of government here.

The Southern Society of New York has decided to put up on February 22 a bronze tablet on the spot where Washington took boat after his farewell to his officers at the close of the Revolution, and to mark with an appropriate tablet the battle-field of Harlem Heights, where Washington commanded the patriot forces.

Mr. A. T. Soule of Rochester, N. Y., who built a canal nine miles long near Dodge City, Kan., for irrigating purposes, at a cost of $1,000,000, has announced his intention of extending it so that 1,000,000 acres of land may be watered every season.

Natural gas has been discovered in Kansas. At Fort Scott a very strong flow was struck May 12 at a depth of 280 feet.

The reports of great topographical changes and loss of many lives in the State of Sonora, Mex., by the earthquake on May 3 have been confirmed by a party of explorers sent out by the Government. Many persons are yet living under tents and in dug-outs. A wide territory is seamed with crevices, the earth has sunk, and places are flooded with water which were dry before. In the mountains, continuous smoke indicates volcanic action, but the mountains have not yet been explored, because of continuous tremors and great chasms. Slight shocks were felt in California and in South Carolina May 12, and in Arizona on the following day.

Prince Leopold of Germany, having spent several days in New York and paid a visit to the West Point Military Academy, sailed homeward May 14, with the companions of his journey around the world.

Justice W. B. Woods of the Supreme Court of the United States died at Washington, May 14. He was a graduate of Yale (1845), he was a member of the Ohio Legislature in 1857, and Speaker of the House, and he entered the Union Army and became Brevet Major-General. At the close of the war he took up his residence in Alabama, where he was chosen State Chancellor, and was appointed Circuit Judge of the United States Court for the Fifth District by President Grant. President Hayes appointed him Justice of the Supreme Court in 1881. His successor will be the only Justice on the bench appointed by a Democratic President. Lysander Spooner died in Boston May 14, aged seventy-nine. In 1844 he established a private mail from Boston to New York and afterwards to Philadelphia and Baltimore, carrying letters at the uniform rate of 5 cents. The business grew rapidly, and the Government prosecuted him; but he so clearly demonstrated the practicability of a cheap uniform postal rate that in the next year Congress made the first reduction in postage rates. Mr. Spooner was also the author of a pamphlet on the unconstitutionality of slavery, published in 1845, which was intended to controvert the doctrines of the disunion abolitionists, and was a text-book for those who held his view.

FOREIGN.

After a debate on May 17 in the French Chamber of Deputies on the report of the Budget Committee, which demands a reduction in the estimates submitted by the Government, the Chamber, by a vote of 275 to 259, rejected the proposals of the Government. M. Goblet then announced that the Cabinet would resign, and the members of the Cabinet left the House. Their resignations have been accepted by President Grévy.

On May 11 the French Government closed a velocipede factory near Luneville, which was owned by a German, because he employed men belonging to the German Army. The soldiers were expelled from the country. Reprisals were speedily made on the other side of the frontier, and persons were punished for singing the "Marseillaise" and shouting "Vive la France." Arrests of more German spies in France have been made. Prince Bismarck has given official statutory notice to the owners of houses and lands at Strassburg, Metz, and Posen, that the Government contemplates an extension of the fortified area around these cities. Gen. Boulanger's plan for an experimental mobilization of the French Army in October has excited suspicion in Berlin, and it is announced that if France mobilizes her army, Germany also will mobilize hers.

The French Council of State on May 13 gave a hearing to an appeal of the Orleans Princes against their expulsion from the army. It was argued on behalf of the Minister of War that the Council was not competent to decide the case.

At the election for members of the Municipal Council of Paris on May 15 the Revolutionists elected ten members instead of four, as in the last Council; the Moderates, who formerly had twenty-two seats, have but fourteen in the new Council.

The sale at auction of the French crown jewels was begun at Paris May 12. It is thought that the Orleans family are buying many of them. Nearly all the bidders are dealers, among them at least one American firm.

Sir William Vernon Harcourt's amendment to the Coercion Bill, exempting from secret inquiry all proceedings relating to public meetings or agrarian movements, including combinations to obtain reductions of rents, was rejected, May 17, by a vote of 242 to 180. Thereafter the first clause of the bill was adopted by a vote of 171 to 79. Notice was given of eighty amendments to the second clause.

In the House of Commons May 12, Sir John Gorst, Parliamentary Secretary to the India Office, moved the second reading of the bill granting leave of absence to the Duke of Connaught, commander of the forces in India, in order that he might attend the jubilee festivities. The motion was carried, but it provoked a debate in which the promotion of princes to high military positions, because they are princes, was severely criticised.

On May 14, Queen Victoria, with impressive ceremonies, opened the "People's Palace" in East London, an institution built after the idea of Mr. Walter Besant's book, 'All Sorts and Conditions of Men.' The long royal procession, which was the first made by the Queen through this part of London for many years, provoked an unusual demonstration.

The Mayor of Cork, replying to an invitation from the Lord Chamberlain to assist in the jubilee festivities, has written that in view of the Crimes Bill the invitation is little short of an outrage upon the self-respect of the Irish people. The Mitchelstown (Ireland) branch of the National League have requested the people of that district to boycott the Cunard Line because of the insult which they think Mr. O'Brien received at the hands of the captain of the steamer on which he came to New York, and the advice is being already followed.

Mr. Gladstone, at a luncheon of Nonconformist ministers, on May 11, declared that there never had been any reason for charging the Parnellites with complicity in Irish crime. Six years ago, while Prime Minister, he had denounced the Parnellites as dangerous. That was totally different from charging them with crime. He vehemently denounced the Government's attitude on the Times's charges against the Irish members, and said the prosecution of the Times by the Crown would be a horrible farce. On the next day Mr. Bright wrote: "All the Times's charges consist of evidence contributed by the rebel conspirators themselves. The facts are their own facts. The Times did not invent them; it only arranged them so that the public could understand the case. Parliament should have nothing to do with the matter."

Mr. William O'Brien, editor of United Ireland, who has gone to Canada to make an agitation against Lord Lansdowne, the Governor-General, because of his treatment of the tenants on his Irish estates, arrived at Montreal, May 11, and was received with enthusiasm by the Irish residents. He made a speech the night after his arrival, full of bitterness against Lord Lansdowne as a landlord, but without reference to his conduct as a Canadian official. The next night he spoke at Quebec, and challenged Lord Lansdowne to answer any of the accusations he has made against him. The Corporation of Toronto has refused to allow the town hall to be used for an O'Brien meeting. A meeting was held there on May 14 to protest against his coming, but he addressed a somewhat turbulent open-air meeting there on May 17.

The Canadian Government has refused permission to the Sixty-fifth French Canadian Regiment to pass the Queen's birthday at Highgate Springs, Vt., the Minister of Militia taking the ground that it is a bad precedent to establish, especially in view of the feeling existing over O'Brien's visit and the fishery dispute.

Mr. O'Brien has been elected, without opposition, to the seat in the House of Commons, for the northeast division of Cork, made vacant by the resignation of Mr. Edmund Leamy.

The correspondence relating to the seizure of British American sealing vessels in Behring's Sea by the United States was laid before the Canadian Parliament May 14. Canada asks as reparation $150,000.

The Canadian budget, introduced in the Parliament at Ottawa May 13, proposes a radical change in customs duties, especially on iron. The new tariff is graded on the scale of two-thirds of the United States tariff. The duty on pig iron is increased to $4 per ton. The bounty on pig-iron manufactured in Canada will be $1.50 to 1889 and $1 from 1889 to 1892. The increase in the iron duties will produce half a million revenue, and this amount will be lost by taking the present duty off anthracite coal. The duty on cigars and cigarettes will be doubled, and will increase the revenue by $150,000. The duty on paper is made uniform at 25 per cent. Notice of these duties has aroused the importers and some of the manufacturers of iron to petition the Government at least for as gradual a change as can be made.

Sir Arthur Havelock, the Governor of Natal, has been instructed to proclaim Zululand, except the new Boer Republic, a British possession.

A discovery of gold has been made on Good Hope Farm in the Transvaal, the headquarters of a flourishing missionary colony. Several tempting offers have already been made to the Wesleyan Society in London for the property, but the Society has refused to sell until it has made an investigation.

The Anglo Haytian dispute about the claim of an English subject against the Haytian Government has been settled. Hayti has paid a part of the claim in cash, and given security for the payment of the balance. The total, paid and to be paid, is $250,000.

The Afghan Frontier Commission, being unable to agree, has referred the boundary question back to the Governments of England and Russia.

An amount of treasure, estimated at more than $25,000,000, which had been secreted in the palace of Gwalior by the late Maharajah, has been found by British officers in India. It had been buried in pits under the vaults, and the secret was intrusted to a few confidential servants. The Financial Secretary of India was present when it was unearthed, and the British Government in India, against the protests of the native newspapers, has taken the whole amount as a loan from the young Maharajah. The question will be raised in Parliament whether this be not in fact a mere seizure of the treasure.

It is reported that at the suggestion of England, and with the approval of Germany, the Bulgarian Regents are favorably considering the plan to proclaim King Charles of Rumania Prince of Bulgaria, and thus virtually to make of the Danubian Balkan provinces one kingdom.

Great commercial distress is reported from Russia. The Bankruptcy Court at Odessa is blocked with the insolvency cases of long-established and hitherto flourishing firms. Many commercial men would welcome a war as preferable to the present depression.

The new German Liberals are forming an Anti-Corn-Law League, and are organizing meetings and provoking an agitation throughout the country.

The young Baronesses Anna and Louise of Guttenberg, who have been melancholy since the suicide of King Ludwig of Bavaria, recently rowed to the spot in the lake where he drowned himself, and committed suicide in the same way.

Two members of the Prussian Oberhaus are to be tried for duelling, but it is regarded as certain that they will not be punished. In a recent discussion of this case in the Landtag, a member declared that it was the ancient and inalienable right of the German nobility to decide questions of personal honor at the point of the sword, in spite of the fact that duelling was punishable under the penal code; and his declaration met with approval.

There was a procession in Florence on May 15 representing the entry into the city of Amadeus, Count of Savoy, in 1367. It was a reproduction of the historical pageant.

The proposition to effect a reconciliation between the Italian Government and the Vatican continues to be discussed in Italy. Signor Fazzari, a member of the Chamber of Deputies, has written an article in which he says an entente could easily be attained if the Pope would direct the ecclesiastical authorities of the Vatican to support, at the next election for the Chamber of Deputies, candidates favoring such a reconciliation. "Let the Pope take the initiative, and Italy will be grateful to him."

A despatch from Rome on May 13 announced that the Pope had decided to instruct Archbishop Corrigan of New York to warn Dr. McGlynn, the priest who has been suspended for the part he took in the Mayoralty campaign in this city and for approving the George land doctrine, that if he does not present himself before the supreme ecclesiastical authority at Rome within forty days, he will be formally excommunicated. Dr. McGlynn on May 15 had received no notice of such a threat.

Dr. Junker, the Russian explorer, has received letters from Emin Bey dated last November, in which Emin Bey said the routes between Uganda and Wadelai were open. Dr. Junker thinks that the success of Stanley's relief expedition is therefore assured.

A plan is announced to build a railroad immediately across the narrow isthmus which separates Lake Nicaragua from the Pacific, starting from San Juan del Sur and running to San Jorge.

THE PROGRESS OF REFORM.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND'S brief address at the unveiling of the Garfield statue in Washington on Thursday fitly and forcibly enforced the "sad and distressing lesson" of his predecessor's death. "While," he said, "American citizenship stands aghast and affrighted that murder and assassination should lurk in the midst of a free people and strike down the head of their Government, a fearless search and the discovery of the origin and hiding-place of these hateful and unnatural things should be followed by a solemn resolve to purge for ever from our political methods and from the operation of our Government the perversions and misconceptions which gave birth to passionate and bloody thoughts. If from this hour," the President concluded, "our admiration for the bravery and nobility of American manhood and our faith in the possibilities and opportunities of American citizenship be renewed; if our appreciation of the blessing of a restored Union and love for our Government be strengthened, and if our watchfulness against the dangers of a mad chase after partisan spoils be quickened, the dedication of this statue to the people of the United States will not be in vain."

The occasion suggests a contrast between the situation as regards the civil service in 1881 and that in 1887. In his second annual message to Congress, December 5, 1870, President Grant recommended "a reform in the civil service of the country" which should "govern not the tenure, but the manner of making all appointments." In March, 1871, an amendment was tacked on to an appropriation bill in the Senate authorizing the President to prescribe "such rules and regulations for the admission of persons into the civil service of the United States as will best promote the efficiency thereof, and ascertain the fitness of each candidate in respect to age, health, character, knowledge, and ability for the branch of the service into which he seeks to enter"; and also authorizing him to employ suitable persons to conduct these inquiries. A civil-service commission was appointed, and rules were established for the filling of vacancies by competitive examinations, which were put in force during the summer of 1872. The new system speedily demonstrated its advantages over the old, and in his annual message, December 1, 1873, President Grant urged its extension, pointing out that "to have any rules effective, they must have the acquiescence of Congress as well as of the Executive." The Forty-third Congress was Republican in each branch, more than two to one, but the party managers had no sympathy with the reform, and they proceeded to starve it to death. Mr. Blaine, as Speaker, appointed a committee on civil-service reform of which that unblushing spoilsman Gen. Butler was the leading spirit, and, under the lead of Blaine and Butler, a House Republican by 195 to 92 refused to make any appropriation for the support of the Commission in 1874, and the system soon after expired of inanition.

President Grant made no further attempt to push the reform, and the halting attempts of Mr. Hayes were so handicapped by his entanglements with the Returning Board rascals that little progress was made during his four years in the White House. Gen. Garfield's first step was a step backward. He chose as his chief adviser the man who as Speaker had been chiefly responsible for the smothering of civil-service reform in 1874. Within three weeks after his inauguration, he turned his back upon his own professions in favor of reform by an ostentatious action based solely and almost avowedly upon the spoils system. A collector in the New York Custom-house was removed midway in his term, not for the good of the service, since it was acknowledged that he had been an efficient and faithful official, but for the purpose of making room for a politician whose personal demand upon the President's chief adviser must be paid off at the public expense. This backward step was not retraced, and on the morning of July 2, 1881, the outlook for reform was most discouraging.

Perhaps nothing short of Guiteau's shot could have impressed the people with "the dangers of a mad chase after partisan spoils." Certainly the assassination of Garfield marked the turning-point in the struggle with the spoils system. In the next election of Congressmen, in the fall of 1882, the popular demand for a change was made so plain that the expiring Congress, promptly upon meeting in December, 1882, took up and passed the Pendleton bill, which its author had for two years vainly pushed upon the attention of his colleagues. In July, 1883, the competitive system was put into operation. In 1884 the growing demand for a thorough-going reform of the civil service forced the nomination by the Democrats of a proved reformer, and secured his election over a Republican candidate who had shown his attitude towards the question when he committed it to the tender mercies of Gen. Butler ten years before. A change of parties for the first time in a quarter of a century made the natural desire of Democratic politicians to escape the restrictions of rules and regulations in 1885 a hundred times stronger than that of Republican politicians had been in 1874; but only a few straggling Democratic votes could be rallied in Congress to imitate the example of their opponents and starve out the Commission. The system became, month by month, more firmly entrenched, and in May, 1887, an extension only second in importance to its original establishment is made through the approval by the President of rules which apply the competitive principle to promotions as well as to entrance. Most important of all, this latest and most significant action of the President is criticised only by a few spoils organs, dwindling in circulation and bankrupt in influence, while the progressive Democratic newspapers throughout the country accept it as one of the strongest arguments which the party can present for asking another lease of power in 1888.

It is not yet six years since Garfield's assassination, but it is already evident that the lesson of that event has been mastered by the American people. The spoils system reached its full fruition in his murder by a disappointed office-seeker, and the people have taken "a solemn resolve to purge for ever from our political methods and from the operation of our Government the perversions and misconceptions which gave birth to passionate and bloody thoughts."

THE BEVERLY INCIDENT.

BEVERLY is an old town in Essex County, Mass., bordering on the coast, one village of which, known as Beverly Farms, has become of late years a favorite summer resort with rich Bostonians. This new class finally came to constitute a large proportion of the taxable population of the town, and sought to escape bearing its share of the common burdens by having Beverly Farms set off as a separate town. An appeal was made to the Legislature which met a year ago last January, but it failed. Last January another appeal was made, and this time the division scheme went easily through both branches.

Before the bill had passed its final stage, a member of the Senate declared that an attempt had been made to bribe him to vote in favor of division, and that a definite sum had been offered for his vote. After much hesitation, an investigation was ordered, which developed a startling state of things. It was found that, whereas last year the divisionists had submitted their case on its merits, this year they raised a fund of about $20,000, which was given over to a lawyer, who proceeded to organize a lobby and thus easily carried the bill through. The lawyer was cynically frank about the matter. He attributed the success of the measure to the thousands of dollars which he had distributed. It could not be established that any legislator had sold his vote for a definite sum, but it was made perfectly clear that it was the illegitimate use of this fund which had caused one Legislature to favor division where the previous body, viewing the question free from such influences, rejected the scheme. The House Committee of Investigation reported that "such methods were pernicious, if not fatal to good and wholesome government," and declared that "these influences, however, wherever, or by whomsoever exerted, should be and must be emphatically and strongly condemned."

As the bill had not gone to the Governor, there was still a chance to undo the blunder of its passage and save the reputation of the Legislature. Every argument was in favor of refusing to do anything further in the matter this year. The question of division is not a pressing one, and can be postponed a year as well as not. The disclosure that its passage was due to lobbying must necessarily taint the measure if it should become a law. There was just one way in which the pernicious influences could be "emphatically and strongly condemned," and that was by making the $20,000 corruption fund of no avail, by refusing to enact the division. Justice, and even decency, demanded that the Legislature should embrace the opportunity which fortunately remained to defeat the scheme.

Each branch of the Legislature, however, has refused to retrace its steps. Both the Senate and the House have deliberately voted not to reconsider their action, and the work of the lobby is thus soberly endorsed. Seldom, if ever, has so plain a test of the attitude of law-makers towards lobbyists been made anywhere in this country. It is a public proclamation that legislators regard "the Third House" as a legitimate adjunct of law-making.

The criticisms of the lobby by the Investigating Committee are of no account so long as the bill which owes its success to the lobby is enacted. The upshot of the matter is, that the existence of the lobby is practically justified by the Massachusetts Legislature.

There are two aspects of this business which are of importance. It illustrates very forcibly that growing demoralization of legislators as a class, which is one of the most alarming signs of the times in this country. It is impossible to conceive of a body of gentlemen sensitive to their reputation deliberately condoning such an offence as has been here disclosed. Such a body would have improved eagerly the chance to clear their skirts by reconsidering the passage of the tainted bill and pushing the matter over to another year. The incident also illustrates the lowering tone of the Republican party. As the dominant party in the Legislature, it must shoulder the responsibility of this business, and must figure before the people as a party which condones corruption and humors the fancy of rich men who are ready to "put up" a large fund to secure legislation. "It presents itself to their eyes," says the careful Boston correspondent of the Hartford Courant, "in the light of rich Boston people coming into the county to settle, and then setting themselves apart from the old town and creating for themselves a new one composed chiefly of their rich and aristocratic selves. They say that, if this is done in one place, it may be in another, and the whole shore may thus be lined with towns of this character, in which much of the taxable property is cut off from its original association."

And yet there is nothing surprising about this. It is the natural sequence of the surrender of 1884, when the old "party of moral ideas" threw away its principles, and accepted a Presidential candidate who had shown his lack of character when he wrote that he "would not be a dead-head" in a matter of legislation pending before him. The Beverly incident in the Massachusetts Legislature is of a piece with the railroad incidents in Speaker Blaine's career in Congress. The Boston Journal has made frantic appeals to the Republicans in the Legislature to take the back track as the only way of avoiding defeat next fall, pointing out that a change of only 4,732 votes last November would have elected a Democratic Governor. The Journal's mistake consists in supposing that a Republican party which had sunk to accepting a Blaine as its candidate for President, and a mere millionaire as its candidate for Governor, would feel squeamish about a little matter like humoring the lobby in the division of a town.

DIAMONDS.

THE sale of the French crown jewels which is now going on in Paris, is probably the most marked indication possible, not exactly of the extinction of the monarchical tradition in France, but of its failure any longer to touch the popular imagination. No such outward and visible sign of the separation of the French people from royalty in all shapes and forms has been afforded in rational times. In the early days of the first Revolution, half-crazed fanatics chose more emphatic modes of expressing hatred and contempt of kings and queens, but in sober days Frenchmen have never until now proposed to put up the "properties" of the Court at public auction. After the war of 1874, the Empress Eugénie's underclothing was disposed of to the highest bidder, but her wardrobe was not an heirloom of the French nation, as the crown jewels have always been considered. The sale of these means clearly that the French people either have done with royalty, or think they have, with a certainty and solemnity they have never experienced before. A monarchy must by immemorial usage have plenty of jewels. A king who had none, or could be eclipsed on a state occasion by a finer display than he could make, on the part of one of his pampered nobles, would feel humiliated. Every people which employs a king, in fact, expects him to have an abundance of diamonds, and would be mortified if he could not make a good show of them on state occasions. In fact, it is almost impossible to conceive of a diamondless king or queen. Diamonds have come down from the middle ages as one of the marks of royalty, and the most essential part of the splendor of a court. They have, ever since the rise of modern Europe out of barbarism, been considered marks of great wealth. Down almost to our own day wealthy people were not very numerous, and all belonged to the court circle. It was then "the thing" for every noble's wife to have a good supply, but for the Queen to have more than any other woman.

In our time, however, wealth, and even great wealth, has become so widely diffused that diamonds are no longer the exclusive luxury of monarchs and the great landholders who formed the nobility or gentry. Every rich woman now lays in a fine supply of diamonds as soon as she comes into her money. There are to-day many women who cannot boast very long descent, who can make a show of diamonds as good as were ever seen at any Christian court. To this class they are more valuable to day than they are to any royal family. During the present century the means of crowned heads, outside their private fortunes, have been on the whole declining, and there is enough revolution in the air in all countries to make the expenditure of large sums on personal luxury or adornment seem a dangerous pastime. In fact, we think it very doubtful whether the diamonds of any of the royal houses have received very marked additions within the last fifty years.

On the other hand, the passage of diamonds into the hands of what may be called "the people"—that is, of recently enriched persons of humble origin—has been going on at a wonderful rate, and has supported the diamond market, in spite of the increased supply and the diminished means of the monarchs and noblemen who were once almost the only purchasers, because the only persons who, under the then generally accepted view of the proper constitution of society, were entitled to wear them. In an age when nearly every one is engaged in one way or another in pursuit of wealth, and the acquisition of wealth means success in life, it is of course desirable to have some simple and conspicuous mode of letting strangers know that you have succeeded. Nothing supplies this so readily as diamonds. They are easily portable; they attract instant attention wherever shown; they bring their value in cash, if one is "hard up," in almost any part of the world, and they produce a wonderful effect in a woman's costume under artificial light. They are, in fact, except rubies, the only means by which one can exhibit a considerable fortune on one's person without seeming odd or ridiculous. How useful they are to many people in this way is readily understood when we remember how deep-seated and widespread what is called "the passion for display" is. The poor girl who wears a cheap gold chain and locket over her waterproof in a street car, is striving after the very same result as the fine lady at a ball who carries one or two hundred thousand dollars' worth of brilliants in her hair and dress; that is, she wants people who know nothing else about her to know that she is in easy circumstances and can command luxuries.

The part played by the diamond in American city politics and railroading in our day is one of the most interesting facts in its history, but needs fuller discussion than we can give it to-day. There is a certain type of man among us who is as sure to buy a large solitaire diamond pin and stick it in his shirt-front, when he has achieved what he considers a proper measure of success in life, as he is to improve his furniture or his house. It is a type which is largely represented among the classes whose calling brings them into contact with many people, such, as we have said, as politicians and railroad conductors. To them the diamond shirt-pin serves the grateful purpose of giving notice to the spectators that the world is not going badly with the wearer, that his fight for the mere necessaries is over, that he has leisure to think of costly ornamentation, and the means to procure it, and that, in short, he is entitled to take his place among the successful people of the world—the people who have "arrived," as the French say. Looked at in this way, the diamond shirt-pin is not as ridiculous as the newspapers try to make it out when they compare it to the "head-light of a locomotive," and tell stories about railroad managers preferring, as a matter of economy, to keep a conductor who has procured his pin to putting in his place one who is still only longing for it. In fact, it does for the owner in our society somewhat the same thing that the little red ribbon in the button hole does for the Frenchman. It takes him out of the common herd, who are still fighting for a bare subsistence and have not begun to dream of luxury or fame.

SPRING MEETING OF THE AMERICAN ORIENTAL SOCIETY.

BOSTON, May 14.

THE spring meeting of the American Oriental Society was held in this city on the 11th instant, in the rooms of the Boston Athenæum. Prof. Whitney, the venerable President of the Society, was again prevented by illness from attending. In his stead Prof. Andrew P. Peabody of Harvard College occupied the chair. After the transaction of the usual business, nine new members were elected to the Society. Since the last meeting death has taken away two of its honorary members, Prof. Adolf Friedrich Stenzler of Breslau, Germany, the well-known Sanskrit scholar, and Mr. Alexander Wylie of London, England; and three corporate members, Mr. Henry C. Kingsley, treasurer of Yale University, Prof. Ephraim W. Gurney of Harvard, and Prof. Charles Short of Columbia College.

Letters were read from a learned Pundit in Bombay, mentioning a paper he had presented to the Bombay branch of the Royal Asiatic Society on "The supposed practice of consanguineous marriages in ancient India;" from Carl Johannsen, Profs. von der Gabelenz in Leipzig, Kuhn in Munich, Bloomfield in Baltimore, etc. Mr. Jewett, a fellow of Harvard College, now studying in Beirut, sent a printed diary of a visit he had paid to the Lebanon.

The papers read before the Society covered a wide range of subjects, and are sufficient evidence of the growing interest taken by American scholars in Oriental philological and historical research. At the morning session Dr. Hayes Ward of the Independent read a paper on a peculiar family of Babylonian cylinders, the meaning of which has until now been misconstrued. Dr. Ward showed several originals of such cylinders belonging to his own collection, and copies of others. George Smith had imagined he saw the Tower of Babel represented upon them. Others have explained the picture to be that of the gates of the underworld opening to receive the dead, and of a porter leading the soul into the presence of the Deity. Dr. Ward now offers a new explanation, which commends itself at once to the Semitic scholar. Certain prominences which are invariably found on the seals he takes to represent mountains, as they undoubtedly do in Assyrian art. The deity surrounded by rays is the Sun-God, Shamash. He has been over night under the earth. The porter opens the gate in the morning to let him out. The weapon he holds in his hand is a representation of the fiercely striking rays of the sun. Dr. Ward explains in a similar manner many expressions in the Bible, such as "Lift up your heads, O ye gates," etc., which are probably taken from some old hymn to the sun. Upon another cylinder, dating about 3500 B. C., Shamash is accompanied by a female personage, who may represent a phase of the moon. Prof. Isaac H. Hall, of the Metropolitan Museum of New York, followed with a lengthy paper on a Syriac MS. containing the Revelation of St. Paul and a tract on "The Extremity of the Romans in the Year 739." These are followed in the MS. by a "hymn of praise before the Holy Mysteries," the text and translation of which were presented. Prof. Hall thinks it is an original Syriac composition not earlier than the tenth century. The Society then listened to a carefully-worked-out paper by the Rev. Mr. Chandler on the transliteration of Sanskrit proper names into Tamil. He was followed by the Rev. W. C. Winslow, Vice-President of the Egypt Exploration Fund, who showed the Society a volume of the beautiful edition of the Egyptian 'Book of the Dead,' lately finished by M. Naville. According to Mr. Winslow, this great production is in no way to be regarded as a bible. It is a book of the dead and for the dead. Only by inference can the living know how to live well and to do right. The next paper, by Prof. John Avery, was on the languages on the eastern and northeastern boundaries of India. Prof. Avery dwelt particularly upon the Katchurri and Garro as the two most important of this group. They are sister tongues, and, where they vary from each other, some outside influence has been at work. This comes generally from the Assamese, the Katchurri having borrowed more than the Garro. Prof. Lyon of Harvard College read a short notice of the first fasciculus of Delitzsch's Assyrian Dictionary. He thinks that the work is planned upon too large a scale, and will take many years before it is completed. Before the morning session closed, Prof. Selah Merrill said a few words about the second wall of Jerusalem, 120 feet of which had lately been uncovered under his direction. The wall runs eighty yards from the Jaffa gate. Prof. Merrill explained the whole route which the wall probably took.

Prof. M. Jastrow of the University of Pennsylvania opened the afternoon session with a paper entitled "Iconomatic Writing in Assyrian." This paper was based on a theory advanced by Dr. D. G. Brinton to account for the transition from picture to phonetic writing. An intermediate stage is assumed between these two modes of expressing thought—a stage through which every system of writing has had to pass, i. e., the use of pictures to designate some object similar or identical in sound with the object originally denoted by the picture. Prof. Jastrow thinks he can point out analogous cases in Assyrian—i. e., shubtu, dwelling, and shubatu, dress, which are both represented by one sign, Ku. Coming down to later times, Prof. Toy of Harvard College discussed "The Lokman Story." This personage is much in favor with the old Arabs, but their reports concerning him are very conflicting. Prof. Toy, after carefully reviewing the theories of Derenbourg and Sprenger, brought forward his own, which supposes Lokman to be the mythical representative of a tribe or of certain families which survived the destruction of the tribe of 'Âd. This was afterwards brought into connection with the great wandering of Yemenite tribes towards the north. The rest of the story is the attempt of historians to make order out of chaos. Dr. R. Gottheil of Columbia College presented a paper on "A Syriac Bahîrâ Legend," the text and translation of which will be published in the Journal of the Society. Bahîrâ is the Christian Monk who is said to have been the teacher of Mohammed. Out of this idea a legend has been woven, which, in the form of an apocalypse, is a polemic against the Mohammedan religion. Dr. Gottheil also presented two other papers, "On a Syriac Lexicographic MS. belonging to the Union Theological Seminary of New York," and "An Old Syriac MS. of the New Testament belonging to the Rev. Mr. Neesan." The remaining papers were read in part by the Secretary. There were two by Dr. Jackson of Columbia College, "The Similes in the Avesta taken from the Animal World," and "Translation of a Passage in the Avesta which has not yet been rendered into English." Three papers were sent by Prof. Hopkins of Bryn Mawr: "The Battle-array in the Mahâbhârata," "On Prof. Oppert's View that Gunpowder and Firearms were known in Bhârata Times," and "On Prof. Buchler's New Translation of the Laws of Manu."

The Society adjourned to meet on October 26 either at New Haven or at Baltimore, as the Executive Committee may decide. R. J. H. G.

THE MORAL OF THE SCHNAEBELÉ AFFAIR.

PARIS, May 2.

THE Pagny incident has been settled, as we had from the first hoped it would be, conformably to international law and the jus gentium. M. Schnaebelé, inveigled upon German soil by the disloyal zeal of a subaltern, was released unconditionally as soon as the circumstances of his arrest were exactly ascertained. In truth, the facts of the case were so simple, the trap so undeniable, that Americans may perhaps be amazed at the perturbed feeling which for ten days has agitated Europe, checking commercial transactions, and raising in everybody's mind the spectre of a war of extermination between two great peoples. But if our public opinion is sometimes susceptible or excitable to excess, it is seldom that the fundamental causes of its emotion are not serious; and he would strangely err who should accuse European nerves of having been stretched and irritated for no plausible motive. No, Europe was not mistaken: the motive of anxiety and perturbation exists; but this motive is, not the Pagny incident—a mere episode—but the state of the political relations between Germany and France. Now that the matter has been rectified to the satisfaction of both the parties concerned, it is proper to ask if European diplomacy, the coöperation and conspiracy (so to speak) of the good sense of all, ought not to seek remedies for the perilous situation which has, from day to day, excited so much alarm and gloomy foreboding. The German press itself—I mean the honest and relatively impartial press—invites us to the delicate quest of palliatives, if not of remedies, and professes to be ready to take part in it. There are times when silence is the only reasonable and prudent policy, when questions are solved only by affecting unwillingness to solve them; there are other times, like the present, as I believe, when our duty is to attack openly the formidable problems which imperil the dignity, the interests, and the future of European nations.

First and foremost we must put aside one class of considerations. It is said and reiterated that the burden of armaments, and of what has been called with reason the armed peace, imposes on peoples such heavy obligations that they prefer to have done with it (en finir) by a violent and decisive shock rather than endure indefinitely the overwhelming expense. This was the talk as far back as 1815, and it has been repeated before and after every war; but no European war has modified the state of things in this respect. Neither the victors nor the vanquished have disarmed. Crushed by Russia in 1877, Turkey to-day has at her disposal an army as strong and as numerous as before Plevna. Austria is much more powerful at this moment than on the eve of Sadowa. The increase of military expenditure is not so heavy as is imagined, if we take account of the constant diminution in the value of money. Besides, as the wealth of nations does not cease to grow, it naturally increases in like measure the resources at their command to preserve themselves against invasion. No one thinks of diminishing the number of police agents charged with maintaining the internal peace. On the contrary, the complaint is frequent that they are unequal to their task. Permanent armies, charged with the police of the frontiers, are as necessary an evil as gendarmes; nor is their existence any greater menace of peace than is that of policemen numerous and powerfully armed against attempts at disorder and rebellion.

We may further reply to those who dream of a terrible shock "pour en finir," that such collisions have never ended anything, unless we go back to the third Punic war or to the submission of Gaul to Julius Cæsar. Napoleon would fain have finished with Europe when he went to Moscow; he had wanted to finish with Austria in 1809. It is notorious how badly he succeeded. And yet, in 1809 as in 1812, he wielded a military power more formidable than that of all his neighbors and enemies in coalition. To-day, between France and Germany, the situation is wholly different. If in 1870 the inequality between the military forces of the two countries was profound, to-day all competent judges allow that causes, more or less real, of inequality are hardly discoverable. Now in 1870, when France was almost disarmed, it was a narrow chance that the battle of Saint-Privat did not drive the invaders beyond the Rhine, the army of the Loire cause the siege of Paris to be raised, the resistance of Metz, prolonged for another fortnight, force the Germans to retreat precipitately upon the Vosges. We had then five or six hundred thousand men, of whom many had never handled a gun; we have to-day three millions of genuine soldiery. Who would dare assert that there could be any finishing with three millions of men, resting on impregnable fortresses, fighting not for glory or for the ambition of a single man, but for the safety and very existence of their country?

What is true of France is true of Germany. It wields a formidable military power, immense resources accumulated during sixteen years of peace. If Germany cannot hope, without a veritable aberration of conceit, to finish with the France of 1887, neither could France, without equal folly, flatter herself on finishing with Germany. The result of a war would be the massacre of two or three hundred thousand men, the squandering of ten milliards; then, after some months of violent encounters and sterile butcheries, a more or less imperious mediation which would establish the status quo ante. To desire and pray for such a war—is it mere folly, or is it not the most stupid contempt of the good sense of peoples and the conscience of the human race?

We see, therefore, that the armaments and engines of destruction may become, and are in fact becoming by the force of things, the most effective guaranty of peace. So said, thirty years ago, Sir William Armstrong, who professed to be manufacturing cannon in the interest of international good relations. Such has long been the voice of the wisdom of nations in the well-known formula, Si vis pacem, para bellum. A manifest inequality of force between two neighboring nations almost fatally leads to a rupture of equilibrium—a law of history reflecting a physical law. For that reason, the feeble States of Europe are protected by the collective guaranty of the strong States. And as for the latter, they have to protect themselves by the fear which their strength inspires: disarmament would be equivalent to suicide.

Thus war is not a solution: it would be one more calamity added to so many others, opening an indefinite perspective of new wars. Outside of any consideration of humanity and progress, peace is imposed; but the memory of past wars is a sad heritage which weighs, and will long weigh, on the stability of this peace. The task of diplomacy is all the more lofty: it consists in fixing the conditions of the pacific relations which may and should exist between two peoples accustomed to slaughter each other periodically for two hundred years. I believe the problem clearly indicated. I believe, also, that it is far from being insoluble.

One fact which dominates all the rest is, that the France of 1887 cannot forget the entire France of twenty years ago. By so doing she would efface her name from the list of great peoples and commit moral suicide. The consequence of this, for sensible and pacific minds in Germany, is, that care should be taken not to remind the France of 1887, by more or less voluntary provocations, what was the France of 1789 and the France respected by the treaties of 1815. In order to that, the first duty of the rulers of Germany is to return to the traditions of M. de Manteuffel, and to break energetically with the system initiated by M. de Hohenlohe. Public opinion in Germany confesses that a wrong track has been followed for a year past; I will not declare the thoughts which this brutal policy inspires in French public opinion. The two countries would agree in applauding the modification of a rule which is in defiance of the ideas of the nineteenth century, of those which German philosophers and jurisconsults have not been the last to insist upon.

The duty of France with respect to this painful question was traced by Gambetta in a well-known mot which I may be dispensed from repeating. The question is asked in Germany if this ever-vigilant thought, if these imprescriptible hopes, are compatible with the maintenance of a solid peace. Doubt is no longer permitted on this point. For sixteen years France and Germany have lived in peace; for sixteen years their relations, without being friendly, have for the greater part of that period been free from tension. When a tension was produced, as in 1875 and in 1887, everybody in Europe knows that the German military party was the cause. Among them have been found and still exist many people—many young officers of the Imperial Guard, for example—who lightly speak of finishing, perhaps because their short-sighted patriotism unconsciously confounds itself with the appetite for promotion. I have said there could be no question of finishing, and that is enough to hold up to the just severity of Europe the doings of a military party which is not the German nation, and which cannot pretend to make itself, abroad, the interpreter of Germany's sentiments and wishes.

The war-party Germans, who are relatively few in number, but who make more noise than the rest, maintain that France cherishes aggressive designs; that she has armed herself, not in self-defence, but for attack. As to this there are two opinions in Germany. Some, who are wholly ignorant, represent all France to be possessed with bellicose ideas; others, more prudent, go no further than to complain of the presence among us of a turbulent minority that might one day (as was seen in 1870) drag into an offensive war the most numerous part of the nation. I shall make no reply to the first: let them take the trouble to open their eyes and ears. But an answer is due to the second, since Bismarck affects to be of their mind. The most conclusive response would be a collection of articles from the French press—the provincial not overlooked, as is lightly done—published during the first months of the present year. If certain men among us have desired war, they have wanted Germany to declare it; nobody has lifted his voice in advocacy of the offensive. Public opinion would not have hesitated to consider as a provocative agent and a public enemy any one who should have repeated in 1887 the words of Émile de Girardin in 1870. War can be declared to-day only by the Chambers; it is no longer at the mercy of feminine influences or an old man's whim. Now the Chambers are not the minority, but the most imposing expression of the majority of Frenchmen. As well-informed and candid Germans admit that this majority, this immense majority, is pacific, they ought to confess that the Chambers are equally so, and consequently that the fear of being attacked, with which they excuse themselves in the face of Europe, is either insincere, or unreasonable, or utterly chimerical.

The Pagny incident would not have produced so much alarm if the excitement of the month of February had not left in all minds profound traces and (as it were) seeds of panic. It is the manifestation, the symptom, of a tense situation which has been the work of certain declaimers envenoming at pleasure a situation already delicate. Delicate it will remain—it is impossible that it should be otherwise. It will be, perhaps, for long years, the concordia discors of which the Latin poet speaks. But it will be, if both sides will lend themselves to it, a frank peace, a paix voulue, all the more because it needs, in order to endure, the concurrence of the will, the good will, of governments and peoples. Let the peace betwixt Germany and France be imaged by one of those frontier-posts of which there has been so much talk in these latter days. When a storm comes upon it, it leans to one side or other, or is even laid flat by a gust of wind. Straightway two representatives of the adjoining countries unite in setting it up again. Ill luck would have it that once one of these representatives was a worthless or foolish creature, but great nations are not apt to be represented by such men. The noise made by the Pagny incident, the gloomy reports it put in circulation from the Tagus to the Bosphorus, the sadness with which it filled those who wish to live, to labor, and produce, will not have been lost for the welfare of mankind and the peace of Europe, if they inspire governments and nations with the sincere resolve to remove future conflicts by a desire for peace at once passionate and rational. The peace necessary for all ought to be a peace desired by all: cupias quodcunque necesse est. S. R.

WESTERN MORTGAGES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Unquestionably the note of warning sounded by "L." in the Nation in regard to Western mortgages, comes none too soon. At the same time, all Western mortgages ought not to be placed in the same category. For many years the placing of funds upon the security of well improved farms has been recognized as a safe and legitimate business. Nothing could be further from either risk or speculation. Good rates of interest have been returned to investors in these securities, and no losses sustained. Many thousands of Western farmers are to-day either entirely out of debt, or are in comfortable circumstances, through having had the use of money to improve and stock up their farms. Had funds not been obtainable at reasonable rates, opportunities would not have been afforded them of fencing, building good barns, buying cows, etc.; and in consequence of this inability to diversify their pursuits, there would be still greater quantities of the crude products of the Western farm dumped upon the grain markets of the Old World.

While all this is true as regards the placing of what are called "farm loans," yet it will be frankly admitted that in many sections of the West to-day this business is being sadly overdone, or is being done by some in a reckless way. The older and more cautious people living in the West, who have had years of experience in the business, view with alarm and dismay the tendency on the part of many to "overloan," i. e., to advance too much upon the security offered. It is quite the fashion to do this now to a great extent. Firms or companies unwilling to make large loans are, for the time being, left behind in the race for business. They are doing less business than formerly and at reduced rates. Reduced rates means not only a restricted business in the field of operations, but less cash in the treasury out of which to pay great advertising bills in Eastern papers and large commissions for the sale of securities. Conceding, however, that the claims presented by many that, with the rapid increase of population, all the good farming lands of the West will double in price within the next ten years, what shall be said of the security lying back of the town and city real-estate loans, now so readily placed in the East? Will the expectations of all the city builders of the country be met? Will there not be some foolish building following foolish "booming"? Will the valuations put upon property in far inland towns, of $500 to $1,000 per front foot, stand the test of time? Will loans made upon some of these valuations of 1887 be found safe upon reduced valuations of '92, when effervescing local judgment as to values will have subsided somewhat?

These are quite proper and pertinent questions for investors to ask, as well as the basis of values underlying farm mortgages. By exercising due diligence and discriminating care, no Eastern investor in Western mortgages or securities need ever lose either principal or interest. Failing to investigate the class and character of the mortgages taken, as well as the character and capacity of the men in the West through whom the business is conducted, will no doubt entail possible loss and hardship upon investors in the not very far distant future. This in turn will, later on, react against the deserving Western agricultural borrower, whose security, however intrinsically good, will be looked upon with suspicion, and, if accepted at all, will be at greatly enhanced rates of interest. JOSEPH SAMPSON.

STORM LAKE, IOWA, May 9, 1887.

THE BEEKMAN AND CLINTON COATS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The last number of your paper has, in the article "Crazy Heraldry," a few misstatements which I take the liberty to correct.

It says the Beekman coat armor lacks authenticity. I have not seen the book, the Library copy being at the binder's; but if the same is as follows — two roses, separated by a running stream—it is the coat-of-arms granted by James I. of England to Gerard Beekman, the grandfather of William Beekman, who became the ancestor of the family in America. Gerard Beekman was a graduate of the University of Heidelberg, a zealous Protestant; and in behalf of his church he went to England about 1612 to implore the help of the "Defender of the Faith" for the persecuted Reformed Church. On this occasion he was made "armiger." The records under my charge contain on many letters written by William Beekman impressions of his seal, as described, in wax.

Of the Clinton coat-of-arms your article says, "Only one of the three governors of this name used it." I suppose you refer to Admiral George Clinton, Royal Governor of New York from 1748 to 1753. The Admiral was of the family (second son) of the sixth Earl of Lincoln, a family which bears now the title of Dukes of Newcastle. He called Charles Clinton, the father of Governor George, of the State of New York, cousin, and the latter used the same coat-of-arms as Privy Seal, in sealing State commissions, as the Royal Governor had done. Examples of it may be seen in the State Library. His nephew, Gov. De Witt Clinton, made use of the same, as he had a perfect right to do. B. FERNOW.

STATE LIBRARY, ALBANY, N. Y., May 6, 1887.

[We see nothing in the foregoing letter to modify our assertion that the Beekman arms lacked confirmation. Mr. Vermont printed first as Beekman arms a coat of a griffin holding a helmet in his paws. He gave his usual vague authorities. The coat, however, was obviously copied from Burke's 'General Armory'—no authority at all in such a case. Then he found that this coat was wrong, and printed in plate xvii another coat, viz., a bend wavy between two roses, giving as authority the seal of William Beekman. After his first conspicuous blunder, we naturally asked confirmation of the second coat. An early use of a seal is fair evidence, no doubt, but we should very much like to know if the grant of arms by James I. to Gerard Beekman has been printed. If it has been, it should have been cited; if not, the sooner it is printed the better for the Beekman claim.

As to the Clintons, Mr. Vermont, in his appendix, goes further than Mr. Fernow does, for he says that a letter in the New York State Library shows that the emigrant, Col. Charles Clinton, was son of James and grandson of William, who was a son of the second Earl of Lincoln. We should be glad to see a copy of this all-important letter. We cannot accept Mr. Vermont as a safe reporter of essential facts, as examples before cited show. The letter is important, for, if correct, the American line is entitled to recognition in the British Peerages, and the male heirs would be in the line of succession to the Earldom of Lincoln.—ED. NATION.]

ARCHÆOLOGY IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I shall not trouble you with a controversion of Messrs. Clarke and Emerson's reply to my letter on Archæology in the Mediterranean, so far as Cyrenaica is concerned, because I have never been in the country myself, and base my conclusions on what I have heard from the French and Italian archæologists. The fact, however, that your correspondents have made excursions in the country does not impugn what I wrote, since making rapid and unimposing excursions in any barbarous country is a different thing from entering into serious and prolonged undertakings there. Mr. Reinach could advise the Institute much better than I, as he knows the history of the prior attempts. I had my attention directed to the Cyrenaica years before Mr. Clarke suggested it as a field, but was told that it was impracticable from the hostility of the tribes in the interior towards any foreign intervention. It is only a few months ago that the unsubmitted Tuaregs made a descent, I think on Ghat, so submissive are they to the Turkish rule, and exterminated the entire Turkish garrison; and there is nothing practically to prevent them from raiding as far as Benghasy. It was for this reason that I said that where the authority of the Turks ceases, the Tuaregs will stop excavation, and where they cannot prevent it, the Porte will.

There is very great political jealousy about the Tripolitaine. The best course to follow would be to see, first, if the Porte would give a firman. I quite agree with Mr. Clarke as to the value of the field for archæological research, but I should strongly advise taking the advice of experienced explorers before undertaking any expense in that direction. For many years French archæologists, as well as English and German, have had their eyes on Tripoli, but at this present moment there is no Power which is free from suspicion as to its views on the East. Even in Crete I was often told that the United States had long entertained a desire to annex the island. No Oriental believes a direct statement of anybody as to politics, but that what is said is merely the cover for what is intended. If the Porte can be induced to give a firman for excavation in Cyrenaica, where it can protect the excavators, and the United States Government will promise to hold the Porte to its engagements, it would be safe to risk an expedition there; otherwise not, in my opinion.

As to Italy, however, I am only surprised that Messrs. Emerson and Clarke should have gone to work in open violation of the Italian law, and expect to be let off with merely filling up their excavations. The naïveté of foreigners who suppose they can come into a civilized country and undertake excavations especially forbidden, without authorization by the royal Government, and without taking the trouble to ask for a permission, "needs no comment." If Messrs. Clarke and Emerson had taken the trouble to ascertain the state of the law on archæological investigation before beginning, they would have found that any such work must be authorized by the Ministry of Instruction, and that the communal authorities have no more right to permit it than the Town Council of Salem, Mass. On the contrary, the communal authorities are continually conniving at clandestine excavations by which many objects of archæological interest are taken from the country, not "for scientific ends," but as "treasure trove," and the Ministry is obliged to employ a large staff of persons whose business it is to prevent any such digging. Messrs. Emerson and Clarke were, in fact, poaching, and, if they had been Italians, would have been punished more severely than by the reclosing of their trenches. Their indignation against "those at the head of archæology in Italy" is, under the circumstances, amusing. Their attempt to evade the Italian law will probably make it difficult for the Institute to get the permit which would once have been easy. The Government applies these restrictions not to prevent foreign museums from acquiring objects found here, but to keep an exact record of what is found and where it was found, and to be enabled to purchase for its own museums what is necessary to fill gaps in the Italian collections. In this they deserve the hearty support of every scientific archæologist.

Yours truly, W. J. STILLMAN.

VENICE, May 5.

Notes.

THE Historical Society of Pennsylvania propose to issue a volume to commemorate the centennial anniversary of the adoption of the Federal Constitution. It will contain the debates in the Pennsylvania Convention that ratified the Constitution, a number of able essays that appeared at the time, and biographical sketches of the Pennsylvanians who were members of the State and of the Federal Conventions. The debates in the Pennsylvania Convention have never been printed since they appeared in the newspapers a century ago. What Elliot gives as the Pennsylvania debates is nothing but the remarks made by Judge Wilson, in a debate of a number of days, brought into the form of a single speech. This valuable work will be edited by Prof. John Bach McMaster. It should furnish an example to the historical societies of the other original States.

G. P. Putnam's Sons will print at once, in their series of "Questions of the Day," the recent address by Edward Atkinson before the Boston Labor Union, on the subject of 'The Margin of Profit: How it is Now Divided: What Part of the Present Hours of Labor can now be Spared. With this address will be printed the reply of Mr. E. M. Chamberlain, representing the Labor Union, and Mr. Atkinson's rejoinder to the reply. The volume will contain certain tabular representations, analyzing the sources of the product and the division of the product of labor and capital, together with a chart entitled "The Labor Spectrum," which presents the full details of the present division of profits. They also announce 'Taxation: Its Principles and Methods,' a translation of 'First Principles of the Science of Finance' by Prof. Luigi Cossa of the University of Pavia, with an introduction by Horace White; 'Gleanings from Matinecock, and Other Studies,' sketches and stories illustrating the Dutch traditions of Long Island and the banks of the Hudson; and 'The Lost Wedding Ring,' a study of present social conditions.

Roberts Brothers have in press a new book of social studies by Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton, entitled 'Ourselves and Our Neighbors'; 'A Week away from Time,' a Cape Cod Decameron; and 'Cracker Joe,' a story of Florida life, in the third "No Name Series."

A hymn and tune-book for congregational use is to be issued in the early autumn by Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. It is edited by Profs. Harris and Tucker of Andover, with the co-operation, as musical editor, of Mr. E. K. Glezen of Providence.

Anson D. F. Randolph & Co. will publish immediately 'The Church of the Early Fathers, External History,' by Alfred Plummer ("Epochs of Church History Series"); 'Sundays at Balmoral,' sermons by the late Principal Tulloch; 'Our Sovereign Lady and her People,' by the author of 'English Hearts and English Hands'; 'Outlines of a Gentle Life,' by Maria V. C. Havergal, 'Abide in Christ' and 'Like Christ,' by the Rev. Andrew Murray; and 'Men of the Bible,' by the Rev. Geo. Rawlinson, Archdeacon Farrar, Canon T. K. Cheyne, etc.

D. P. Lindsley, No. 817 North Forty-fifth Street, Philadelphia, sends us specimen pages of 'The Shorthand Exercise Book,' which represents his latest innovation on the older methods of phonography. It will be issued in parts.

Mr. T. Humphry Ward, the editor of 'Men of the Time,' 'Men of the Reign,' 'English Poets,' and 'British Artists,' is to edit also 'The Reign of Queen Victoria: a Survey of Fifty Years of Progress,' which seems to be similar in scope to the collection of papers published in Harper's Magazine during our centennial year. In Mr. Ward's book the army and navy will be treated by Lords Wolseley and Brassey; India by Sir H. S. Maine; science by Prof. Huxley; schools by Mr. Matthew Arnold; literature by Mr. Richard Garnett, and the theatre by Mr. William Archer. The editor himself, as the art critic of the London Times, will probably write the chapter on the art of England.

The library of the late Richard M. Hoe is to be sold at auction in this city by Bangs & Co., on May 23–25. It is a truly "extraordinary collection of works on printing and the allied arts," and one could have wished it rather transferred en bloc to the great New York Public Library of the near future. A few hundred works, scientific and literary, swell the total number to 2,050. To remark on these in much detail is not practicable. The buyer can choose between early and rare works in many languages, facsimiles, limited editions, large-paper editions, etc., etc. The following lots are notable: No. 240, Chatto and Jackson's 'Treatise on Wood-Engraving,' ed. 1839, extended by the insertion of more than 1,000 engravings, woodcuts, etc., to three volumes; and No. 1304, Typographical Miscellanies in 37 volumes, consisting of more than 2,000 mounted engravings on copper, wood, etc., with 1,300 printers' devices and title-pages, autograph letters, fragments of old black-letter and Gothic-type books, etc., etc. No. 1409 is an old German wood-block of thirteen lines for book printing; No. 374 is a catalogue of Elzevirian productions drawn up in 1674; No. 965 is an Index Librorum of the Plantin Press made in 1615. Other Plantiniana are Nos. 1051, 1052, 1053, bibliographical works of recent date. No. 1635 is the first American edition of Bewick's 'Quadrupeds.' No. 450 is Philippe Gautier's Latin poem, 'Alexandreis' (1558), containing the famous line—"Incidis in Scyllam cupiens vitare Charybdin."

Two more volumes of the Riverside Edition of Robert Browning's Poetic and Dramatic Works (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), leave but two to complete the tale. The third is wholly taken up with "The Ring and the Book"; the fourth embraces "Balaustion's Adventure," "Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau," "Fifine at the Fair," and the various beads strung on threads called "Men and Women," "Dramatis Personæ," etc.; "Mr. Sludge, the Medium," falling under the latter rubric. We have already praised the manufacture of this compact and sightly edition.

Caldecott collectors will prize above its intrinsic worth 'The Owls of Olynn Belfry: a Tale for Children, Illustrated by Randolph Caldecott' (Scribner & Welford). The designs are trivial, and many of them not characteristic enough to betray the artist. The story, too, as substance, is calculated for very small children, and in style is much above them. The little book is prettily printed.

The thirty-third bound volume of the Century is distinguished by the beginning of Messrs. Hay and Nicolay's "Abraham Lincoln." In it, too, Mr. Howells's "Minister's Charge" is brought to a conclusion. Other features we remark are "Gettysburg," in the series of War Papers; Mr. Edward Atkinson's striking papers on the "Relative Strength and Weakness of Nations"; Mr. Stillman's "Greek Coins"; Prof. Stoddard's "Composite Photography," etc. The beautiful illustrations of the articles on modern French sculpture deserve mention. In portraits the volume is extremely rich: we can name those of Lincoln, Van Buren, Tyler, Pierce, Clay, George Bancroft, Cass, Giddings, Banks, Stanton, Lee, Hawthorne, Eli Whitney, Dr. McCosh, the actor Coquelin.

The Proceedings of the Bostonian Society, just published, is of greater interest than those which have appeared in former years. In addition to the annual address of the President and the reports of the various committees, it contains a very carefully prepared catalogue of the numerous recent additions to the Society's collection of portraits and other objects of historical or antiquarian interest relating to Boston. Among the portraits are several Copleys, that of Col. Thomas Marshall being heliotyped as a frontispiece for this number. There is also an etching of the Clark Arms formerly in the house belonging to Sir C. H. Frankland, and copies of several documents acquired by the Society.

In 'Per mare, per terras' (London: T. F. Unwin), Mr. Archibald Sutter tells in a rather entertaining way the story of his travels in Australia, New Zealand, and the United States. A little more than a third of the volume is devoted to this country, and contains some useful hints to intending emigrants. The author's opinion of Americans is unusually favorable, considering his nationality. "They are," he says, "the kindest people living, if they would not be so dreadfully gone upon making money." As this sentence shows, the book is written in a very careless style, as if wayside notes were hastily thrown together without revision.

A recent advertisement in London of Mr. John H. Ingram's 'Edgar Allan Poe: his Life, Letters, and Opinions,' is rather suggestive of sharp practice, as it contains a quotation from Mr. Lowell: "Remarkable experiences are usually confined to the inner life of imaginative men, but Poe's biography displays vicissitude and peculiarity of interest such as is rarely met with." This quotation is so used as to suggest to the unwary reader that it was Poe's biography by Mr. Ingram that Mr. Lowell was praising, than which nothing could be further from the fact.

The fifth sheet of the great Topographical Atlas of New Jersey now issuing by the State Geological Survey takes its name from Flemington, roughly assumed as the centre of the district shown. Somerville marks the extreme eastern, Trenton the extreme southern limit of this map, of which the Delaware forms for the most part the western boundary. The region lying between the Delaware, the Raritan, north of the Philadephia and Reading Road, is seldom visited and little known, and hides in its rough landscape a civilization of corresponding rudeness and primitiveness. Three more sheets remain to complete the seventeen, viz., Nos. 10, 14, and 15. These will probably be ready next year.

Science promises at an early date a map of Central Africa, with special reference to the route of Stanley's expedition for the relief of Emin Bey.

Mr. Edward Atkinson, who has for many years had cheap and wholesome cookery very much at heart, makes a practical contribution to the subject in the American Architect for May 14, where he pictures and describes his "Aladdin" Cooker. This contrivance is heated by a kerosene lamp, with the economy that may be imagined, yet with a waste of heat afflicting to Mr. Atkinson, who is led to calculate that our natural "net loss from bad cooking and waste" is $1,000,000,000 worth of food and fuel per annum.

The uncalculated secondary effects of legislation will probably be as richly exemplified by the Inter-State Commerce Act as by any measure of recent years. We read in the American Bookmaker for May some remarks by Mr. Andrew Little, the type-founder of this city, to the effect that the law in question "commanded the tariff of the railroads to be put in type not smaller than pica, and consequently every foundry has been running at its full capacity on this size." Already, by the way, the Lawyers' Coöperative Publishing Co., of Rochester, N. Y., have begun publishing a series of 'Inter-State Commerce Reports,' being decisions and proceedings of the Commission and decisions of the courts. No. 1 contains the text of the Act, with an index.

The American collection of 'Ballads of Books' was an anthology from the poets of the past and present; but in 'Les Légendes du Livre' (Paris: Lemerre; New York: F. W. Christern), M. F. Fertiault, a single poet, has gathered together nearly 200 poems of his own, all in praise of books and authors, or telling anecdotes about them.

M. Henri de Lapommeraye, who in 1871 defended the "Visite de Noces" of Alexandre Dumas in a dialogue of which the form was suggested by Molière, again presents himself as the champion of the paradoxical dramatist, in "La Critique de Francillon" (Paris: Jouaust; New York: Duprat & Co.). He adds on his title-page that his comedy is borrowed from the "Critique de l'École des Femmes," and, in fact, there are many speeches wholly reproduced from Molière, while the names of all the characters are the same. This only adds to the charm of M. de Lapommeraye's jeu d'esprit. But it can scarcely be said that the modern Dorante defends the morality of "Francillon" against the attacks of Lysidas and Célimène as successfully as Molière's Dorante defends "L'École des Femmes." M. Alexandre Dumas claims to be considered as a moralist in his plays. In everything he does there is an attempt to rise to the tone of a spiritual director. But it will take more serious argumentation than is to be found in "La Critique de Francillon" to raise the author of "La Dame aux Camélias" and "La Femme de Claude" to the rank of a moralist.

The infelicity that attends French writers when they attempt to meddle with anything English befell the late novelist, Féval. Polybiblion ends his obituary with the remark, "Some of his works were signed with the pseudonym Sir Francis Trollopp." Now, Trollope with a final e is a name honored, more or less, in English; but trollop without the e is a word of an ill savor, which Féval certainly would not have used if he had known what he was doing.

Volumes lvi, lvii, and lviii of the Compendium of the Imperial Russian Historical Society have been issued. Volume lvi continues the publication of the protocols, journals, and ukases of the Supreme Privy Council under the Empress Catharine I., for August and December, 1726; volume lvii contains the third instalment of the political correspondence of Catharine II. for 1764–66, in which publication special attention is paid to the "autograph resolutions" of the Empress, as striking traits which must be used by biographers for her proper characterization. Volume lviii begins the new series, and contains the beginning of the very curious reports of the French Minister at the court of Catharine I. for the first nine months of the year 1725.

A conference of Moscow physicians has entered a protest against overstraining the minds of scholars in the gymnasia. The studies at which their protest is levelled are the dead languages—so far as translation from Russian into them is concerned—and Church-Slavic. The excuse for the study of the latter tongue is that there is danger of degeneration of the Russian proper. The same complaint which is current in other countries is made in this case, that the language of the day has already degenerated and is wofully slipshod. This assertion is so sweeping that it includes Turgeneff, Tolstoi, and all writers of the century, though no names are mentioned.

On March 8, Pavel Vasilievitch Annenkoff died in Dresden. He was one of the prominent representatives of the literature of the forties, and a critic whose judgment was so highly respected that Turgeneff was in the habit, towards the end of his life, of submitting his writings to him in manuscript. Some of his correspondence with Turgeneff has recently been published. He was born in Moscow in 1811. His literary activity began about 1840, when he went abroad and met Turgeneff in Berlin. He wrote letters to the great critic, Bielinsky, which were published in the Annals of the Fatherland. On subsequent visits abroad, he wrote other series of letters which were highly esteemed, and which appeared in the Contemporary. His chief publication was the edition of Pushkin's works and the 'Materials' for his life, which long ranked as the best attainable. He spent the latter part of his life abroad, but continued his critical writings, which are numerous, and concern all the most prominent Russian authors of the century.

B. Westermann & Co. send us the prospectus of a sumptuous folio edition of the painter Menzel's work ('Das Werk Adolph Menzels, vom Künstler autorisierte Ausgabe'). There will be 120 untouched reproductions after the original paintings, drawings, etc. Only 350 numbered copies of this memorial of a versatile artist will be printed.

—The legal profession and all students of legal history will be interested to know of the formation of the Selden Society in England, "mainly for the purpose of collecting and editing in a convenient form materials for . . . English legal history." Nothing is of greater promise for the promotion of the science of jurisprudence in English-speaking countries than this enterprise, and it is to be hoped that the Selden Society will have the means of prosecuting its labors with energy. In the Provisional Committee of the Society we observe the names of the Chief Justice of England, Lord Justice Fry, Mr. Justice Wills, Professors Dicey, Pollock, and Skeat, Mr. F. W. Maitland, and various distinguished persons, members of the bar and others. The mass of unpublished material which lies ready for such a society is enormous. The Society might in some form continue Palgrave's 'Rotuli Curiæ Regis,' or the 'Abbreviatio Placitorum,' or Mr. Maitland's work in reproducing the early criminal law records, or the early proceedings of the Court of Chancery, of which there is a vast unpublished collection. And there is an immense mass of material besides all this. Besides attacking in some way these unpublished records, the Society has in mind the preparation of new editions of Glanville, Bracton, Fleta, and other old treatises, and the collection of materials for a good dictionary of the law French, or what Prof. Skeat would call Anglo-French.

—A number of prominent American lawyers have already become members of the Selden Society, and it is hoped that many others may join. All persons, whether lawyers or not, who are interested in the undertaking, are invited to become members. It is evident that the publications of the Society will be of great interest and value, and also that the amount of its work will depend on the number of its members. From a copy of a "draft prospectus" which has reached us, we take the following statement: "The annual subscription to the Society is one guinea, due on the first of January of the year then commencing. Members have no further liability of any kind. Every subscriber will receive a copy of all the publications for the year. A composition of twenty guineas is accepted in lieu of all annual subscriptions, constituting life membership from the date of composition. In the case of libraries and corporate bodies, the privilege extends to a period of years. The subscription for 1887 is now due, and should be paid—in England, to the Honorary Secretary and Treasurer, Mr. P. Edward Dove, No. 23 Old Buildings, Lincoln's Inn, London; in America, to Prof. J. B. Thayer, Cambridge, Mass., who has kindly undertaken to receive all American subscriptions."

—We have received from Judge Fornander of Honolulu a long reply to our critique (Nation, August 26, 1886) of his third volume on the Polynesian Race. So far as it challenges our opinion of what, without disrespect, we must term his philological vagaries, we cannot, in accordance with our necessary usage, publish his rejoinder. Having, however, attributed to him the early adoption of a preconceived theory as to Polynesian origins, we give below a few autobiographical extracts, premising that Judge Fornander was forty-eight years of age when his story begins:

"In 1860 I commenced collecting the ancient legends, chants, prayers, genealogies, proverbs—in fact, the folk lore of every kind that could be gathered from the older inhabitants—those who had attained to manhood during the previous period of heathenism, or who, for special reasons, had been instructed in the ancient folk-lore by the survivors and important actors of that period. My object in so doing was simply to preserve those precious fragments from oblivion, and for scientific utilization at some future opportunity. At that time I had no set or pet 'theory' on Polynesian subjects other than that held generally by ethnologists and scientists of that day as to the racial and linguistic affinities of the Malays and Polynesians. Some time in 1863 I ceased collecting, and it was over two years more before I had an opportunity and leisure to arrange, collate, and critically examine my collection. I then found that the Polynesians had a very different account to render of themselves and their past national life to what had generally been attributed to them. I followed these revelations as mariners are said to underrun a cable to find out where the anchor lies, and step by step I followed them from the Pacific to the Indian Archipelago, from there to the western shores of Hindustan and the head of the Persian Gulf. . . . Up to this period (1866) I had no theory whatever on the subject. Their own legends gave no intimation, unless that Creation legend, mentioned in vol. i, p. 62, where the head of a man was said to have been formed of 'white clay.' In 1867 I fell in with Bopp's famously unfortunate essay, 'Ueber die Verwandtschaft,' etc., and to that work was 'indebted for the first idea of comparing the Polynesian and Aryan languages,' and, in short, to apply the test of language in order to ascertain to which of the 'Kiprat Arbat' or 'Arba Lisun' the Polynesians might lay claim as their ancestors. To me, as to every other Polynesian scholar, it became evident at a glance that Bopp could not demonstrate the problem he had set himself to solve; and I need not here go into a criticism to show the reasons why. But there was enough in Bopp's essay to encourage others, under more favorable circumstances, to make the attempt."

—From America to Wales via Germany is, our readers will doubtless say, quite roundabout. Yet we have taken this roundabout way with some profit and some pleasure, under the guidance of Schuchardt's book, 'Romanisches und Keltisches' (Berlin: Oppenheim; New York: B. Westermann & Co.). One hundred of its four hundred pages, entitled Keltische Briefe, deal with the Welsh Eisteddfod of 1875, and are the best exposition we know of the actual Welsh nationality, its traits and ways, its outlook—the best, at least, accessible to one not familiar with the Welsh language. They give one a fair idea of what the Welsh mean by their patriotic efforts, and the demands they make upon general sympathy. The article is anything but abstruse in its erudition. Were we to offer any criticism, it would be that the author goes scarcely deep enough, and his side-thrusts at England and English culture are, to speak mildly, flippant. This remark is applicable also to like remarks in the other essays of the book. We cannot speak of these in detail—their contents are too motley and disconnected, ranging from the Pompeiian grafiti to the Diez memorial. Some of them—e. g., the review of Comparetti's memorable work on Virgil in the Middle Ages—are too slight to be worthy of reproduction. The essay on Goethe and Calderon abounds in just remarks, but perhaps attaches too much importance to the symbolism of Goethe's later years. The author would do well to consider whether all that is in Goethe is genuinely Goethean. In his remarks on "Rime and Rhythm in German and Romance," the author betrays a want of understanding of the finer points of English metre. Our verse has always been spontaneous, untrammelled by pedantic rules, save during the so-called "classic" period. What made Lessing's blank verse so "run-on" (see p. 224) was doubtless the influence of the later English drama.

—There is no writer in Russian literature whose very text presents so complicated a history as that of Pushkin. It is not rare for posthumous editions to contain corrections and variations, together with earlier productions which have chanced to escape notice; but even in this particular Pushkin's works have had a peculiar fate. Many of his writings were not known in his lifetime, and the edition published (1838–41) after his death, by friends and admirers, was distinguished by great inaccuracy. Annenkoff, whose edition is accompanied by the well-known "Materials" for biography (1855–57), was the first to obtain access to the poet's MSS. During Pushkin's last hours the Emperor Nicholas commissioned the poet Zhukovsky to seal up all the MSS. Three-quarters of an hour after Pushkin's death Zhukovsky affixed his seal to the poet's effects, but this proved to be an insufficient protection. The papers were overhauled by the officials of the gendarmerie; but neither the official guardians, with Zhukovsky at their head, nor the gendarmerie, did their work thoroughly. The MSS. were very carelessly numbered, and the two numerations do not correspond. The number of sheets called for in the two accounts varies; some pages have been torn out, and, in some cases, the gendarmerie sewed loose sheets together into books in such a way that an article beginning on page 1 may be continued on page 61, etc. Pushkin, as is well known, kept his poems by him for years before printing them, and, even after they were printed, he made excisions and alterations. After the Pushkin Festival, in 1880, the poet's eldest son presented his father's papers to the Rumyantzoff Museum in Moscow, and the right to make use of them was conferred on the editor of the 'Russian Archives,' Mr. Barteneff, who had made Pushkin a study for thirty years; but a comparison of his edition founded on these documents with the documents themselves led to so unfavorable a conclusion that the necessity for another edition was perceived.

—The number of competing editions has now become so large that it will prove of interest to intending purchasers to learn the plan of Mr. P. O. Morozoff's, just issued by the Society for Assisting Literary and Learned Men, in seven volumes, octavo (St. Petersburg). It is intended first, to present, as far as possible, a full and carefully collated edition of Pushkin's text; secondly, to provide a book which may serve as an aid in the study of Pushkin's time in general. To this end, use has been made of all the papers in the Moscow and Petersburg Museums and in the Imperial Public Library, and of all works published since the author's death. Works which require explanation are supplemented by biographical, bibliographical, historical, and literary notes, both Russian and foreign, and all the facts relating to them. All pieces hitherto published with cuts and in a garbled form are reproduced in their entirety; the poems which originally occurred in prose pieces, and which are generally published outside their setting, have been replaced in their proper environment; and some fragments, which equal in beauty the choicest pieces hitherto known, are now published for the first time. This edition contains three portraits of the poet. The first is a copy of the engraving by Heitman, after the original by Briuloff (or Tchiukoff), published in 1822 with his 'Prisoner of the Caucasus'; the second is a copy of a pencil portrait sketched in 1820 by Jules Vernet, and now published for the first time; the third is a copy of Utkin's engraving.

JEBB'S INTRODUCTION TO HOMER.

Homer: An Introduction to the Iliad and Odyssey. Boston: Ginn & Co. 1887.

Prof. Jebb's Introduction to Homer is marked by his characteristic firm literary touch, and by the exquisite taste that gives all his philological work an exceptional and individual attractiveness. Much of the book is naturally assimilation of the labor of others, and those who are at all familiar with the literature will readily recognize the sources, which he has himself frankly indicated in the appendix. Among these, Prof. Seymour's contributions to the study of Homer have not been overlooked nor left unacknowledged; nor, we should add, have they been superseded by this general introductory work. But, although much is taken from others, every section is full of suggestiveness, and many points are discussed with a certainty of conviction that is due to independent thought and research. Especially interesting is Prof. Jebb's theory of the crystallization of the 'Iliad.' The 'Iliad' to Prof. Jebb is not an Achilleïs, not a merely personal episode. "It must have been from the first an 'Iliad,' including some general description of that struggle between Greek and Trojan in which a new crisis was occasioned by the temporary withdrawal of Achilles. Precisely the distinction of the poet's invention was the choice of a moment which could combine the personal interest of a feud between two heroes with the variety and splendor of large battle scenes." This primary 'Iliad' consisted of books 1, 11, and 16 to 22—"allowance being made for later interpolations, large and small." It was enlarged first between 1 and 11; 2 to 7 (with the exception of the much later Catalogue) representing the earliest series of additions made—mere detached episodes—while 12 to 15, though work worthy of a great poet, unduly separate 11 from 16. Books 8 and 9 were added by a poet conscious of rhetorical gifts, who saw what could be made of an appeal to Achilles. Books 23 and 24 form a sequel, and book 10 is a comparatively late interpolation. The primary 'Iliad' was Thessalian, the enlarged 'Iliad' Ionian.

This theory, like so much else in the book, is a dexterous reconciliation of a variety of views, and, like so many other reconstructions, must await the test of the continued examination of the Homeric text itself, as Prof. Jebb himself reminds us at the close of this book. There are no Unitarians, no Epyllia-hunters left. We are all Unitarians—if you will allow interpolations enough; we are all Epyllia-hunters—if you will allow a thread for crystallization; and, after all these years of wrangling, one begins to see a modus vivendi, and—which is more important, though less welcome to the æsthetic soul—a hearty consensus among scholars as to the further need of pressing those studies of the infinitely little, the recognition of the importance of which is one of the characteristics of the scholarship of to-day.

The Homeric Question is the subject of the last of the four chapters. The other three are headed in order, "General Characteristics," "The Homeric World," "Homer in Antiquity"—each rich in matter and almost provokingly suggestive. It is needless to say that, in a subject so full of details, any fresh pair of philological eyes may detect errors and omissions; and the many problems that are presented admit of so many varying points of view that it would be impossible for any one to make an impression that should satisfy every angle of vision. Hence, a minute criticism would seem unjustly to lower the tone of cordial commendation that the book deserves. And yet, the finer the work the more impatient does one become of any particle of dust that settles on it here and there; and as Prof. Jebb has shown, by his list of errata, how restless he is under the slightest infelicities of types or of expression, we will point out one or two passages in which the mistakes are puzzling or misleading:

In the note on p. 5 he says that "the Iliad contains nearly 15,000 lines; the Odyssey nearly 12,000." "Nearly" implies defect, and the 'Iliad' contains more than 15,000, the 'Odyssey' more than 12,000—the one about 15,693, the other about 12,160, according to one count. In the note on p. 82 every reader will correct one 'Chios' into 'Rhodos,' but the young student unfamiliar with Pindar would hardly of himself get the reference right in the note on p. 93, 'Schol. Pind. [Ol.] 3, 52.' The statement (p. 134) that "the style (of the Kalewala) has been compared to that of Longfellow's Hiawatha," is rather amusing in view of the fact that the 'Kalewala' suggested 'Hiawatha;' and shows, we fear, that Prof. Jebb, with all his American friendships and alliances, is not very much at home in our classical literature. But these are venial slips. Much less excusable, we must confess, is the passage, in a note on p. 87, in which the celebrated epigram (Επτὰ πόλεις), of which there are varying versions in Anthol. Plan. 4, 297-298, is said to have been placed by Varro on a bust of Homer, and the authority given is Aulus Gellius 3, 11. The epigram has long since been expelled from the critical texts of Gellius.

But one is ashamed to mention such trivialities, as if they impaired in the least the value of the book; and when we come to the chapter of omission, the awkward question suggests itself to the reviewer, whether Prof. Jebb does not wittingly leave out what would have cumbered the book without increasing its interest or its usefulness. So, having given us (p. 144) Prof. Humphreys's summary of Sittl's exceptions to the views of Hinrichs, he might have also given us a hint that Hinrichs was not slow in making a crushing rejoinder to Sittl. Such a hint would have been grateful to the shade of Hinrichs, though, of course, Prof. Jebb could not have anticipated Hinrichs's early demise. To the admirable section (chap. iv, p. 54) in which Prof. Jebb speaks of the deceptive unity of the epic style, he might have added the remarkable fact, ascertained by the painful counting of Carl Eduard Schmidt, that the sum of the repeated verses in the two poems amounts to the enormous aggregate of 16,000 verses, or more than the bulk of the 'Iliad'—figures that show distinctly how largely the uniform color is due to what may be called the mechanical element.

Difference of opinion opens an endless field into which we cannot enter here. We are not disposed to pull down the Homeric house that Mr. John Protodikos built, nor are we prepared to do battle for Hissarlik against Bunárbashi; and we can understand how a professor in a Scottish university may maintain the Homeric character of Scott's metrical romances. But in spite of all the admirable things that have been admirably put by Prof. Jebb, it does not seem to us that he has done full justice to the wonderful character-drawing of the 'Odyssey,' and the evidence which it gives of one moulding hand. However, this opens too large a question for consideration here, and we will only say that the whole matter of the typical and the individual in Greek poetic art needs readjustment. The type can only express itself in the individual; and if we lay too much stress on the typical in Greek, we lose the concreteness which is so eminently Greek. It is not because the individualization is not there, it is because the individualization is so subtle that it escapes us. But to challenge Prof. Jebb's appreciation of Hellenism at any point is to challenge the horsemen to come down into the plain, according to the Greek saying, and we end as we began by a cordial recommendation of Prof. Jebb's book to those who love Homer, and to those who have yet to learn to love him.

In the remarkable tales collected under the title 'The Merry Men,' Mr. Stevenson has concentrated much observation and thought on the baffling problem, why sin is sin, and why men are persistently sinful, when all would be so much happier if all were good. The narrator of the first story lies awake one night listening to a storm howling over the Island of Aros, and to the voices of the Merry Men as they raged across the reefs and broke against the cliffs. Once in a while he hears a human cry piercing the elemental din, and he knows it to be the cry of his kinsman, Gordon Darnaway, crazed with the unconfessed sin of murder on his soul. Then, he says, "A great fear fell upon me of God's judgments and of the evil in the world."

There, in few words, is the inspiration of the tales. In not one is there any sophistical palliation or extenuation of evil, not a scoff, or a doubt of the awful, inevitable judgment of God. No time or space is given to the superficial man, the thing made up of artificial conventions, the "botched mass of tailors' and cobblers' shreds." We have souls striving consciously or unconsciously to avert damnation in eternity. The forces are tremendous, and the man who develops them in language of the utmost simplicity and vigor necessarily writes with full belief in the importance of the message which he is called to deliver to the world. Mr. Stevenson has softened and humanized the stern Calvinistic creed—as he calls it, "the damnatory creed"—but it is nevertheless the pivot of his genius. It is to the pith and marrow of his work what "deils, bogles, sea-spensters, and sic-like" are to the embellishment. He probably does not believe that the devil habitually takes shape of man or beast or fish the better to work his wicked will; but if he didn't come very near that, he couldn't make his reader afraid to look over his shoulder lest he should see the Prince of Darkness behind him.

The personal and incarnate devil is a conspicuous figure in most of the stories; he is the personage of "Thrawn Janet" and of "Markheim." His appearance in "Thrawn Janet" is for purposes of sheer deviltry, and horrible without relief. Told in broad Scotch, the tale is a complete exposition of that incongruous union of grotesque superstition with the theology of John Knox which could probably never have been arrived at by a people with less imagination and a more generally diffused sense of humor than the Scotch. In "Markheim" the devil is akin to the German Doppelgänger. He is Markheim's worst self, or represents in the flesh his worst possibilities, coming at a crucial moment to tempt the man who has slipped away from good to commit himself irrevocably to evil. Here, in half-a-dozen pages, is compressed the whole history of a weak mortal's gradual descent from innocent youth, highly aspiring, to most iniquitous manhood. Markheim is going, as thousands of Markheims infirm of purpose have gone, morally straight to hell. He is stayed at the lost moment by a flash of defiance, of revolt against the malignant shape that would bind him fast for ever. Only George Eliot's Tito Melema is comparable in drawing to Markheim, and Mr. Stevenson does not lose in force by brevity. For grip of the vitals of humanity he is George Eliot's successor and only peer. Untrammelled by her pedantry, perhaps because he may not have her learning, he bids fair to pass her as a teacher. He seems to feel that the modern world will really heed only the voice that says what it has to say in a breath, no word weak or superfluous; and he has so far been conscientious enough never to lift his voice till the right word is springing to his lips. A deeper appreciation of his conscientiousness and of the fact that singularity of incident and picturesqueness are with him secondary to meaning and truth in character, might arrest the flow of talk about his weird, fantastic, morbid imagination, his poetical style, his likeness to Poe and other purveyors of literary hashish dreams.

His style is the nearest imaginable approach to perfect prose narrative. A man, clever enough, would tell these tales almost exactly as they are written. His sparingly used metaphors and similes are matter-of-fact; his language is vivid and impressive, because it is accurate, acutely descriptive of his scene or character, perfectly elucidating his thought. Every word of his tells. Poets, especially poets like Poe, whose kingdom is the supernatural, work their effects by delighting or appalling the imagination to such a degree that the befogged reason forgets about accuracy and does not care a snap about truth. Even when they fascinate the intellect it is by a brilliant display of invention, of constructive ingenuity, not by sustained and acute reasoning. They rarely concern themselves with moral questions, and, when they do, their views have generally more glitter than substance. In the art that appeals to the imagination alone, Poe towers above Stevenson; in the art that stirs the soul, moving men to stretch out feeble hands to good for good's sake, Poe sinks beneath comparison with Stevenson.

In work which is largely the expression of human intellect groping for an answer to a riddle which human intellect may not read, there can be nothing very light or amusing. Those who want relief from strains of melancholy and horror must hasten to the last pages, devoted to "The Treasure of Franchard." Dr. Desprez fights his angel in a buoyant, cheerful French way. He is an engaging old humbug, whom, if the author had been familiar with the word, he must have dubbed a "blatherskite." A good angel who knew how to cook, and a succession of calamities, barely sufficed to keep him in the narrow way. Yet, for all his unworthiness, he must take hold of common affections, even as he wound himself round the heart of the loyal Jean-Marie and of his placid Anastasie. The delineation of Desprez exonerates the author from the possible charge of being hard on the sinner. The mere technical art of all these stories is so obvious that comment is superfluous. But we cannot refrain from commending the last to aspiring writers. By a thoughtful reading they may learn a bit of the secret of making characters stand on their own legs, and compelling them to lay bare the heart upon the sleeve.

"Sir," said Mr. Twemlow, the Rector in 'Springhaven,' "it is our mission from the Lord to quench Boney and to conquer the bullies of Europe." Mr. Blackmore's mission, in this novel, is evidently to revive in England some spark of that patriotic fervor which animated the Rector, which burned in every true Englishman's breast when "Boney" was the world's bobgoblin and for centuries before. In passage after passage of grave eloquence he echoes the Bastard's lines:

> "This England never did, nor never shall,
> Lie at the proud foot of a Conqueror,
> But when it first did help to wound itself."

And, with the feeling noticeably prevalent among English men of letters that England is of late chiefly occupied in wounding itself, he makes passionate appeal to the old love for their "precious stone set in the silver sea." He writes of men who kept their rudder true, who held fast, who never said die, whose very narrowness and pig-headed self sufficiency did much to make England supreme among nations. His central incident is the invasion of England contemplated by Napoleon in 1805, and the sleepy village of Springhaven is represented as the spot chosen for the French landing. Caryl Carne, but half English by descent and all French in sympathy, is selected by Napoleon to prepare the way for him and his myrmidons. Carne owns a worthless estate and ruined castle close by Springhaven, and through him general misery and particular tragedy fall upon the little town. He is as cold-blooded and ruthless a traitor as ever sold his birthright, as picturesque a villain as ever served novelist a good turn. His foil is Blythe Scudamore, the "gentle Scuddy, brave and modest, wholesome and natural, facing the cannon's mouth without flinching, and recklessly flinging down his heart for a pretty, foolish girl to trample on." Scuddy's behavior on land and at sea, in war and in love, entitles him to a place among the great heroes of fiction. His sweetheart, Dolly Darling, is a very charming maiden, and just as romantic and silly as a charming, idle maiden may be without harm or shame. No real man could escape being Dolly's slave; if Mr. Blackmore had had her alive, in his study, he would never have dared to treat her so harshly as he does. He takes a mean advantage of the fact that Dolly is either dead or old enough to be past mischief. He sneers at her little vanities, makes much ado about her little deceits, and finally throws on her shapely shoulders the whole burden of her father's death.

All but the last violence, for which there is no artistic necessity, might be excused, since his severity towards Dolly extends to all her sex. He levels a great many poisoned arrows at the vulnerable points of women. He refers to a golden age when, among other happy conditions, "women had time enough to mind their neighbors' affairs, without which they grow scandalous." He remarks of the excellent Miss Twemlow that she "was beginning to be twenty-five years old—a job which takes some years in finishing." He can't let Mrs. Twemlow and Mrs. Stubbins hobnob over their tea without telling us that their sweet friendship would "last until their interests should happen to diverge." He shows his masculine jealousy of the "best-regulated or largest feminine mind," by asserting that it "generally is the worst-regulated." Any woman with a well-regulated mind who wants material for a philippic against the spite, prejudice, and dogmatic assertiveness of the masculine mind let loose on the characteristics of women, need go no further than 'Springhaven.'

The occasional glimpse of Nelson in the home of Admiral Darling confirms the impression of gentleness, and that quality of character called "interesting," left by the records of his life. It will help those who know him only as a great fighter to understand why he is the English hero dearer than all others to the heart of the people. The characterization of Napoleon, also, is vivid and in agreement with the most reliable contemporary description, though it is difficult quite to accept the author's opinion that the Corsican's beautiful face "had helped to make his fortune more than any woman's had ever done for her."

If Mr. Blackmore is too hard on a girl sweet and fresh like the rose of June, Mr. Hardy, in 'The Woodlanders,' is over and above tender with a girl who affects us unpleasantly, like a noxious weed. We are invited chiefly to interest ourselves in a game of speculation in Grace Melbury's affections, a ticklish stock, and unscrupulously watered by that young lady. She is an Anna Karénina called to a lower state of life. She wants the earth, and takes all she can get of it, by fair means or foul. She had a worse man for a husband than was Anna Karénina's, and a better man for a lover; thus she was saved from actual infidelity, though by no virtue in herself. Tolstoi barely condones Anna's fault, and sweeps her by the judgment of conscience to a fearful end. Mr. Hardy exalts the spirituality of Grace Melbury, and doesn't seem to think that she commits an error worth the attention of conscience. He doesn't mean, either, that her husband shall appear rather less offensive than she, yet he does; for, having been off a year or so with another woman, Fitzpiers experiences a slight diffidence in inviting his wife to live with him again. The principal events and characters lead us to infer that Woodlanders are as bad as other people, and even worse; and the lesser characters do no more than help to an average goodness. Marty South and Winterbourne are dull examples of virtue, while the people who make shrewd observations in dialect just fall short of that acuteness which may repay one for the labor to understand their jargon. We are beginning to long for a novelist bold enough to permit his people to say good things in English that we can read at sight.

'Jess' has about every quality that a novel of adventure should have. It is brisk, exciting, funny, and occasionally pathetic. The scene is in a land so generally unknown that the author's imagination is practically unfettered; yet, where truth is desirable, he tells it with apparent fidelity. He has no timidity in exposing the criminal mismanagement of recent British campaigns in South Africa, and some of his utterances compare with Mr. Blackmore's for sincere and earnest patriotism. The sarcasm implied in old Silas Croft's faith that his country is willing and able to keep her agreements and protect her subjects, is bitter but justifiable. It is probably this patriotism that leads Mr. Haggard to represent the Boers as something viler than either Hottentots or Kaffirs. His Frank Muller is a very black villain, yet he alone stands out as the cause of events. The other people are only adjuncts to the action, interesting for the remarkable things that happen to them. They are the helpless instruments of Fate on a frolic. Even of Jess, whom the author declares to be the spirit and soul of the book, this is partially true. We are absorbed in her vicissitudes, not in her individuality. Once or twice, however, her despair and passion do excite sympathy for the woman, especially when, worn by fatigue and mental stress to the verge of death, she nerves herself to do the deed which shall insure her sister's happiness. It was just before this crisis that she made the mistake to write the poem which has got Mr. Haggard into literary difficulty. The context indicates conclusively that Mr. Haggard meant to let the verses pass as his, if they could. It is equally certain that, even if he did not know their author, he, more than any one, was in full possession of the knowledge that they were not his.

In 'The Jesuit's Ring' an attempt is made to bridge the gap in time and circumstance stretching between Champlain's "Isle of the Desert Mountains" and the sea-girt paradise of summer wanderers, Mt. Desert. The medium of connection is a gold ring set with the stone Sardius, from the Temple of Solomon, with a Hebrew inscription graven thereon. The ring has the magical and embarrassing property of detecting the character of its wearer. It consents to be worn only by the worthy, and proclaims the unworthiness of any wearer by losing itself as soon as he passes by a bubbling spring, where it comfortably lies hidden till fished up by a knight without reproach. The Jesuit, Du Thet, to whom it was given with blessing by that pious lady, Mme. de Guercheville, wore it when he died at Saint Sauveur. It was stolen by a miscreant, one of Argall's English band who descended on Mt. Desert and destroyed the Jesuit's colony. At once it slipped from the blood-stained fingers into a running stream, and there for more than two centuries and a half it stayed. All this is told in the prologue, and told sympathetically, with pleasant, romantic effect, though the author seems to think that the English in Acadia were just such unmitigated ruffians as Mr. Haggard finds the Boers in Africa. The modern story turns on the search for the lost ring, affording opportunity for description of Mt. Desert's great natural beauties and of the life of the annually invading mob of pleasure-seekers.

The transition from almost mediæval romance to late, nineteenth-century commonplace is an unpleasant shock to the sensibilities. The mystic atmosphere is partially sustained in the character of Ramsay, the inheritor of Du Thet's fine spirit, and, like him, longing to look before he dies on Norumbega's walls. But the worldlings overshadow Ramsay. Most of what relates to the ring is cold, a perfunctory working out of a scheme. The author is not alone to blame for the falling off in interest and literary merit. There is something in Bar Harbor life fatal to romance of a refined and delicate kind. If a novelist touch it, he becomes vapid, hard, superficial, and the more he merits these epithets the nearer he comes to a truthful representation of what he sees and hears. When the author carries his hero, Somers, off from Bar Harbor and lets him take a hand against the strikers on a Western railroad, he writes with vigorous directness. He has something worth writing about, and these chapters, though hardly relevant to the plot, are far the best of the modern story. The walking gentlemen in flannels resembling Joseph's coat, the talking old women, and the rosebud garden of girls, are all so natural that the chapters descriptive of them are extremely dull reading. The dulness is not enlivened by the love of the gentlemen for a little easy Latin, but their proneness to display it, regardless of propriety, may heighten the naturalness. Perhaps, too, it is for truthfulness of portraiture that Seaton is made to compare his economical friend with John Gilpin. It was "Mistress Gilpin (careful soul)" who, "though on pleasure she was bent," preserved "a frugal mind." The introduction of a valet masquerading as a French Count has more boldness than novelty, a remark equally applicable to the narration of several anecdotes, noticeably that of the Englishman ambitious of shooting a buffalo in the streets of New York.

The author of 'A New England Idyl' has not justly apprehended the meaning of the word "idyl." There is nothing idyllic in the few chapters descriptive of hard poverty linked by an ordinary love episode. In the form, too, there is none of that grace and harmony which may give prose composition a right to such a title. The style is, like the people, rough, honest, and practical. The author generally knows what she writes, but her observation is hardly deep enough, or her imagination sufficiently vivifying, to make her writing attractive. The limitations of her knowledge are clearly defined by her picture of the "city gentleman" who offers himself to the country maiden in terms more insulting, if less direct, than the well-known "city gentleman" who said:

"What is your fortune, my pretty maid?"

This episode, representing a favorite dream of unsophisticated women-novelists, would stand the test of print better if the novelists would only study the forms of speech common to "city gentlemen." But perhaps the beginning of study would be the end of the dream.

In 'Miss Churchill' we are carried from the pine woods of South Carolina to the Pyramids of Egypt, taking in by the way a long visit in Florence and a London season. In the delineation of Miss Churchill the author touches several fine points in a complex character, but the whole picture is of an improbable person, more disagreeable than the author perceives. Miss Churchill's almost inhuman disregard for her own people, her capriciousness and instability, augured ill for the happiness of any man who might place his in her keeping. For this reason, the end of Lysle, who is rather finely conceived, is divested of sadness. In spite of numerous lapses into the stereotyped methods of the romancer, there is in 'Miss Churchill' more of actuality, a nearer approach to portraiture of human beings, than we are apt to look for in the work of Christian Reid.

The Egypt of Ebers's 'Bride of the Nile' is a reconstructed Egypt of the fifth century of our era. It is full of adventure, of good theatrical situations, and of local descriptions minutely detailed, but it is as hard a novel to read as ever was written. It could be scarcely more dreary to wade through the tomes elucidating the theological controversies of Melchites and Jacobites, whose contentions make the drama of the novel. Whatever the reason may be, interest in the strife between paganism and Christianity is to-day much more vivid than that in the early schisms of the Christian church. We suspect the reason to be that the former represents to us what we understand as a "live issue," while the latter seems to us mere straw-splitting. So, in spite of labor and learning, Mr. Ebers has not been able to compel us to identify ourselves with his characters, or to feel that the ideas for which they suffered ennobled the sufferers—this, too, with allowance made for diminution of vividness through translation, which, though often very significant, is here reduced to a minimum.

Final Memorials of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Edited by Samuel Longfellow. Boston: Ticknor & Co. 1887.

THIS supplementary volume to the Life of Longfellow by the same editor is principally devoted to further illustration of the last fifteen years of the poet's career, when he was enjoying the fruits of his fame in the formal respect of whatever persons of distinction visited our shores, and in the common appreciation of his countrymen, whose expressions of esteem were sometimes more awkward and tedious, but not of less worth. It was felt that this period of Longfellow's life had been somewhat slighted in the previous volumes, and it is in answer to that criticism, and in response to the desire for some fuller memorial of these days, that the present work has been prepared. It consists of extracts from the later journals and correspondence, with a few episodes and some new letters of the earlier time to serve as an introduction. The plan is the same as before; the good taste, the care, the scrupulous amiability, also, are the same, and the materials have the same character. It is true, as the editor asserts in his preface, that the former work "is complete in itself"; no one will find in this addition to it anything except greater fulness of knowledge upon topics already adequately known. But every refined reader will take fresh pleasure in observing anew the daily progress of a charming life, and will better judge its riches, both for Longfellow's intimate circle and those who merely touched him for a moment as they passed, by this last book. What is here published is equally good with what was given before; it is all of a piece.

In one respect the present volume offers a more favorable view even than did the Life. Here the poet is seen almost entirely in his mature manhood, or perhaps one may fairly say in his old age, since his principal original works were all completed before the period of the last fifteen years set in. The scene practically does not change, the habits of life are fixed, the character of the whole has complete harmony. This limitation of the view gives a unity of impression rarely to be derived from the entire story of an active life, and the time, fortunately, is that when Longfellow was most attractive. He was most dear to his country as an old man, and that is the character in which he is presented. His qualities, too, as a man were those which age most improves—his universal kindness, his dignity of breeding, his reposeful nature, could have full effect only with ripe years; and one so given to permanent friendships as he was, could not fail to grow happier in their exercise, and more noble through them in proportion as they lasted out time and tide. The story of Longfellow's care for his friend Greene is, in these new illustrations of it, one of the delightful episodes of literary biography.

In the way of literature, Longfellow was employed in these years upon the drama, and the simplicity of his remarks upon it are instructive, though they provoke a smile. He was not efficient as a dramatist, and perhaps no competent critic would now claim for him dramatic genius. He illustrates how far drama has drifted from literature. Evidently he had not thought much upon the general subject, and was but little skilled in knowledge of its conditions or in criticism of its aims, methods, or effects. One finds him saying, after reading Victor Hugo: "Perhaps exaggeration is necessary for the stage; I am inclined to think it is. A play, like a bust or statue destined for a large room, must be a little larger than life." He speaks of Fechter's Hamlet thus: "It is pleasant to see anything so like nature on the stage; not the everlasting mouthing and ranting." He contemplated having the "New England Tragedies" acted, and wrote to Fields: "As to anybody's 'adapting' these Tragedies for the stage, I do not like the idea of it at all. Prevent this, if possible. I should, however, like to have the opinion of some good actor—not a sensational actor—on the point. I should like to have Booth look at them." He actually consulted Bandmann with regard to the matter, and sets down the answer: "Bandmann writes me a nice letter about the Tragedies, but says they are not adapted for the stage." That Longfellow should have dreamed of having them acted, shows how far out of his element he was in composing them. The drama was to him a book, not an art.

Elsewhere he makes some admirable remarks that spring out of his practice of the art, always wise and sometimes profound, as is this which we find among his pensées at the end: "It is a great mystery to many people that an author should reveal to the public secrets that he shrinks from telling to his most intimate friends." The profound thing in this, if any one should not at once understand our application of the word, is that he does not stop to explain the "great mystery": to him it is simple enough. But one does not often meet with the humor shown in another sentence, in a letter to Greene: "You cannot improve a sonnet by making it more than fourteen lines long." It is strange that, with such playfulness as he exhibits here and there, and seems to have indulged in more easily in conversation, so little expression of it is to be found in his works. For this quality one must go to these volumes, though there are scenes in 'The Golden Legend' in which it has colored the language and occasionally touched a character. The absence of the classical influences in his career is as noticeable as before. He finds in the Greek anthology only "dead garlands." Of self-criticism there is as little here as in the previous volumes. He remarks how much learning Sumner brought back from Italy, where he himself had gained only impressions; and the joy of the sentimentalist in remaining unconvinced is happily expressed when he says, "I let the waves of argument roll on; but all the lilies rise again, and are beautiful as before." The poet writing in prose is often to be observed in similar figures and sentiments, and once or twice there is a brief letter—the one of consolation "To ——," for example—which is "an entire and perfect chrysolite."

There are others besides Longfellow in these pages. As we have remarked before, his life is a memorial of a distinguished circle as well as of a man. This impression is the stronger because the view of his domestic life has been practically suppressed, and he has been shown to us only in his relations with his books and his friends. Fortune favored him in both. Sumner, as before, gains by all that is told of him or by him. One is tempted to think that only Longfellow knew him as a man. The letters from other sources are also excellent, and contain a few plums, such as Sam Ward's quotation from Jean Paul in illustration of the German dealings with France in 1870: "Eternity sat upon chaos, and gnawed it and spat it out again." The letters of "Tom Appleton" afford, as ever, much that is delectable. The description of Mrs. Browning, in 1856, as "a little concentrated nightingale living in a bower of curls," has the old touch; but best of all is his quoting "an expression of Mr. T. Lyman to me years ago: 'The bother of the Yankee,' said he, 'is that he rubs badly at the junction of soul and body'—as true a thing as ever was said, and he not much of a sayer of such things."

Somewhat more than the last third of the book is filled with reminiscences, reprinted from other sources, and not of remarkable excellence, together with table-talk and few fragments of poetry, among which the lines on Egypt rank high in color and power, though without finish; and the volume concludes with various papers on the Study, the Westminster Memorial, Genealogy, Bibliography, etc., etc. Two new portraits, both excellent, embellish the work, and several other sketches of interest are interfused in the pages.

History of Woman Suffrage. Edited by Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, and Matilda Joslyn Gage. In 3 vols. Vol. iii. 1876-1885. Rochester, N. Y.: Charles Mann. 1887. 8vo, pp. 1,013.

THE literary quality of this history has not improved, or, indeed, changed, in its progress to completion. The third volume, like the first, is the unedited work of many hands, a disorderly repository of facts, to which a rough geographical subdivision and a meagre index furnish a precarious clue. Nominally the chronicle of a recent decade, its chapters on the several States go back of this period ad libitum. Mrs. Robinson's Massachusetts opens with the civil war; the case of Prudence Crandall (1833) introduces Connecticut; New Hampshire leads off with Nathaniel P. Rogers (1846); the Pennsylvania retrospect begins at 1768, etc. In fact, these chapters would be mere repetitions of what has appeared in the preceding volumes except that they take a general range, and, not confining themselves to woman suffrage, depict the progress of the sex in all directions—under the law, in schools and colleges, in the learned professions, in business, in invention, etc., etc. They are remarkable for a pretty uniform deficiency in constructive skill, in order, in coherency. In strong contrast to all the American contributions is the chapter on Great Britain, by Caroline Ashurst Biggs, evidently the product of a disciplined mind. There is also a chapter on Continental Europe and another on Canada, where for more than thirty years, as we learn, women have had the suffrage and eligibility to office, in school matters, but have shown themselves rather indifferent to it.

During the period under review the thirtieth anniversary of the first Woman's Rights Convention has been celebrated (1878), and there have been numerous conventions at Washington, during the session of Congress, with the result of securing the appointment of select committees in House (1882) and Senate (1881), for the reception of all memorials relating to woman suffrage. In the Senate Mr. Hoar in 1879 presented a minority report favoring a constitutional amendment to that end. The year before, at a hearing before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections in behalf of such an amendment (offered by Senator Sargent of California), Mrs. Stanton made an argument, here given at length. In a foot-note she speaks of the "studied inattention and contempt of the Chairman, Senator Wadleigh of New Hampshire," who "took special pains to show that he did not intend to listen. He alternately looked over some manuscripts and newspapers before him, then jumped up to open or close a door or window. He stretched, yawned, gazed at the ceiling, cut his nails, sharpened his pencil, changing his occupation and position every two minutes, effectually preventing the establishment of the faintest magnetic current between the speakers and the committee. It was with difficulty," adds Mrs. Stanton, "I restrained the impulse more than once to hurl my manuscript at his head."

There was the usual coquetting with the national party conventions in 1880, with small comfort in the case of the Republican and Democratic, whereas the Prohibition platform yielded this for its eleventh plank:

"We also demand that women, having privileges as citizens in other respects, shall be clothed with the ballot for their own protection, and as a rightful means for a proper settlement of the liquor question."

The earliest presage we get in this volume of the now powerful alliance between prohibition and woman suffrage, which have no necessary logical connection, is in the speech of Mrs. Z. G. Wallace of Indiana, in January, 1880, before the Senate Judiciary Committee—still on the question of an amendment to the Federal Constitution. "I wish," said this lady, "to make just one remark in reference to what Senator Thurman said as to the popular vote being against woman suffrage. The popular vote is against it, but not the popular voice. Owing to the temperance agitation in the last six years, the growth of the suffrage sentiment among the wives and mothers of this nation has largely increased."

It was in Nebraska that the first triumph was confidently expected, for a constitutional amendment had been procured to be submitted to the people in the fall of 1882. The vote was adverse, however. In Kansas a similar amendment had been lost in 1867, after a most exciting campaign. Meantime, a flourishing Women's Christian Temperance Union, in open accord with the suffragists, had sprung up, and the Republican State Convention of 1882 fell into line; but its recommendation was disregarded by the party in the State Senate the year following, when a bill to submit the question to the people was introduced only to be summarily rejected. In 1883, too, the Republican Convention—perhaps throwing off its impedimenta in view of the approaching Presidential contest—ignored woman's suffrage; and the Kansas chapter closes with vague if cheerful prophecy of the "good time coming" which has since arrived in that State—municipal suffrage having been allowed twenty years after the fuller liberty had been denied. That complete suffrage will shortly be achieved in Kansas, there can be little doubt.

All this is very instructive reading. Particularly interesting are the chapters on the Southern States. Slavery had so effectually barred the door of that section to all "isms" that one is surprised to learn that women have had school suffrage in Kentucky for thirty years; but they have very sparingly availed themselves of it. The legislation of Missouri towards women has been exceptionally liberal and equitable. In Louisiana the Constitution of 1879 provided that "women twenty-one years of age and upwards shall be eligible to any office of control or management under the school laws of the State." As regards the general attitude of Southerners towards suffrage, we have this testimony from Mrs. Mary Bayard Clarke of Newbern, N. C.:

"The Southern man does not wish his 'women folks' to be self-supporting, not because he is jealous of their rivalling him, but because he feels it is his duty to be the bread-winner. . . . There are fewer large centres in the South than in the North, and much less attrition of mind against mind; the people are homogeneous and slower to change, and public opinion is much less fluctuating. But once let the tide of woman suffrage fairly turn, and I believe it will be irresistible and advance far more steadily and rapidly in the South than in the North. Let the Southern women be won over, and the cause will have nothing to fear from the opposition of the men. But . . . until the Southern women can be made to feel the pecuniary advantages to them of suffrage, they will not lift a finger or speak a word to obtain it."

"As a general thing," says another Southern writer, "the young women of Kentucky are better educated than the men, the latter being early put to business, while most parents desire above all things to secure to their daughters a liberal education." And this statement is confirmed for the South at large by Mrs. Clarke, whom we have just cited. The suffrage alliance with the Women's Christian Temperance Union is not so assured in the South as at the North. The branch at Birmingham, Ala., felt obliged to repel suffrage advances in 1885, adding, however, "whenever suffrage is granted to the women of the United States, those of Alabama will be found on the right side." The prodigious advance in the temperance movement at the South in the meanwhile must be regarded as paving the way for the suffrage agitation.

In the Territories, Wyoming still maintains equal suffrage, and alone of all our communities admits women to the jury-box—an unquestionable gain to civilization. Suffrage in Washington Territory has been suppressed on a technicality by a judicial decision. This is the only setback recorded in this volume.

Miss Anthony hopes to publish an annual pamphlet report of progress, in continuation of the 'History.'

Impressions on Painting. By Alfred Stevens, translated by Charlotte Adams. Geo. J. Coombes. 1886.

THERE is no doubt that the painter of most limited range and powers can say many valuable things of subjects coming within that range, and may make observations which are even of technical value to the less advanced student; but it does not follow that they needs must be written in a book. The Impressions of Mr. Alfred Stevens, for example, are very poor stuff. Stevens is a painter of the most vicious, shallow, meretricious school of modern art—a painter of millinery and stuffs and fashion-plates for fashionable women; a painter for the nouveaux riches, and a master for those to whom chic is the highest executive power. If his opinions on art were no better than his art, there would be nothing to be said about them; and as it is, what is best said is a protest against filling the book market with such rubbish as they are. The Introduction, by Mr. Stevens, is a dexterous bid for popularity in America, and has the facile and frivolous tone of one of his pictures; and the notice of him by the American editor is an attempt to proclaim him a great artist, which only shows that the editor knows very little of true art, and is absolutely unqualified to edit art books. What is true is no recommendation of the painter: "He is, and has always been, in feeling, a modern of the moderns. He has always had this fondness for his own time, this 'love of modernity,' as he himself expresses it." This, instead of being a compliment, is a recognition of the superficiality of the painter, for true art is neither modern nor ancient, but universal. Millet is no more modern than Michael Angelo, and Alma-Tadema is no more antique than David. The only "modernity" which art is capable of is the materialistic motive, the superficial form, which per se is not art, and only becomes such when treated in the spirit of which Greek art is the greatest expression in one direction, Titian in another, and Raphael in a third. The dictum of the editor, "The 'Impressions on Painting' not only form a complete exposition of the artistic creed of Alfred Stevens, but they represent the most modern and advanced side of French art, free from its diseases and exaggerations," only proves, if the first be true, that Alfred Stevens has a very poor creed, and, if the second be sincerely said, that the opinion we have already expressed of the editor's capacity for such work is not inadequate to the occasion. The dedication of Mr. Stevens to Corot as "the most modern of nineteenth-century painters," proves that he himself has no conception of that "modernity" with which he states himself to be in love, for Corot is no more modern than Claude.

In fact, the commonplace character of the apothegms, epigrams, maxims, or whatever Stevens intended them to be regarded, is proclamation of his object in putting forth a book as simple réclame. Here are a few samples: "Once the painter has a great artist's soul, the tortoise becomes as interesting as the horse, much more difficult to execute, the soul of the painter giving its imprint to everything." "The painter who, in the matter of art, believes himself a god, displays his weakness." "Géricault was strongly influenced by his time, and only related what he saw. He therefore spoke before Courbet." "The faculties are not artistic qualities." "Flies do not restrain themselves with regard to bad painting; they respect good. Strange!" "The physique has its predestinations. A badly constructed being has never arrived at mastery in the plastic arts." Where the oracular quality is lacking, the commonplace generally comes in, and perhaps nothing more trite and trivial was ever printed as art instruction than such sentences as, "Of what use is it for a young artist to wish to exhibit too soon and in spite of everything?" "Since the war of 1870 more soldiers have been painted than ever" (sic). "Everything here below is the product of study. One does not play the piano except by exerting one's self to play scales, just as one does not become an accomplished fencer until one has used the plastron for a long time. It would be truly strange if, by exception, the art of painting did not require study." "Studies that are too small produce petty work." "One should not give in a picture an accessory useless to the composition of the subject that one is treating." "How many pictures do well in an exhibition and ill in a drawing-room, and vice versa." Then we are treated to some declarations of contestable truth, taken in any sense, as: "Grace does not exist without strength." "Oil painting is far above water-color and pastels; time destroys these last and ennobles the first"—which is so untrue that we can see no oil work older than the Van Eycks, while we have well-preserved water-color of the eighth and ninth centuries. "The historical subject was invented the day that people were no longer interested in painting itself," is not only untrue, but absurd, for historical painting has always existed since painting was discovered. In fact, taking the 'Impressions' as a whole, one sees that their author either knew very little of the literature of art, or trusted that his public knew nothing of it, to have the courage to put forward such a mass of triviality as magisterial dicta. Perhaps in some cases the poor translation may have heightened the obscurity, but what is surprising is that anybody should think the book worth translating.

The Huguenots and Henry of Navarre. By Henry M. Baird, Professor in the University of the City of New York. With maps. Charles Scribner's Sons. 1886. 2 vols., 8vo.

PROF. BAIRD has established for himself a high and secure position among American historians. His place is not the highest. He cannot rank with Prescott in breadth and calmness of judgment; with Motley in graphic power; with Parkman in masculine grasp and vigor of narration; with Bancroft in comprehension of international relations. But if his narrative never reaches the greatest excellence, so on the other hand it never falls below a very high standard. His style is very clear and correct; his preparation is conscientious and thorough; he possesses great skill in the selection and arrangement of his material, and he has given us a thoroughly interesting and valuable work.

It is perhaps hardly fair to criticise the limitations which an author deliberately and of set purpose fixes for his work; and yet it is precisely in these limitations that the defects of 'The Huguenots' as a work of historical literature largely consist. Mr. Baird has undertaken to write a history of the Huguenots as a religious body. This history is so closely connected with the general history of France at the time that it is of necessity largely and indeed principally political and military. But these relations are really secondary in his mind; he never goes far away from what is absolutely essential to his main subject, and when he reaches the Abjuration, he says plainly that his interest in Henry of Navarre is, for the purposes of this book, at an end, and the rest of his reign shall receive only cursory treatment. We find no fault with this. It is a perfectly admissible point of view and a perfectly legitimate treatment. Only, the subject is capable of a broader and more profound treatment, which would have resulted in a work ranking higher as a literary production. The man who writes well the history of a movement or a sect does a good and useful work. But the movement or the sect is, after all, only a fragment of the life of a people or the intellectual record of a period. The Huguenots were not merely a religious body, they were also a political party—they had as their aim not merely to secure religious liberty, but to maintain feudal independence. The Huguenots of France were not an isolated body, they were the champions of a great intellectual and moral movement which had swept over all the north of Europe, and was now contending for the possession of the west. This detached division of the Protestant army had a career well deserving to be chronicled on its own account, but the importance and interest of which are not fully appreciated until they are brought into relation with the events which were occurring in other parts of Europe.

We do not mean to say that Mr. Baird wholly neglects the two points of view to which we have here directed attention, but that they do not receive as much consideration as they deserve. He would say, no doubt, that the political side of the Huguenot movement did not concern him, did not interest him, and that it could be no part of his plan to tell the story of the contemporaneous religious contests in the Netherlands, Scotland, and wherever else. This is a sufficient justification for his mode of treatment; but it gives his work a narrower scope, and thus lessens the circle of his appreciative readers. In regard to the inadequacy of his treatment of contemporary events in other countries, we have only to point to Motley's history of the struggle in the Netherlands at this very time, as an illustration of what Mr. Baird might have accomplished. Mr. Motley's task, like his, was to describe one portion of this great contest of the age, in a field more central but somewhat narrower than that occupied by the volumes before us. Mr. Motley does not neglect his own theme, nor does he attempt to enter into the details of the contemporaneous contests; but the reader becomes familiar with them all—with the Huguenot wars, the foreign policy of Elizabeth, and the dreary intrigues and wranglings of the Protestant courts of Germany and the North. The reader of Mr. Baird's volumes knows that there was a war in the Netherlands, that there was a Protestant queen on the English throne, that there were Calvinistic princes in Germany; and that is about all.

With regard to the other aspect of the Huguenot contest—its political character, as an attempt of the great princes of the south of France to resist the centralizing tendency of the royal policy—it is more difficult to speak. Certainly this is not an indifferent consideration, but a very vital aspect of the Huguenot movement, and the movement cannot be understood without its being taken into account. At the same time it must be confessed that Mr. Baird, whose interest in the subject is primarily a religious one, may justly be indifferent to what is upon its face a political and a purely selfish aim, or may even be strongly repelled by it. This is not the place to consider the rights and wrongs of the question. It is customary to consider this feudal reaction as wholly wrong, and Richelieu, who finally crushed it, as one of the great statesmen of the world, the preserver of the integrity of his country. But he preserved its integrity at the expense of its truest life, by a centralization which crushed out all elements of local self-government. It is true that these elements were very imperfect and unpromising—consisting in the privileges of the nobles rather than the autonomy of the people. But, after all, it was all the elements there were; and when we lament the excessive centralization which has been the bane of France in these last centuries, we may perhaps wonder whether the Huguenots might not have accomplished something for their country in this respect also, as well as in the field of religious liberty and moral life.

It is not impossible that Henry of Navarre had something of the feeling that the royal authority depended closely upon the Catholic faith, in making his abjuration. Protestantism would do very well for a great nobleman; but it was disintegrative, and when he became king he must identify himself with the centralizing policy of his predecessors. However this may be, the causes and the bearing of this important act form a leading subject of consideration in these volumes—in both of them, for the author thinks he sees it already foreshadowed in Henry's words and acts even before he became king. This treatment of the subject is carefully studied, and on the whole recommends itself to the reader. Prof. Baird quotes with approval Sir James Stephen's language, that this "impious, because pretended conversion, was among the dies nefasti of his country." With this judgment we fully agree; and yet it is hard to visit the act, as an isolated act, with very severe censure. It was wholly in keeping with the character of the man and of the times. Mr. Baird is not especially good in the delineation of character, but the character of Henry of Navarre, as depicted on page 491 of vol. ii., is an admirable piece of portraiture. Yet who could believe, after reading this carefully weighed, impartial, and not unfriendly sketch, that the man there described—the man who could say, or who could be reported to have said, that "Paris was well worth a mass"—would hesitate to sacrifice his convictions for what appeared to be so clear an advantage? His convictions sat very easy upon his conscience; the advantage in question was not a selfish advantage alone, but the restoration of peace to his country and toleration to his co-religionists. It required a much higher degree of moral earnestness than he possessed to understand that peace bought at that price was no real peace, or rather that war, even civil war, was not the greatest of misfortunes for a nation, but rather the loss of moral earnestness.

The abjuration of Henry IV. was not so much his individual act as the act of his nation. It was one of the series of events by which France announced its decision that material enjoyment was more to be desired than sincerity of purpose and religious faith. It was followed by a century of toleration in religion, but a century—two centuries—in which public spirit seemed utterly dead; in which one hardly meets with a public character who seems to care for anything but personal enjoyment and personal ambition. We do not attribute the moral decay of France in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries to Henry the Fourth's abjuration of his religion: but rather hold that that abjuration was made necessary by the moral degeneracy of the nation, which chose an insincere conformity rather than liberty of conscience. It is idle to ask what might have been the result had Henry refused to tamper with his convictions. He was not the man to do this; but one cannot help feeling that a man like Coligny, or one such as Henry of Condé appears to have been, if in the place of Henry of Navarre, would have brought the religious wars to a very different conclusion—to a true peace and a toleration that was permanent. For we are too much in the habit of saying that toleration was a principle unknown and impossible in that age. The toleration of the nineteenth century was, it is true, a principle which was beyond the conceptions of the sixteenth; but a religious peace, such as the Treaty of Augsburg established measurably in Germany, such as the Edict of Nantes established in France—such a toleration as this would not have been impossible at an earlier date but for the pitiful littleness of the rulers of France, the vindictiveness and ambition of the Guises, and the evil counsels of Philip II.

The book is accompanied with an excellent map of France in two parts—the southern half in volume i, the northern half in volume ii.

Perley's Reminiscences of Sixty Years in the National Metropolis. By Ben: Perley Poore. Philadelphia: Hubbard Bros. 2 vols.

ALL the faults of the typical subscription book are to be found in these volumes. Of literary merit in the 'Reminiscences' there is none: they are formless, rambling, heterogeneous in an extraordinary degree. A chronological progress from Administration to Administration is observed, but there is no other limitation upon the veteran correspondent's "selection from the masses of material accumulated in diaries, autograph letters, and scrap-books containing published literary matter." There is no attempt to group the memorabilia relating to any of the public characters from 1823 to 1885; there is no order or method in the nominal summaries which occasionally occur. Here, for example, is the very mixed "reminiscence" of the elder Booth (i, 125):

"He was a short, dumpy man, with features resembling those of the Roman Emperors, before his nose was broken in a quarrel, and his deportment on the stage was imperially grand. He had a farm in Maryland, and at one time he undertook to supply a Washington hotel with eggs, milk, and chickens, but he soon gave it up. His instant and tremendous concentration of passion in his delineations overwhelmed his audience," etc.

The account of this actor's personal appearance leads us to remark that similar descriptions of one and another of the throng passed in review by Mr. Poore are probably the most authentic part of his narrative. On a par with his reporting the looks of men he has seen, and seen familiarly, is his recalling the primitive modes of transportation, the dress, the social manners and customs, the political demonstrations of the second quarter of the century. All this makes entertaining reading, in which the reader can put his trust. It is otherwise with what lies below the surface. Gossip like the following about Van Buren—that on his leaving the Senate and selling his household furniture, "it was noticed that the carpet before a large looking-glass in his study was worn threadbare. It was there that he had rehearsed his speeches"—may be true; but has it any better authority than the maudlin after-dinner speech of Mr. Webster, of which we are told (i, 288) "an amusing account has been given"? So, in matters of history, when our famous collector of bric-à-brac tells us that he has the MS. of Sumner's speech on Alaska, we at once join him in discrediting the story that the speech was prepared for the Massachusetts Senator at the State Department. Or, again, when he relates what took place at Sumner's house between himself and Gen. Grant, Mr. Poore and Col. Forney both being present, we have no ground for disbelieving the incidents recorded. But in default of such vouchers, it is safe to be sceptical of what Mr. Poore has to tell, for obvious blunders are not few, and we may suspect more. He makes (i, 210) the English abolitionists the immediate progenitors of the American, and after 1836; and (i, 323) the "Democratic managers" the organizers of the Liberty party, and after 1843. He says (i, 285) that the Ashburton Treaty "established the right of property in slaves on an American vessel driven by stress of weather into a British port."

We have delayed too long over a strange medley of experience, hearsay, truth, and error, thrown together by the friend of Sumner and of Caleb Cushing, the admirer of Franklin Pierce and of Boss Shepherd. To complain of the misuse of his opportunities would be to imply the possession of qualities which he certainly lacks. Personal and party attachments have always tinged his observation of men and events, and he has evidently never indulged in fixed and independent principles. We will only add that the illustrations are very numerous, some from rare prints, some good, some atrociously bad—especially the portraits. There is an index, but it is very inadequate.

Fine Arts.

SOCIETY OF AMERICAN ARTISTS.—II.

THERE is a fine collection of landscapes in the present exhibition of the Society. A flat meadow, a rivulet winding through it with rushes growing on its banks, a group of trees, and a broad expanse of sky, are the simple elements out of which Mr. J. Francis Murphy has made his excellent picture, "Brook and Fields," No. 101. The color scheme is as simple as the composition; the greens of the meadow and the trees are contrasted with the warm, grayish white of the great masses of noonday clouds which cover the sky. This picture is both truthful in effect and decoratively beautiful. The composition is agreeable, and it is freely and broadly painted.

"Cape Ann Sands," No. 24, by Emil Carlsen, is purely a study of nature. It evinces the most careful observation and a plain, straightforward way of painting, and, like most of Mr. Carlsen's work, it is especially strong in color. The painting of middle distance, where the high ground lies, with ledges of rock cropping out in the greensward, and of the foreground of sandy beach, is very commendable. The sky, though lacking somewhat in atmospheric quality, is good in tone and keeps its place well, its dull grayish blue playing an important part in the effective color scheme of the picture. Especially deserving of praise is the feeling for form which is shown throughout, for this important element in landscape painting is too often neglected nowadays.

An effect of warm sunlight on a strip of headland is shown in "Late Afternoon, Massachusetts Coast," No. 135, by R. W. Van Boskerck—a truthfully painted piece of nature, very effective in the simple lines of the composition and the complete way in which the subject is treated. The reality of the sunlight is remarkable. It is real sunlight, obtained without exaggeration. This picture is, moreover, strikingly pleasing in color.

A quieter effect of sunlight, in which the hazy atmosphere of autumn subdues and softens the hotter glow of midsummer days, is shown in "September Sunshine," No. 36, by Kenyon Cox. A flat meadow in the foreground, stretching away to rising ground in the middle distance, with a strip of sea and some white sails beyond, is the motive, and simplicity of method characterizes the painting of it. Like Mr. Carlsen's picture, it is a study of nature without any apparent attempt at composition other than that naturally existing. It is a good study, and so truthfully observed and so tenderly painted as to make a charming picture.

"The Harvest," No. 38, by Bruce Crane, is frank and vigorous, as Mr. Crane's best work generally is. In this scene in the grain field, with its long rows of shocks and freshly cut stubble, its clumps of green trees clustering about the white farm-house in the distance, and the flock of blackbirds rising from the ground, we have a familiar picture of country life. It is freshly painted withal, and full of light. "An Early Snow," No. 105, by Walter L. Palmer; "Nightfall," No. 126, by D. W. Tryon, and "Winter," No. 132, by J. H. Twachtman, are three snow scenes—Mr. Palmer's picture being an effect of sunshine, in which there is a delightful bit of painting in the pinkish light on the distant hillsides in the background; Mr. Tryon's, of twilight, remarkable for beauty of color and unity of effect; and Mr. Twachtman's, that of a cloudy winter's day, in which the heavy atmosphere seems full of snow, and the muffled look of nature in its heavy white mantle is admirably depicted. "First Snow," No. 41, by Charles H. Davis, a larger canvas than any of these, is a sunset effect and is agreeable in color, but somewhat conventional. It is seriously deficient in drawing and feeling for form. Much better is "A November Morning," No. 42, by the same artist, a small picture with a misty atmosphere, which is refined and truthful. "Afternoon—September," No. 99, and "Moonlight," No. 98, by R. C. Minor, both remarkable for fine qualities of color; "A Virginia Landscape," No. 76, by Arthur Hoeber, a quiet little picture of flat plain and sky, painted with a delicate appreciation of values; "The Vicinity of Stratford, Conn.," No. 148, by A. H. Wyant, a sober, gray-toned landscape with excellent quality of atmosphere; "Canal Boats on the Seine," No. 57, by C. H. Eaton, a pretty bit of French greens and grays; and "Cottage Garden," No. 65, by J. Evans, a study of fruit trees precisely and delicately drawn, are yet other notable landscapes. "The Seine near Paris," No. 14, by George H. Bogert, is a small picture of early moonrise over the river in the outskirts of Paris, which is a most truthful impression and possesses fine qualities of color. A picture of genuine poetic feeling is "Early Moonrise," No. 145, by Carleton Wiggins. Cattle are seen standing listlessly at evening, in a meadow, with a group of trees in the foreground, while the full moon appears in the sky, just above a distant line of purple-tinted hills. "Moonlight," No. 116, by Otto Stark, is a strikingly truthful effect of moonlight in a narrow street of some French village, through which a man leading a horse, and a boy with a lantern, are passing. The light falls directly from above the middle of the picture, as the moon is too high to be seen, casting dark shadows towards the spectator. The impression of a bright moonlight night is rendered with admirable fidelity.

A picture which deservedly attracts much attention is "Five o'Clock," No. 2, by W. S. Allen. There is a sufficient resemblance in it to some of the work of the French impressionists for the hasty critic, at first sight, to class it in that group of modern work, but it will be found on closer acquaintance to be quite different in intention from that of pure impressionism. Mr. Allen has chosen for his subject a spacious room, in which, at the hour of the afternoon tea, a small company of seven or eight people are enjoying a sort of improvised concert. A young man and a young lady, the former in morning attire, and the latter dressed in an evening costume, are seated in the immediate foreground at the left of the picture. Other little groups are placed on the same side further back, seated about a piano and a harp. At the extreme right, in the furthest corner of the room, a little girl in a white frock is standing playing the violin. A painter impelled only by impressionistic motives would have attempted to seize the scene comprehensively and represent it as concisely as possible on his canvas, giving prominence to the things of the greatest importance and eliminating any details which by being insisted on might injure the general effect. In Mr. Allen's picture nothing is omitted; even the bronze figure of Delaplanche's "Music," which stands on a pedestal at the back of the room beside the little girl, who, by a quaint conceit of the artist, is shown unconsciously imitating the movement of the statue, is carefully painted. There is an evident purpose in this picture to give an air of reality, and to obtain it simply by giving to everything in the room its proper importance and preserve harmony in the ensemble at the same time. This is no easy task of itself, and, when combined with another consideration which has plainly been held by the painter as of primary importance, namely, fulness and beauty of color, success in it constitutes a real artistic achievement. This success belongs to Mr. Allen's "Five o'Clock," and, except for some eccentric drawing in the figure of the young man in the foreground, there is little to find fault with. The picture is rich and distinguished in color and original in style. Its individuality is noticeable even in this exhibition, in which there is such a large proportion of unconventional work.

"An Aztec Sculptor," No. 19, by George De F. Brush, a picture of an Indian seated on a rug beside a marble slab, which forms part of a wall, on which he is intently cutting with chisel and mallet, is well drawn and painted with much quiet beauty of tone. "In Holland," No. 93, by J. Gari Melchers, a small picture of a Dutch interior with a woman ironing clothes on a table, marked by exact drawing and truth of values; "The Little Cook," No. 88, by H. A. Levy, also a Dutch interior with a single figure, but a canvas of considerable size, simple and artistic in subject and treatment, good in effect and well executed, notably in the painting of the still life; and "A Ride through the Wood," No. 26, by Lyell Carr, a horseman riding along a road at the brink of a ravine, with the sunlight falling upon him through the bare branches of the trees, in which the landscape is typically American, and the effect of a sharp, dry day in early winter is excellently given; are some other works by figure painters whose good qualities commend them to favorable notice. Along with these, also, should be mentioned "A Pompeiian Slave," No. 97, by F. D. Millet; "Alma Mater," No. 75, by G. W. Hitchcock; "Proteus," No. 137, by Henry Walker; "May Roses," No. 47, by Herbert F. Denman; "A Window Seat," No. 46, by Percival De Luce; "Tea Rose," No. 12, by E. H. Blashfield; and "A Song," No. 142, by J. Louis Webb.

Henry Clay.

Vols. XV. and XVI. in Series of American Statesmen. By Carl Schurz. 2 vols. 16mo, $2.50.

Henry Clay was so conspicuous and fascinating a figure in American politics, and took a leading part in discussing so many important questions, that the story of his life cannot fail to be equally instructive and interesting. The signal ability of Mr. Schurz, his profound understanding of the principles, history, and public men of the United States, and his remarkable candor assure a work of unusual value.

Colonial Ballads, Sonnets, and Other Verse.

By Margaret J. Preston, author of 'Cartoons,' etc. 1 vol. 16mo, gilt top, $1.25.

Mrs. Preston holds an enviable place in the regard of thoughtful readers. Her elevation of purpose, her dignity and repose give to her verse a character which commands respect, while her lyrical skill lends to it an attraction that wins admiration. This new volume will find favor with all to whom poetry is a stimulus and a delight.

The Personal Memoirs, and Military History of U. S. Grant vs. the Record of the Army of the Potomac.

By Carswell McClellan, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel U. S. Volunteers, Assistant Adjutant-General, and Special Aide, on Staff of Gen. Andrew A. Humphreys, June, 1862, to April, 1864. With five maps. 1 vol., crown 8vo, $1.75.

Colonel McClellan, who served on the staffs of both Generals Meade and Humphreys, in this volume aims to correct certain errors in General Grant's Memoirs, which, he thinks, do grave injustice to those admirable officers. The work is not controversial, or an attack on General Grant, but points out his mistakes and offers ample documentary proofs for their correction.

Was Shakespeare Shapleigh?

A Correspondence in Two Entanglements Edited by Justin Winsor, Librarian of Harvard University. 1 vol., 16mo, 75 cents.

This is a curious addition to Shakespeare literature. It is a careful and ingenious discussion of certain coincidences, which indicate that possibly Shakespeare was confounded with a Mr. Shapleigh, and will interest Shakespeare students.

The English Dramatists.

THE WORKS OF JOHN MARSTON. Edited by A. H. Bullen, B.A., of the British Museum. In three volumes, octavo. Cloth, $9. for the set; large-paper edition, $12.

Under Mr. Bullen's very competent editorial care this edition of Marston is worthy to be added to the volumes of English Dramatists previously issued in this form—Marlowe in three volumes, and Middleton in eight.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

THE HISTORY OF THE LEGISLATIVE UNION OF GREAT Britain and Ireland. By T. Dunbar Ingram, LL.D. 8vo, $3.

"Nobody can read this book without coming to the conclusion that many of the popular theories respecting the passing of the Union are absolutely without foundation."—Scotsman.

AUSTRALIAN DEFENCES AND NEW GUINEA: Compiled from the Papers of the late Major-Gen. Sir Peter Scratchley, R.E. By C. Kinlock Cooke, B.A., LL.D. With an Introductory Memoir. 8vo, $4.

THE FIRST NINE YEARS OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND. An Inquiry into the Weekly Record of the Price of Bank Stock from August, 1694, to September, 1703. By James E. Thorold Rogers, M.A. 8vo, Oxford Univ. Press, $2.

"An extremely valuable contribution to our financial history."—Money.

"A book of supreme importance, discharged with rare skill and success. . . . Every banker and financier should make of it a constant companion."—Bullionist.

THE PRINCIPLES OF MORALS. Part 2. Being the Body of the Work. By T. Fowler, D.D., Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Oxford. 8vo, Oxford Univ. Press, $2.75.

BUMBLEBEE BOGO'S BUDGET. By a Retired Judge. With Illustrations. 12mo, $2.

KING JAMES THE FIRST. An Historical Tragedy. By David Graham, Author of 'Robert the Bruce.' 12mo, $2.

LESSONS IN ELEMENTARY PRACTICAL PHYSICS. By Prof. Balfour Stewart, M.A., and W. V. Haldane Gee, B.Sc. Vol. 2. Electricity and Magnetism. 12mo, $2.25.

DYNAMICS FOR BEGINNERS. By the Rev. J. B. Lock, M.A. 16mo, $1.

ELEMENTS OF DYNAMIC. An Introduction to the Study of Motion and Rest in Solid and Fluid Bodies. By W. K. Clifford, F.R.S. Part 1. Kinematic. Book 4. 12mo, $1.75.

*AN ELEMENTARY TREATISE ON THE MATHEMATICAL THE-*ory of Perfectly Elastic Solids. With a Short Account of Viscous Fluids. By William John Ibbelson, M.A. 8vo, $6.

A New Edition, Enlarged, of 'Macmillan's First Latin Course.'

MACMILLAN'S LATIN COURSE. FIRST YEAR. By A. M. Cook, M.A., Assistant Master in St. Paul's School. New Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 12mo, 90 cents.

In this second edition exercises have been added in the Indicative Mood of the Passive Voice, an English-Latin dictionary has been provided (in addition to the vocabularies), and the Latin-English dictionary has been enlarged so as to include all words used in the exercises. Should any teachers be so fortunate as to find the exercises more abundant than they require, the remedy is simple—they can omit at will. They will agree with the author that in this point excess is better than defect. The Literary World says: "This work, which is a praiseworthy attempt to make the difficulties of Latin easier at the beginning, deserves a little more notice than the many unsystematic books of exercises which seem to be the delight of publishers and the despair of schoolmasters. It proceeds on a definite plan, and that plan, we venture to think, is the most satisfactory if not the only satisfactory one."

CAMEOS FROM ENGLISH HISTORY. Sixth series. Forty years of Stewart Rule—1603–1643. By the author of 'The Heir of Redclyffe.' 12mo, $1.25.

A New History of England for Schools.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND FOR BEGINNERS. By Arabella B. Buckley, author of 'The Fairy-Land of Science,' etc. With additions by Dr. Robert H. Tubberton. With maps. Globe 8vo, $1.00. Immediately.

In this book Miss Buckley, whose skill in exposition has been abundantly testified in the field of natural science, has tried to set before young readers a connected history of the rise and development of England. "While giving as far as possible," says the author in her preface, "the chief facts required by students, I have been especially anxious to present a vivid picture of the life, the difficulties, and the achievements of our ancestors; showing how our laws, our constitution, our trade, and our colonies have arisen."

LES MISÉRABLES.

BY VICTOR HUGO.

(Sir Lascelles Wraxall's translation.)

Routledge's superbly illustrated edition de luxe in five large octavo volumes.

Prices per set, cloth, uncut, paper label, $20; half morocco, $32.50; full morocco, gilt edges, $45.

Sold only by Subscription.

THIS new edition of Les Misérables is the first to present to English readers the greatest work of the greatest modern French writer in a form befitting its grandeur and beauty. No pains have been spared to make it as perfect as possible. The book contains nearly FOUR HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS from the designs of some of the most eminent French artists. De Neuville, the celebrated painter of military subjects; Scott, whose views of interiors are always admirable; E. Morin, who furnishes some charming vignettes; Brion, E. Bayard, Valnay, and others—all selected for their special knowledge of the subjects assigned to them, and thoroughly acquainted with the places and personages described, thoroughly French in feeling and spirit, and in full sympathy with the author. Last, but not least among the illustrators, is Victor Hugo himself.

Send for illustrated circular. Please mention this paper.

Letters of Horatio Greenough

To his Brother, Henry Greenough. With biographical sketches, and some contemporary correspondence. Edited by Frances Boott Greenough. 12mo, with portrait, $1.25.

"Very welcome to readers of literary tastes and artistic sympathies. They give one a portrait of a sensitive nature, keenly alive to whatever was fine and true. The letters throw side-lights on the growth of art and artistic tastes in America, and have a distinct value on that account. There are letters from Willis, Dana, the Greenoughs, et als, with charming pictures of Boston fifty years ago."

The Sunny Side of Shadow.

The Week.

THE Democratic party is under obligations to the Administration of President Cleveland for removing another of the arguments that have done such effectual service against it during the last twenty years. Thousands of voters have been influenced in different campaigns to continue voting an anti-Democratic ticket because of the fear that, if the Democrats once got into power after their long banishment from the table at which the official loaves and fishes are served, they would prove the accusation that their party was only an "organized appetite," and begin an era of extravagance that would be perilous to the country. There could be no more effectual answer to this than such an order as was issued by the President on Saturday, making a reorganization of internal-revenue districts which wipes out of existence with one stroke of the pen twenty-two entire districts, with their official corps, saving to the taxpayers at least $100,000 a year. An act like this leaves the Opposition no chance to quibble over its motive. It is honest economy at the cost of a great many offices which, a few years ago, would have contributed largely to the managers of political campaigns and to the campaign treasuries. This order is so sweeping in its effect that it deprives six States—Nevada, Rhode Island, Delaware, Mississippi, Maine, Vermont—and one Territory, Utah, of their internal-revenue collectors entirely, merging these offices with those of other States. Moreover, as the despatches show, every one of the officers whose place is thus cut from under him is a Democrat. When the campaign of 1888 comes to be fought before the people, this order, as an illustration of President Cleveland's sincerity as a civil-service reformer, will knock to pieces a thousand Republican arguments directed against his fidelity to his pledges, and founded on cases of individual removals of Republicans from official positions. Yet there are persons who think Cleveland will not be renominated!

Mr. Geo. Wm. Curtis acquired some celebrity at the hands of an interviewer a few weeks ago by means of the paradox put into his mouth that Mr. Cleveland would inevitably be renominated by the Democrats, and that Mr. Blaine would inevitably be renominated by the Republicans, and that neither of them would be elected. In his speech at the Commonwealth Club on Monday Mr. Curtis alluded to this droll saying, as an introduction to a very clear definition of the attitude of the Independents toward the two political parties which divide the country. Their main purpose is to promote the cause of civil-service reform, believing that in this way only can the true expression of the popular will, untrammelled by the pecuniary interests and the corrupting interference of office holders and their immediate adherents, be obtained in the recurring popular elections. An election should be the means of recording the preference and desires of the people as between opposing policies, and not the means of getting a living out of the Government. The Independents would carry this distinct aim into the campaign of 1888. They were well aware that neither the Republican party nor the Democratic party had any such aim at the present time. They were moved by the desire to get as many votes as possible from all the unattached groups—the Independents, the Prohibitionists, the Labor party, and the Irish party. It was proper for the Independents to take every advantage of this desire to promote the cause which they had espoused. If this were called "sitting on the fence," he could say that the position was not an uncomfortable one to those who had no personal ambitions to gratify. But he warned the ingenuous youth who were coming upon the stage of action filled with the desire to promote the public welfare, that they must first cast out personal ambition, and with it the fear of being ostracized by a political party. If there lingers in any man's breast the desire for political preferment, he is not capable of giving his full strength and his best service to the cause of reform.

We observe from an interview published in the Commercial Advertiser that Henry George has repudiated all connection with James G. Blaine, and all intention of supporting him for the Presidency, or, we judge, any other office. We cannot help thinking that this is a mistake on Mr. George's part. He would find Mr. Blaine an invaluable assistant in his efforts to abolish Poverty. There is, in fact, no more determined enemy of Poverty on this continent. All his life long he has waged unrelenting war on it, and has, as far as his own poverty is concerned, abolished it whenever it raised its head, with any weapon within his reach. In fact, Poverty knows so well the kind of man he is that it keeps out of his way carefully. We must add, too, that we think Mr. Blaine's help would be very important in bringing about that just distribution of property which, Mr. George says, the Creator originally intended, but was never able to carry out, owing to the opposition of the capitalists. With George, McGlynn, and Blaine and the Anti-Poverty Association at his back, we cannot help thinking the Almighty would at last be able to arrange human society on what George says was His original plan, which, however, until now He has never been able to carry out.

The Anti-Poverty Society seems to us in danger of wasting its strength through want of a definite legislative programme. We would suggest, therefore, that instead of passing the time in denunciation of capitalists, they should work for an amendment to the State Constitution abolishing poverty in the State of New York, simply as an experiment. This amendment would doubtless be approved by the present and next Legislature, and would be ready for submission to the people in 1889, when it would be sure of unanimous adoption. We would suggest the following as a suitable form:

> Art. 17. Neither poverty nor involuntary shortness of money, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the State of New York after the first day of January, 1890.

Doubtless other States, after witnessing the working of the new system in this one, would be willing to follow the example of New York, and in this way poverty would be gradually banished from the country without causing any serious social or political disturbance, such as might ensue if the whole Union abolished it at once.

Mr. Benjamin Butterworth of Ohio, as good a tariff man as Senator Sherman or Mr. Wharton Barker, delivered an address at Association Hall in this city on Thursday evening in favor of reciprocity with Canada by wholesale, as distinguished from the retail reciprocity of 1854. Mr. Hitt of Illinois, the Republican leader in foreign affairs in the House, has been writing on the same lines as Mr. Butterworth in the columns of the Philadelphia American, and both have a strong ally in Prof. Goldwin Smith. We have to express our high approval of Mr. Butterworth's address. He tells us that "protection to the industries of the United States against Canada means no more and no less than taking the money out of the pocket of one citizen and putting it into the pocket of another, the latter belonging to the protected and favored class." This is an ower true statement, and it seems to derive new point and force coming from the protectionist side of the house, even though qualified by the explanation that a protective tariff may be justified when the conditions of production in two countries are unequal. We are not inclined to taunt Mr. Butterworth with the borrowing of an old free-trade maxim. We think that free trade with Canada would be a good thing for both countries, and that it would lead to freer trade with other countries.

An examination of the immigration returns points to a remarkable conclusion contrary to the generally accepted opinion concerning the attractions of this country for agricultural populations. At no time in our history have opportunities for acquiring land abounded as in the last twenty years, during which the pre-emption and homestead laws have been in full force, and of themselves constituted a factor of great moment, while the opening of the West has been conducted with unwonted energy. Yet not for fifty years has the percentage of immigrating farmers been so small as in the ten years 1873–83, as the following comparison will show:

	Percentage of farmers.
1820-30	8.5
1831-40	13
1841-50	14.5
1851-60	14
1861-68	11.9
1873 83	8.3

The decreased immigration of farmers might be accepted without criticism were there not also a change in the character of immigrating farmers, and a change for the worse. The proportion of farmers coming to the United States from countries where the lowest grades of farming are the rule is becoming larger each year, while that coming from countries which possess agricultural skill and intelligence is becoming less, or remains unchanged. In 1873 14.7 per cent. of the immigrating farmers came from the United Kingdom; in 1886 the percentage was about the same (14.4), though it had fallen to 8.8 per cent. in 1882, a fall due chiefly to a decrease in the movement of farmers from Ireland. Denmark and France furnished nearly the same percentage in 1886 as in 1873. On the other hand, the share of Austria-Hungary rose from 1.2 per cent. in 1873 to 3 per cent. in 1886; of Italy, from less than 1 per cent. in 1873 to 7.3 per cent. in 1886; of Russia, from .5 per cent. in 1873 to 2.5 per cent. in 1886; and of Sweden from 2.3 per cent. in 1873 to 7 per cent. in 1886. These are all very heavy increases, and clearly point to an abnormal development of this class of immigration in the most unwholesome lines. The percentage of farmers coming from Germany fell from 48.6 in 1873 to 27.9 in 1886, and from Norway from 10.5 in the former year to 2.9 in the latter.

There are several interesting points in the testimony of Mr. Jay Gould before the Pacific Railroad Commission. They all centre upon the consolidation of the Union Pacific with the Kansas Pacific, the Denver Pacific, and various other "cats and dogs" that were going cheap about that time. Before the consolidation was effected, Gould controlled the Union Pacific by the ownership of a majority of its stock. He suggested the formation of the "Kansas Pacific pool," by which all the securities of this company except the first-mortgage bonds should be grouped together for the purpose of making a consolidation with the Union Pacific on the basis of the relative values of the two properties, each class of securities in the pool being reckoned at its own value in the order of precedence. Kansas Pacific stock was taken as an "index number" at 12½ cents to the dollar. The bulk of this stock was held by St. Louis people, and they were quite willing to put it in at that figure, since it was rather more than the selling price in the market. After they had put it in, Gould offered them cash for their stock at that figure, which they gladly accepted, since their highest anticipations were to get Union Pacific stock in place of it at the same ratio of 12½. Having got the Kansas Pacific stock, he controlled the pool as completely as he controlled the Union Pacific Company. Accordingly, he withdrew the stock from the pool, and worked things so that Union Pacific stock was exchanged for it at par, resigning his position as a director of the Union Pacific while the transaction was taking place. Of course, such a swindle on the other stockholders of the Union Pacific could not be consummated without the concurrence of the Board of Directors, and it remains to be seen how this was brought about, whether by giving them a share of the spoils, or by alarming them with the prospect of paralleling them by an extension of the Missouri Pacific, or by both. When asked how it happened that he (Gould) was paid for his pool stock in new stock at par instead of other securities according to the original pool programme, he said that "perhaps it was more convenient to the company." This was a fine touch, artistic and sardonic, but not more so than another incident in which Gould pictures "Ames and others" as saddling on him the Central Branch Railway at a high price by inviting him to go over the road, and then holding back the freight trains for a week in order to give the appearance of a large business to his inexperienced eyes when he arrived. Mr. Gould is so much in the habit of judging of the value of a railway by mere surface indications, ignoring earnings and expenses, that "Ames and others" would naturally resort to some simple device of this kind to take him in.

A rather remarkable exhibit has been made in the annual report of the Illinois Central Railroad, showing cost of locomotive service for each year of the past thirty years. The cost per mile run has fallen from 26.52 cents in 1857 to 13.93 cents in 1886. This reduction has been effected wholly by inventions and improvements in machinery. But the figures show that the progress of invention has been even more remarkable than these figures imply, because the wages of engineers and firemen have risen in the same period from 4.51 cents to 5.52 cents per mile run. In 1857 the engineers and firemen received as wages 17 per cent. of the entire cost of locomotive service. In 1886 they received 39 per cent. of the total cost. The table is as follows:

I. C. R. R. CO.

Performance of locomotives. Relation of wages to total cost per mile run:

In 1886 the engineers and firemen received 39 627-1000 per cent. of total cost.

Gov. Ames of Massachusetts has heeded the warning of the Boston Journal that "a change of 4,732 votes would give the State to the Democrats," and that "THE BILL [for the division of Beverly] OUGHT NOT TO BECOME A LAW" (to use the Journal's typography), since his veto undoubtedly defeats the measure. The Governor bases his action upon the ground that "very large sums of money, altogether disproportionate to the honest necessities of the case, have been raised and expended in the promotion and passage of the bill," as "some $20,000 have been spent to indirectly influence the action of the Legislature." He points out that "the abuse has been investigated, exposed, and rebuked in scathing terms by the committees of both houses," one of the reports closing with these words: "Legislation cannot be pure unless free and untrammelled by insidious influences. These influences, however, wherever, or by whomsoever exercised, should be and must be emphatically and sternly condemned." He thus disposes of the plea that the anti-divisionists have also spent money: "Two wrongs do not make a right. It is a just as well as an equitable maxim that those on whom is the burden of making out a case shall come with clean hands, and not seek to excuse the lack of them on the ground that an opponent's are soiled." He quotes the Senate Committee's report that the methods pursued "deserve the strongest condemnation and the most effective remedy," and concludes that "the strongest condemnation and the most effective remedy I can apply is a veto." We have received letters from advocates of the division, one of which is elsewhere published, protesting against the view taken of the incident in these columns last week, urging that the division scheme was not, as it has been represented by Boston papers, a tax-dodging move, and disputing other minor points in our article, but laying most stress upon the plea that the old Beverly people had also used money. Waiving discussion of these particulars, it still remains true that it would have been most scandalous if a measure pushed by such methods had become a law, and Gov. Ames deserves praise for interposing his veto.

Whether Texas votes prohibition into the Constitution next August or not—and the anti-party appears to be really alarmed lest the amendment may carry—the State is going to have a law which will largely prohibit the sale of liquor after the 4th of July. On that day an act goes into operation which forbids the use of a screen or any other device to obstruct the view into a saloon, and prohibits pool tables or any other tables used for games of chance in such places. Sales are forbidden to minors, students, and habitual drunkards, and to any person whose wife, mother, daughter, or sister gives notice to the dealer through the sheriff or other peace officer not to sell to such person. A bond of $5,000 that he will strictly comply with the law must be furnished by every dealer. This is about as severe a law as could be framed and stop short of prohibition.

The dedication of a monument to the unknown Confederate dead at Hopkinsville, Ky., last week, illustrated how wide is the difference between the South of slavery and the South of freedom. The spirit of the occasion was that which Senator Sherman expressed in his Nashville speech, when he said that "the courage, bravery, and fortitude of both sides are now the pride and heritage of us all." Mr. John C. Latham, jr., a Kentuckian, who was a Confederate soldier during the war and is now a banker in this city, contributed the money for the monument, and he originally hoped to make it a joint monument to unknown Federals and Confederates, though this purpose was defeated by the removal of the remains of the dead Federals to the National Cemetery at Fort Donelson. Letters of sympathy were read from various prominent Federal officers, and many old soldiers of both armies were present. The oration was delivered by Mr. W. C. P. Breckinridge, who, like his famous uncle, was a Confederate soldier, and is now a leading member of the Kentucky delegation. It was noteworthy for its frank confession of the differences between the old and the new, and of the advantage of the new. "This new generation now coming into power, this post-bellum generation who will soon be dominant," he said, "has been trained North and South under auspices, influences, surroundings wholly unlike those by which we were trained. In the North the youth are not trained to overthrow slavery; in the South the youth are not trained to defend slavery. In the admission of new States, in the settlement of new Territories, there is no 'balance of power' to be maintained or overcome. No longer must the surplus of Southern enterprise be invested in new lands to be tilled by owned labor; and this surplus will seek, is seeking, new enterprises; and diversified industries are supplanting the old-fashioned way of raising a single product. This will cause new rivalries, new combinations, new adjustments, which will in time cause new political alliances."

The Christian Union for this week makes public a new phase of the trouble of the A. B. C. F. M. with its missionaries. Two applicants from Andover, Messrs. W. H. Noyes and D. T. Torrey, sons of missionaries, and very highly recommended, were set aside by the Prudential Committee of the American Board. These rejected, or "deferred," applicants "deemed it advisable to submit to the Committee a more ample statement than previously had been given of their motives in seeking appointment, the spirit in which they desire to labor, and their doctrinal beliefs," with the hope "that a full explanation of the manner in which they held opinions which had excited opposition to their appointment, and especially that a careful indication of the proportion and emphasis which they attached to these opinions, would open the way to a happy and peaceful adjustment of the issue which had been raised." Accordingly, they prepared an elaborate statement of their purposes and desires as missionaries, and of their religious belief, wherein they say: "We believe, therefore, that the heathen without Christ are lost; we believe also that, unless found by Him, or if rejecting Him when offered to them, they are lost for ever." But they do not say that they believe that the heathen cannot be "found" by Christ after the end of earthly life—they say the "now" of repentance is "the time of hearing the Gospel message" (whenever that may be). It is reported that the Foreign Secretary of the Board warmly advocated the acceptance by the Committee of this proffered basis, and was supported by members of the Committee. But the Home Secretary practically ignored the new overture, adhered to and emphasized the old issue, and was followed by a majority of the Committee. The Home Secretary wrote that "while recognizing the ability of the revised and carefully prepared statement," yet, in view of non-withdrawal of previous statements in relation to "the belief in a continued probation" for "those who die without the knowledge of Christ," regarded as "in harmony with Scripture" and "a necessary corollary" of a belief in "the universality of the atonement"; and "the hypothesis of a future probation for those who have not the Gospel," held as "not without support in Scripture"; the Committee has "no option but to decline to appoint the candidate so long as he holds these views." The incident will probably have its use in bringing matters to a crisis. As the Christian Union says: "The question presses for decision whether the churches who sustain the Board are willing that men of the character, ability, Christian spirit, and evangelical faith evinced in this correspondence shall be excluded from its employ."

It appears that the mob which attacked O'Brien in the streets of Toronto on Wednesday week as a "loyalist" demonstration was composed of "some of our best people," in that resembling the mob which fifty years ago dragged Garrison through the streets of Boston with a rope round his body. We are sure Mr. Goldwin Smith was not among them, but we greatly fear some of his disciples were. We have no great sympathy with O'Brien's mission, and do not think that a man who carries a domestic row into a foreign community can fairly complain if he finds himself surrounded by rioters. But on the other hand, the way in which the English majority has fallen back on brute force in dealing with the Irish question, the way in which so many leading Englishmen frankly avow that they do not care how the bulk of the Irish people feel or think on any subject—that they are to live in the English way or go to jail or be shot—seems to justify the Irish party in resorting to any sort of agitation or protest within their reach. Lord Lansdowne would have more of the sympathy of intelligent men if his friends at home were not legislating to enable him to clap into prison with hard labor anybody on his estate who combines with his fellow-tenants to bring about a reduction of rents by any means, however peaceable in themselves.

The labor troubles which have broken out again in Belgium are the natural and inevitable consequence of the competition with which Belgian industry has to contend in every market. Some of the late coal strikes were directed against companies which have not paid a dividend for eight or ten years. But behind the labor problem there is grave political discontent with the smallness of the voting population, or of the "legal country," as it is called. The property qualification for the exercise of the franchise is so high that not over 2 per cent. of the population can vote. The Liberal Associations have taken this up as the great question of the day, and are preparing for a Congress in which an effort will be made to bring about some sort of agreement with regard to it between the Moderates and the Radicals. The latter demand universal suffrage, which the former oppose on the ground that the ignorance of the masses is still so great as to make it dangerous, and suggest as the first step towards an extension of the suffrage the introduction of an educational qualification, in addition to, or rather in lieu of, the property qualification, where this is wanting.

A Berlin despatch in the Politische Zeitung of Vienna, touching Gen. Boulanger's retention as War Minister, says that Germany desires rather than fears his retention, as she thinks "his experiments with the army will prevent France from regaining the strong official position she formerly held, while his vanity, which leads him to publish all he has done or intends to do, will afford security against military enterprises." His vanity is an unknown quantity, and nobody can tell what it may lead to; but the cost of his experiments with the army is only too well known, and there is not the smallest doubt that they are fastening a millstone round the French neck. In other words, the preparations for war are costing so much that the country will not be able to afford a war.

The collision of the Celtic and the Britannic last Thursday shows how little value is to be attached to the blowing of fog whistles if the commanders of the ships give no more attention to the signals than the straining of eyes and ears to make out the direction from which the warning comes. The only importance of the whistle is to convey the information that there is danger close at hand. The whistle does not locate the danger, it only announces its existence. What is required in such a case is not half speed nor quarter speed, but the slowest motion that the ship is capable of until the faintness of the sound proclaims that the danger is past. The motion should be so slight that the accidental meeting of the two at any angle whatever would not break a hole in either. It is seldom that a fog is so dense that the approach of one steamer towards another cannot be made out within a distance sufficient to stop both if they are going under low steerage way. A few years ago the City of Rome and the Belgenland came within a few feet of each other in a fog off Sandy Hook. Being in shoal water as well as in a fog, the Belgenland was moving with extra caution, having just sufficient speed to stop within sight of any solid object in front of her. The City of Rome was not moving at all, being fast aground. Both were blowing their whistles. The former came bow on towards the midship section of the latter, but was able to control herself within a yard or two of the City of Rome's hull. If both had been out at sea in deep water and following the practice of ocean steamers as illustrated by the coming together of the Celtic and the Britannic, the Rome would probably have gone to the bottom as the Oregon went last year.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, May 18, to TUESDAY, May 24, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

THE President issued an order on May 21 changing a number of the internal-revenue districts so that the following districts will be abolished and the collectors thereof retired from the service: The District of Nevada, of Rhode Island, Second and the Fourth of Illinois, Eleventh of Indiana, Fourth of Iowa, of Delaware, Tenth of Massachusetts, of Mississippi, Fourth of Missouri, of Maine, of Vermont, Third of New Jersey, Fifteenth of New York, Sixth of North Carolina, Sixth of Ohio, Nineteenth and Twenty-second of Pennsylvania, First of Texas, Fourth of Virginia, Third and Sixth of Wisconsin, in all 22 districts. The saving to the Government in salaries and expenses will not be less than $100,000 a year.

A Grand Army post at Wilmington, Del., sent a resolution of thanks to President Cleveland for vetoing the Dependent Pension Bill. In his reply he wrote: "Those of our citizens not holding office, and thus entirely free from the solemn obligation of protecting the interests of the people, often fail to realize that their public servants are to a large extent debarred in official action from the indulgence of those charitable impulses which in private life is not only harmless but commendable." The citizens of St. Louis have invited the President to visit that city late in September, while the Grand Army of the Republic will be in camp there, and he has accepted the invitation.

The President has appointed Major J. L. Rathbone of California to be Consul-General of the United States at Paris. He is a native of Albany, N. Y., was educated at West Point, and served for several years on the staff of Maj-Gen. Schofield.

Secretary Fairchild on May 20 issued a call for all the outstanding 3 per cent. bonds, amounting to about $17,000,000. The call will mature July 1. The circulars offering to redeem uncalled bonds of the 3 per cent. loan on presentation have been revoked, and no more bonds will be redeemed before maturity.

Lieut. Charles T. Hutchins of the navy, who is now stationed at the Naval Academy, is the winner of the prize given this year for the best essay on "The Naval Brigade, its Organization, Equipment, and Tactics." Ensigns Hewes and Copps, who were sent to Glasgow last year to take the advanced course in construction and marine architecture, have finished the first term and won prizes. Secretary Whitney thinks the way is now clear, with such men, to make the construction corps of our navy second to none.

The Inter-State Commerce Commission has caused a letter to be published which sets forth that the Commissioners do not consider that they have the power permanently to suspend the operation of the long-and-short-haul section of the law, which they believe to be its vital point; that the letter and the spirit of the law are just as binding upon the Commissioners as they are upon the public; and that the Commission, in the exercise of the limited discretion given it to suspend the operation of this section in certain cases, will be governed by the letter of the law, and will order no suspensions except for special reasons and after an examination as to the facts in each case. On May 23 the receiver of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company filed a petition in the United States Circuit Court at New Orleans to secure an interpretation of this clause of the law. The petition sets forth that the receiver is an officer of the court, that duty requires him to keep the court informed of facts affecting the interest and revenues of the road, and that the execution of this clause has been hurtful.

The Supreme Court of the United States on May 23 handed down two decisions which uphold the validity of the patent on driven wells. This brings to an end a legal fight of fourteen years, and will result in causing the holders of the patent to receive millions of dollars for royalties and infringements. These wells are used to supply several cities with water, among which are Brooklyn, N. Y., and Newark, N. J.

After seven months the Federal Grand Jury has returned thirteen indictments against prominent politicians and election officers at Indianapolis, for forging or mutilating the election returns last fall—eleven Democrats and two Republicans.

On May 19, Samuel Pasco (Dem.) was elected United States Senator from Florida. Mr. Pasco, an Englishman by birth, was graduated from Harvard College in 1858, but he has spent most of his life in Florida. He is Speaker of the House of the present Legislature.

The special session of the Legislature of Virginia adjourned May 23, with the State debt as far from a settlement as when it was convened for the special purpose of settling it. The political campaign will begin early in the summer, and the debt will again be a controlling and vexed issue.

The Legislature of Connecticut adjourned on May 19. The failure to pass the High-License and Grade-Crossing Bills is cause of disappointment to a large proportion of the citizens of the State.

The Governor of Massachusetts has signed the Employers' Liability Bill, which will go into effect on September 1. An employee who is injured by the negligence of a fellow-employee exercising superintending authority as part of his duty, may recover of the employer or corporation just as if the injured person had not been in the service of such employer or corporation, damages not greater than $5,000.

The Saturday-Half-Holiday Law in this State went into effect last Saturday. The offices of the municipal government in this city and in most of the other cities of the State were closed at noon. Most of the commercial exchanges shortened the day's work, and the banks closed as early in the afternoon as they could. The tendency was for wholesale commercial houses to shut up, and a very few retail merchants took a half holiday. The factories and the workers in the country did not, on the first day of the law's operation, show that they were aware of it.

At Morristown, N. J., C. B. Reynolds, who was tried for blasphemy under an old statute and defended by Col. R. G. Ingersoll, was convicted on May 20, and fined $25 and costs.

On account of the ill-feeling provoked by Mr. G. W. Cable's criticisms of the Southern race prejudice, his engagement to deliver a lecture in the Columbia (S. C.) Opera-house this week, for the benefit of the public-school library fund, has been cancelled.

A scientific expedition from Princeton College will go to Russia to observe the total eclipse of the sun on August 19, made up of Profs. Young, Libbey, and McNeill. They will sail on June 25, and on the way back will attend the meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science at Manchester. Mr. Charles Green of Trenton, an alumnus of Princeton, will furnish most of the funds for the expedition.

Archbishop Corrigan of this city has received a letter from the Pope, dated May 4, in which the Pope approves the "firmness, joined with signal charity," of his course in regard to "the contumacious disobedience of a priest" (Dr. McGlynn), and "the false doctrines concerning the right of property disseminated by him among the people in newspapers and public assemblies."

The strike and lockout of workmen of the building trades at Chicago are not yet formally ended, but not only are the employees beaten, but the employers have perfected an organization with a determination to exclude from employment all who will not pledge themselves not to force other men to quit work. At a meeting of one organization of employees on Sunday a resolution was adopted asking men out of employment not to go to Chicago. At Haverhill, Mass., 3,500 operatives in the shoe shops were locked out forty-eight hours. They returned to work May 19, when an agreement was made by committees representing both sides. At Everson, Pa., a mob of 300 striking miners on May 20 attacked a few men who were at work at the coke ovens, and beat them severely. The mob did injury also to property.

Nearly the whole town of Lake Linden, in the Keweenaw Peninsula, Mich., where the Calumet and Hecla's stamp mills are situated, has been burned, causing a loss of perhaps $2,000,000. The forest fires which have been burning in nearly every county in the State have destroyed much other property, and endangered many towns.

Two persons, a man and his wife, have died of yellow fever at Key West, Fla., and a sister of the dead woman was stricken with it May 23. The disease has been traced to bedding which was brought from Havana. The Board of Health at Key West and the Marine Hospital service are expected to deal successfully with the disease. Although these cases have caused great local alarm, there is little reason to fear that the fever will spread.

The transatlantic steamship Britannic of the White Star Line, which sailed from this port May 18, on the afternoon of the next day, in a dense fog 350 miles out at sea, came into collision with the Celtic of the same line. Several steerage passengers on the Britannic were killed and a number badly hurt. The White Star vessels were accompanied to this port by the Marengo and the British Queen, which fell in with them on the next day, and kept near so as to render assistance if needed. Both steamships were considerably damaged.

A monument to Schuyler Colfax set up by the Odd Fellows was unveiled at Indianapolis May 18.

Among the noteworthy persons who have died since the last number of the Nation was issued are ex-Gov. William Smith of Virginia, in his ninetieth year, who had twice been Governor and had filled many other public positions; Charles E. Stuart, once United States Senator from Michigan, who was one of Stephen A. Douglas's ablest supporters; Timothy Coop, a rich Englishman, who had identified himself with educational advancement in Kansas, and endowed the University at Wichita, which he named Garfield University because of his admiration of the ex-President; William H. Macy, President of the Seamen's Bank for Savings in this city; Albert Palmer, formerly Mayor of Boston.

FOREIGN.

Since the resignation of the Goblet Cabinet President Grévy has summoned MM. Clémenceau, Ferry, Devès, Freycinet, Raynal, Rouvier, and other prominent party leaders, and had interviews with them in relation to the formation of a new Cabinet. M. Freycinet declined to undertake the task after consulting his friends, and Rouvier undertook it and gave it up. The centre of interest and of disturbance is Gen. Boulanger, in favor of whose retention in the War Office a considerable demonstration has been made. An election was held on Sunday for a Deputy for the Seine. M. Mesurier, who is a Socialist, received 198,297 votes, and Gen. Boulanger 33,038. Gen. Boulanger's candidacy was illegal, and his friends voted for him simply to show his popularity.

The French State Council has rejected the appeals of the Orleans Princes for a reversal of the decree expelling them from the army, but the appeal of Prince Murat for restoration has been admitted,

The total amount realized from the sale of the French crown jewels is 6,864,000 francs. More than one-third of this was paid by Tiffany & Co. of New York, who were the largest purchasers.

Dr Edme Félix Alfred Vulpian, Dean of the Faculty of the French Academy of Medicine, died May 18, aged sixty-one; on May 21 Francisque Xavier Michel, the French archæologist and translator, died in his seventy-ninth year; and on May 23 died Sir Horace Jones, the English architect who designed Caversham Hall, the Royal Surrey Music Hall, the oak roof of the Guildhall, London, and the principal modern London markets.

The work of Germanizing Alsace-Lorraine continues. An official census has been published showing that during the five years since 1880, 37,000 Germans have displaced 49,254 natives. It is estimated that if the native emigration continues in the same ratio, the provinces will be completely German within a quarter of a century.

Crown Prince Frederick William of Germany on May 23 underwent a serious operation for cancer in the throat.

Prince Bismarck is said to desire the appointment of a Papal Nuncio at Berlin so that Dr. Windthorst may be deposed from the dictatorship of the Centre party.

It is reported that Prince Luitpold, the Regent of Bavaria, will receive Emperor Francis Joseph's sanction to assume the Bavarian throne, and that Emperor William's consent has already been obtained.

In the Reichstag May 21 the Supplementary Budget and Loan Bill passed the third reading.

The Westphalian Manufacturing Company has closed its works in Russia, because of the heavy duties imposed by the new tariff on the material used.

The Tzesarevitch was on May 18 installed with great ceremony at Novo-Tcherkask as Hetman of the Don Cossacks. The reception of the Russian royal family is reported to have been enthusiastic. There were processions and exchanges of presents and compliments. Although the whole route of more than 1,000 miles from St. Petersburg was guarded with soldiers, an effort was made to kill the Czar.

Five more persons were executed at St. Petersburg on May 20 for complicity in one of the recent efforts to kill the Czar. During their trial the details of a well-laid plan were made known. It has been reported that another effort was made to kill him before he returned from the Don Cossack country.

The Porte has asked the consent of the Powers to the issue of a loan of £5,000,000, to be guaranteed by the Egypt and Cyprus tributes.

The convention between England and Turkey provides that the British shall evacuate Egypt three years hence. If, after that time, internal troubles arise in Egypt, British and Turkish troops shall reoccupy the country jointly or separately, as the two Governments may agree. No other Power shall be allowed to intervene in Egyptian affairs.

A representative of Lord Salisbury's Government has begun negotiations with the Vatican, in a semi-official capacity, for the resumption of official relations between the Vatican and England.

The House of Commons in committee on May 18 began the consideration of the second clause of the Irish Coercion Bill. This clause proposes to extend summary jurisdiction to conspiracy, boycotting, resistance to eviction, and the offences designated in the Whiteboy acts. An amendment limiting the operation of the clause to the offences committed after the passage of the act was rejected on the first evening. After the rejection of many other amendments and the limiting of the debate by frequent application of the closure rule, the second clause of the bill was adopted May 23 by a vote of 235 to 103.

Among the noteworthy political incidents of the week in England were a discussion in the Commons of the causes of emigration from Ireland, when Mr. Macdonald (Parnellite) asked: "Isn't the increase of emigration partly due to the introduction by the Government of the Crimes Bill and the desire of the Irish people to escape its tyranny?" and the Speaker called for order; an amendment offered by Mr. Chance (Nationalist), altering the title of the Crimes Bill to "A bill for the suppression of free speech and trial by jury"; an appeal by Sir George O. Trevelyan, in a speech at Manchester to the Unionists, to refuse to support a Government which struck at its Liberal rivals through the reputation of the Parnellites; and the votes of 143 members of the Eighty Club in approval of home rule and against coercion, against the votes of 55 in favor of coercion and against home rule.

Father Keller, the Irish priest who was imprisoned in Dublin several months ago for refusing to tell what he knew about the plan of campaign and the part he took in furthering it, was released on Saturday. When he arrived at Youghal he was met by a great crowd, which cheered and blessed him.

By an election in the St. Austell division of Cornwall, May 19, to fill a vacant Parliamentary seat, Mr. MacArthur, the Gladstonian candidate, was elected by a majority of 211.

Four hundred members of the House of Commons attended a jubilee service at St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, on Sunday. At the head of the procession were the Speaker, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. W. H. Smith, Lord Hartington, and Mr. Goschen, who were given the seats of honor. The service was conducted by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of York, the Dean of Westminster, and Archdeacon Farrar, the hymns being composed especially for the occasion. The Bishop of Ripon preached the sermon.

The London Times continues to publish articles on "Parnellism and Crime," which relate to the work of Irishmen in America. The article of May 20 was about the League Conventions in Chicago and Philadelphia, and the Clan-na-Gael Society's share therein.

A committee of English iron manufacturers have asked Sir Henry Holland, Colonial Secretary, to urge the Government to protest against the proposed increase of Canadian import duties on metals.

After September 30 all protective customs duties will be abolished in New South Wales, and the new duties will all be specific, and they will be levied on twenty-three classes of articles. There is an increase in the excise on tobacco, and an imposition of an excise duty of 4d. per gallon on all kinds of ale and beer and porter manufactured in the colony.

The committee appointed some time ago by the House of Commons to inquire into the charges of misconduct against the London Corporation has reported that there has been much reckless expenditure, but that there is not sufficient evidence to establish the charge of corruption.

Thirteen thousand workmen have struck in Belgium. The strikers in the district of Borinage have intimidated the employees of factories where there was no strike and stopped their work. The houses of a number of workmen who would not strike have been blown up with dynamite. In consequence of nightly Socialist demonstrations in Brussels, processions and gatherings in the public streets have been prohibited, and a number of persons have been arrested.

The first anniversary of the birth of Alfonso XIII., King of Spain, was celebrated at Madrid May 17, with elaborate ceremonies. The Queen Regent remitted one-half the sentence of every soldier imprisoned for participation in the revolt of last September.

A rather violent shock of earthquake was felt at Monte Carlo on the morning of May 20.

When Mr. William O'Brien, carrying on his agitation in Canada against Lord Lansdowne for evicting tenants from his Irish estates, spoke at Toronto he was mobbed. While he was walking on the street with several companions, a mob formed around him groaning and hissing, and shouting "Away, traitor!" "Down with the dynamiter!" and "God save the Queen!" The policemen were overpowered, and the mob pursued him, throwing stones and eggs. Mr. O'Brien made his escape, with a few bruises, by entering a bicycle shop, and returned to the hotel by another street. When he went to Kingston, he began a speech in the evening without the least hostile demonstration. But a mob gathered on the outside of the building, and responded with groans to every cheer from the inside. When he came out of the hall the mob shouted, "There he is!" "Kill him!" and threw stones and bricks. Mr. O'Brien escaped, with wounds, into the residence of an Irish citizen. The mob broke the windows of the hotel where they supposed he had found shelter, and they wrecked the office of the Canadian Freeman, an Irish paper. The mob was made up of men who were aroused to a murderous pitch, and Mr. O'Brien no doubt saved his life by eluding them. He went to Niagara Falls and spent Sunday, and he was so badly bruised that a physician advised him not to travel or to exert himself for a time. But on Monday he went to Hamilton, where he had an engagement to speak. While he was returning at night from the hall where he spoke, several shots were fired from a disorderly crowd, one of which wounded the driver of the cab next the one Mr. O'Brien occupied. At Toronto and Kingston two of the correspondents of New York newspapers who were with Mr. O'Brien were hurt. The conduct of the mobs has been condemned by the Canadian papers of all parties.

The Toronto Board of Trade on May 19 engaged in an animated debate on reciprocity with the United States. The dominant sentiment is expressed in the following clauses of the resolution adopted: "That this Board believes that a commercial treaty creditable and advantageous alike to both parties can be framed in such a spirit of fairness as will afford the best guarantee for its perpetuity"; but "that it disapproves of any proposal to discriminate against Great Britain, whose protection we enjoy." On the same evening Mr. Butterworth of Ohio, the author of a measure introduced in the last Congress looking towards the removal of customs duties by each country on goods imported from the other, addressed the Canadian Club of this city on that proposition. Talking on the same subject in this city on May 23, Sir Charles Tupper, Canadian Minister of Finance, said: "It would be impossible for the United States to consent to a customs union or free trade between Canada and the United States, as that would really mean free trade between the United States and England. A complete customs union is simply impracticable. It would be quite impossible for Canada to adopt a tariff so hostile to the mother country."

The Mayor of Nanaimo, B. C., has sent an appeal to the Mayors of several of the larger cities in the United States for money to relieve the suffering caused by the recent mining disaster. Thirty-nine widows and more than 100 children are destitute.

Mr. Manning, United States Minister to Mexico, has presented to President Diaz the request of the American Government for the remission of the death sentence of the three Mexican officers condemned by court-martial to be shot for their violation of American territory and judicial jurisdiction at Nogales.

A Chinese railway, from Taku to Tien-tsin, was opened May 20. The first railway in China was a short line from Woosung to Shanghai, forty miles, half of which was finished and opened for traffic in 1876. It was purchased by the Chinese Government and closed in 1877.

PARTIES AND THE SUPREME COURT.

A REPUBLICAN organ in Chicago, commenting upon the vacancy in the Supreme Court and the suggestion that a Southern man will be appointed to fill it, says: "The South looks to the ultimate reconstruction of the Supreme Court as the means of unsettling all the results, and destroying all the fruits, of the loyal victory in the war. With five rebel jurists on the bench of that court this could easily be accomplished. It is no wonder that they demand the first vacancy. If it is filled as they desire, it will require but three more such appointments, including Justice Field, to give them a majority of the bench." The organ is of the opinion that "the honest people and the loyal people of the country will hold their breath, metaphorically speaking, until President Cleveland shall make an appointment to fill this vacancy," and it declares that "if a rebel successor to Judge Woods should be appointed, it would be a cause for both dismay and shame."

We have already pointed out that the time for talking about the danger of appointing a "rebel" on the Federal bench has passed, since there has sat for several years upon such a bench, as United States District Judge in Tennessee by the appointment of a Republican President, David M. Key, who "entered the Confederate Army in 1861, and served through the entire war as Lieutenant-Colonel of the Forty-third Tennessee Infantry," and who in 1868 supported Seymour and Blair upon a platform declaring that "we regard the reconstruction acts, so called, of Congress as a usurpation, and unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void."

The criticism of the Chicago paper, however, goes beyond this question of appointing a man who fought for four years, like Mr. Key, to overthrow the Government. It involves the theory that there is a sharp line of division between Republican jurists and "rebel jurists"—meaning by the latter term Southern Democrats appointed to the bench—and that a bench containing a majority of Southern men would interpret the Constitutional amendments and the reconstruction legislation in such a way as to "unsettle all the results, and destroy all the fruits, of the loyal victory in the war."

It ought to be sufficient answer to this antiquated sort of rant that, outside of a few hopeless Bourbons, nobody in the South has any desire to unsettle all the results of the war. Except by such Bourbons, it is frankly confessed by everybody that it is most fortunate for the South that the war resulted as it did. But the Chicago paper doubtless means that a Supreme Court with several Southern members would reverse the attitude of that tribunal toward the legislation of Congress regarding the South, and especially regarding the negroes, and toward the relation of the States to the Federal Government. Only the most cursory acquaintance with the recent tendency of the Supreme Court while all of its nine members but one were Republicans (and he, too, a Republican when Lincoln appointed him) is required to show that this old theory of the Republican party has already been largely overthrown.

One of the reconstruction acts which Judge Key, like other "rebels," regarded as "unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void," was the act "to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of the Union and for other purposes," popularly known as "the Kuklux Act." Four years ago the Republican Supreme Court, without a dissenting voice, pronounced this act unconstitutional. Another law, which was regarded as the cap-sheaf of reconstruction legislation, was the Civil-Rights Act passed in 1875. In 1883 the Republican Supreme Court, with but a single dissenting voice, decided that the vital sections of this act were "unconstitutional and void." The theory upon which that famous act was based, the Court held, "would make Congress take the place of the State Legislatures and supersede them," and it characterized as "absurd" the pretence that, under the Constitution, such a theory could be maintained.

The relation of the States to the Federal Government is a question upon which it might be expected that partisan lines would be drawn upon the Supreme bench, and especially in the interpretation of a provision like the Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution, which declares that "the judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State." But when the question of the right of the holders of Virginia coupons receivable for taxes to pay them in as such, and compel the State to receive them, was brought before the Supreme Court, the eight Republican judges divided evenly on the point whether the eleventh amendment protected the State from being sued; and, oddly enough, Judge Field, the Democratic member, who thus held the casting vote, threw it against the States-rights doctrine.

It is thus evident that there is no "rebel" or Democratic interpretation of the Constitution, in contradistinction to a "loyal" or Republican interpretation. The decision of the Supreme Court on such a fundamental issue as that involved in the Civil-Rights Act would not have been different if every judge had been a Democrat, like Judge Field, or a "rebel," like Judge Key. Moreover, when one considers questions of constitutional interpretation liable to arise in the future, it becomes still more manifest that there is no dividing line between parties. Take the broad issue of paternalism in government, which underlies the question of Federal aid to education in the States, for example. The stoutest opponent of this scheme on constitutional grounds has been Senator Morgan of Alabama, a "rebel." But nobody more vigorously sustains the Southern Democrat in this stand than Senator Hawley, the Union soldier and possible Republican candidate for President in 1888, who holds that propositions like the Blair bill are "fatal to the very fundamental theory of the Government," and declares that "the tendency towards a consolidation of the entire powers of government is one of the strongest to-day, and one of those most dangerous to the republican experiment, as our fathers understood it." There can be no doubt that, if any measure based upon this paternal theory of government were to become a law, and to be submitted to a Supreme Court of which Morgan and Hawley were members, the "loyal" man and the "rebel" would unite in declaring it unconstitutional. And while there are many Northern Republicans who do not agree with Senator Hawley, just as there are many Southern Democrats who do not agree with Senator Morgan, there are so many who agree with him in the hearty praise which he has bestowed upon Mr. Cleveland for resisting the tendency to paternalism by the Texas Seed Bill veto, that his party standing and his availability as a Presidential candidate are not injured by his agreement upon this vital point with "a copperhead President" and a "rebel" Senator.

It is fortunate for the country that neither in the legislative, nor in the judicial department of the Government, nor among the voters themselves, is there any longer a dividing line between "rebels" and "loyal" men. In the Louisiana slaughter-house cases, which involved the question of the scope of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments, Justice Miller, in concluding the unanimous decision of the court against the broad interpretation which had been asked, in 1871, used this striking language:

> "In the early history of the organization of the Government, its statesmen seem to have divided on the line which should separate the powers of the national Government from those of the State Governments; and though this line has never been very well defined in public opinion, such a division has continued from that day to this.
> "The adoption of the first eleven amendments to the Constitution so soon after the original instrument was accepted shows a prevailing sense of danger at that time from the Federal power. And it cannot be denied that such a jealousy continued to exist with many patriotic men until the breaking out of the late civil war. It was then discovered that the true danger to the perpetuity of the Union was in the capacity of the State organizations to combine and concentrate all the powers of the State, and of contiguous States, for a determined resistance to the general Government.
> "Unquestionably this has given great force to the argument, and added largely to the number of those who believe in the necessity of a strong national Government.
> "But, however pervading this sentiment, and however it may have contributed to the adoption of the amendments we have been considering, we do not see in those amendments any purpose to destroy the main features of the general system. Under the pressure of all the excited feeling growing out of the war, our statesmen have still believed that the existence of the States with powers for domestic and local government, including the regulation of civil rights—the rights of person and of property—was essential to the perfect working of our complex form of government, though they have thought proper to impose additional limitations on the States, and to confer additional power on that of the nation.
> "But whatever fluctuations may be seen in the history of public opinion on this subject during the period of our national existence, we think it will be found that this court, so far as its functions required, has always held with a steady and an even hand the balance between State and Federal power; and we trust that such may continue to be the history of its relation to that subject so long as it shall have duties to perform which demand of it a construction of the Constitution or any of its parts."

The course of the court since this decision was rendered fifteen years ago has justified the confidence which Judge Miller expressed, and the same hope for the future may now be entertained, whether Mr. Cleveland follows the example of Mr. Hayes in appointing a "rebel," like Mr. Key, or a "loyal" man who holds to the Hawley creed.

FISHERIES FALLACIES.

It was stated not long since in the London Times that the Earl of Rosebery declared, when resigning office, that the most serious question he left behind him was the dispute between the United States and Great Britain respecting the fisheries. Lord Iddlesleigh is reported to have made, shortly before his death, a similar declaration as to the gravity of the controversy. Both these statesmen betrayed, by these expressions of opinion, an intelligent apprehension of the character of the dispute, and of the consequences not unlikely to result from its continuance. A prolonged controversy between nations, while always fraught with danger, is peculiarly liable to end in hostilities when waged, as the fisheries dispute actually is, between contiguous countries and in a spirit of exasperation on both sides. The history of the oyster fisheries in the Chesapeake Bay is a strong domestic illustration of the difficulty of maintaining good relations between the hardy champions of rival fishing interests, even when they belong to friendly communities under one central government, with no questions of tariff or of rival nurseries for seamen to excite cupidity or inflame national pride and resentment.

Three modes of settling the fisheries dispute have been suggested. One is that recently made by Lord Salisbury, as at least a temporary expedient, of an exchange of free fishing in Canadian waters—with the same privileges and regulations for American as for British fishing vessels—for a free market for Canadian fish in the United States. Another mode is that proposed by Mr. Bayard, of a permanent settlement on the lines of the Treaty of 1818, by a definition of the limits of the exclusive and common fishing grounds under that convention, a joint system of police by the two Governments, and the admission of American fishing vessels into Canadian ports for the purchase of bait and other supplies, etc. A third mode of settlement which has been proposed, is to abrogate the Treaty of 1818 and fall back on the Treaty of 1783.

It is to the last mode that we wish to direct attention, for, while it is not a new idea, it has lately been accepted in certain quarters with not a little favor, and has received at the hands of Mr. John Jay, late Minister to Vienna, a very thorough and deliberate exposition, published in the form of a letter to Mr. Evarts. An examination of Mr. Jay's pamphlet will lead to the disclosure of fundamental fallacies in his position, and throw not a little light on the general aspects of the dispute.

Under the Treaty of Peace of 1783, between the United States and Great Britain the fishermen of the United States had, as is generally known, the right to take, dry, and cure fish in the territorial waters and on the coasts of British North America. The enjoyment of this right was suspended by the war of 1812; and when, after the close of that conflict, the American fishermen sought to resume their rights under the Treaty of 1783, the British Government objected, on the ground that the war had put an end to the treaty. This was denied by the United States, which contended that the Treaty of 1783, being a treaty of separation and settlement, for the division of common property, and not a grant of rights and privileges by the mother country to the United States, was permanent in its character and not affected by war.

The Treaty of Ghent, concluded December 23, 1814, for the purpose of ending the war of 1812, contains no mention of the fisheries. It is known, however, that they formed a frequent topic of discussion between the negotiators of that convention, and that the British Commissioners unequivocally declared that they would not thereafter "grant" the liberty of fishing, and drying and curing fish, within exclusive British jurisdiction without an equivalent. (Memoirs of J. Q. Adams, vol. iii., p. 119 et seq., December 22, 1814.) The American Commissioners maintained the position that the rights of the American fishermen were not affected by the war, and thus the issue was made. The disagreement was complete.

The controversy thus begun continued until the conclusion of the Treaty of 1818. The intervening period was one of great irritation, and the two countries were continually on the verge of a hostile outbreak. Mr. Adams gives in vol. iii. (p. 265 et seq.) of his Diary an account of an interview with Lord Bathurst, in London, in September, 1815, in which his Lordship declared that American vessels could not be permitted to fish in British territorial waters; to which Mr. Adams replied, maintaining the American position, and promising soon to address his Lordship a note on the subject. In volume iv. of the Diary we find an account of a conversation between Mr. Adams and the British Minister at Washington, on the 18th of March, 1818, in which the latter stated that Admiral Milne, commanding the Jamaica station, had issued orders, like those of the preceding year, to seize all American vessels which might be found fishing within the British jurisdiction. Mr. Adams replied at length, and closed by saying that the United States would probably have to fight for the matter in the end. The Minister replied that Great Britain had gone as far in the direction of accommodation as she could go,

The orders issued by the British Admiralty from 1815 to 1818 to seize American vessels found fishing in British waters were not continuously enforced, but were at various times, and for various periods, generally with a view to negotiations, suspended. But the Diary of Mr. Adams, as well as other contemporaneous records, shows that many seizures were actually made.

Such was the condition of things when, on the 20th of October, Messrs. Gallatin and Rush concluded the Treaty of 1818. By that convention the United States "renounced for ever any liberty heretofore enjoyed by the inhabitants thereof" to fish within three marine miles of any of the "coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors" of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within certain limits, in which the right of fishing was expressly reserved to American fishermen by the treaty. This in terms constituted a permanent settlement of the boundaries between the common and exclusive fishing grounds.

We are now prepared to consider the proposition, as advocated by Mr. Jay, to settle the present dispute by abrogating the convention of 1818, and resting on that of 1783. In support of the right of the United States to abrogate the Treaty of 1818, he cites the annulment by Congress in 1798 of the treaties of 1778 with France, for the reason, among others, that those treaties had been repeatedly violated by the French Government. He also cites the opinions of several publicists to show that the violation of a treaty by one contracting party releases the other. This proposition no one will controvert.

But when he comes to apply this doctrine, Mr. Jay is not so fortunate. After saying that the violation of the Treaty of 1818 by the Canadians has given us a right to abrogate it, he declares "that its abrogation would restore to force article 3 of the Treaty of Peace in 1783, the operation of which was suspended by the Treaty of 1818, but which would revive in its original force were the Treaty of 1818 abrogated; precisely as the latter treaty, after being suspended by the adoption of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, was revived by its termination in 1866; and, after being again suspended by the Treaty of 1871, was again restored by its termination in 1885."

The fundamental fallacy of this deduction is the singularly erroneous assumption that the Treaties of 1854 and 1871 "suspended" the Treaty of 1818. The Treaty of 1818 has, in fact, remained in force from the moment of its ratification to the present time. Both the Treaty of 1854 and that of 1871 provided, in terms, that "in addition to the liberty secured to the United States fishermen" by the convention of 1818, they should enjoy for a certain time a common right of fishing with her Britannic Majesty's subjects on certain other coasts than those to which such right was confined by that convention. In a word the Treaties of 1854 and 1871 temporarily restored what the Treaty of 1818 had renounced. They did not supplant nor suspend a single right enjoyed under it. The Treaty of 1818 was made as a permanent settlement of the whole subject; and if its abrogation, instead of restoring to American fishermen the enjoyment of the rights and liberties defined in the Treaty of 1783, merely remitted us to the disputes of 1815-1818, the practical side of the suggestion advocated by Mr. Jay could not be regarded as of more value than its argumentative basis.

Another prevalent fallacy is the criticism of the negotiators of the Treaty of 1818 for having yielded without cause the rights of the United States in the fisheries. However sound may have been the American position as to the permanency of the fishing articles of the Treaty of 1783, we have seen, from the review of the situation between 1815 and 1818, how little the argument availed the American fishermen in practice. Nevertheless, Mr. Blaine declares, in his 'Twenty Years of Congress' (p. 617, vol. ii.), and his view has been widely spread, that the Treaty of 1818 was "altogether the most inexplicable in our diplomatic history." He says that "neither in the minute and important Diary of Mr. Adams, nor in the private letters, as published, of Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Rush, is there the slightest indication of any reason for recommending, or any necessity for conceding, the treaty." And, to complete the case against the negotiators, he finally states (p. 619, vol. ii.) that "of this extraordinary renunciation Mr. Rush wrote many years after: 'We [Mr. Gallatin and himself] inserted the clause of renunciation; the British plenipotentiaries did not desire it.'"

We have already seen what the Diary of Mr. Adams has to say on the subject, and that in March, 1818, he expressed to the British Minister the opinion that the matter would probably have to be settled by war. Such was doubtless the apprehension of Messrs. Gallatin and Rush; and the latter, in an appendix to his 'Residence at the Court of London,' giving an account of the negotiations, expressly so declares. "Neither side," says Mr. Rush, "yielded its convictions to the reasoning of the other. This being exhausted, there was no resource left with nations disposed to peace but a compromise. Great Britain grew willing to give up something. The United States consented to take less than the whole." The compromise having been agreed upon, the question of phraseology arose. The American plenipotentiaries inserted and insisted upon the word renounce, not, as Mr. Blaine would lead us to suppose, for the purpose of giving up something the British plenipotentiaries did not wish them to yield, but for the following reasons, stated by Mr. Rush in the appendix above quoted: "(1) To exclude the implication of the fisheries secured to us being a new grant; (2) to place the rights secured and renounced on the same footing of permanence; (3) that it might expressly appear that our renunciation was limited to three miles from the coasts." It thus appears that the renunciation was a final reassertion by the American plenipotentiaries of the permanency of the fishing articles of the Treaty of 1783. Compelled, as they believed, to yield something for the sake of peace, they renounced what they gave up, so as to preclude the supposition that in making the compromise they had abandoned the principle.

THE FRENCH CRISIS.

THE way in which what was called the "Pagny incident," or, in plainer English, the dispute over the arrest of Schnaebelé, the French Commissary, between France and Germany, has ended, has had a reassuring effect in France touching Prince Bismarck's state of mind, and Prince Bismarck's state of mind is to-day, for Frenchmen, the most important thing in the world. When Schnaebelé was arrested, after being enticed on German soil, under a charge of high treason against the German Government, it was feared, and not without reason, that it was simply a device to tempt the French Government or press into some extravagance of behavior which would justify the men of war at Berlin in taking offence and putting in motion once more that "flail of destiny," as it was called in 1870—the German Army.

The conduct of all parties on this occasion showed how great is on all sides the dislike of war. The French press and politicians were extraordinarily patient and moderate, and though the German press was less so, Bismarck was never calmer or more judicial-minded. After due consideration, he wrote a dry and almost technical despatch to the French Ambassador, saying that Schnaebelé would have been justifiably arrested if he had come on German soil of his own accord; but that it was clearly proved that he had crossed the line on the invitation of his German colleague, Gautsch, to arrange some administrative business, and that this invitation ought to have operated as a safe-conduct. This said plainly enough that if there was to be another quarrel with France, it would not begin about a trifle.

But this does not entirely clear the sky. It is felt all over Europe that, although Bismarck will not fight France about a trifle, nevertheless there are limits to his patience, which are well settled in his own mind, but which he has only revealed very vaguely and indefinitely. He has intimated that he assumes the existence of a determination on the part of France to attack Germany some time or other, as one of the fixed facts of the political situation. His policy, therefore, is to be regulated by the modes and degrees in which the French give expression to this determination. So people watch France eagerly in order to form an opinion as to what he will do. They are now asking what effect the importance attached by popular sentiment to Boulanger's remaining in the Ministry will have on him, and how he will take Boulanger's plan of "mobilizing a corps d'armée," as a test of the efficiency of the new organization, at a cost of 3,600,000 francs.

Boulanger has done wonders in preparing the French for war, and he has done it in such a way as in some degree to restore the old French military pride and self-confidence. But he has done it at enormous cost in money. The French budget is now a subject with which no French Ministry has found itself capable of dealing. Deficit follows deficit year after year with unfaltering regularity, and each deficit is met by temporary loans which have ended in creating a floating debt, the amount of which the Government shrinks from revealing in its entirety. The shrewdest financial heads in France, in fact, such men as Léon Say and Leroy Beaulieu, believe that a Treasury collapse of some kind is not far away. In this terrible problem Boulanger is undoubtedly the worst element, and by Boulanger we do not mean simply the man, but the popular sentiment which he represents—the determination to put a large part of the national resources, both mental, moral, and material, into preparations for war. He weighs on the budget with tremendous force, and in fact makes it unmanageable. It is the budget which has driven the Goblet Ministry from office, and no one is willing to succeed him, and take it up, as long as Boulanger is securely ensconced in it. All the cool heads in the Chambers, known under the general name of "Opportunists," or rational politicians, as we should call them, see this clearly, but there is not one of them, probably, who is willing to assume the task of forming a Cabinet with Boulanger a necessary member of it; and yet that Boulanger should be a necessary member of every Cabinet is apparently what popular sentiment demands.

This is now the situation, but it can hardly be called immediately alarming. To provoke a German irruption, in the present condition of the army and the finances, would be a calamity so awful that every man in France over forty probably shudders at the thought of it, and the country is still governed by men over forty. For a similar reason it seems very unlikely that Bismarck will take offence at the carrying out of the plan of mobilizing a corps d'armée. Not only would it cost over a million dollars in hard cash, besides causing an immense derangement of industry, but probably nobody knows better than Bismarck that it would reveal defects in the French organization which it would take years to cure. On the matter of military preparation no people is so liable to fall into immense delusions as the French. They have never yet, except under the first Empire, begun a great war in a state of complete readiness, and never began one without supposing that their readiness was complete. It has been well said that they are a warlike and not a military nation. The very ardor which carries them readily to the battle-field makes them shrink from the indomitable pains-taking in details which, on the part of the Germans, enabled Moltke, as the story goes, when the news of the declaration of war was brought to him on the night of the 15th of July, 1870 and found him fast asleep, to turn over and go to sleep again after telling the messenger that the proper portfolio "was in the second drawer on the left." Even if the story be not true, it is emblematic of the infinite labor with which the Germans prepare to fight.

HOME RULE AND ENGLISH JOURNALISM.

ONE of the interesting but in many ways deplorable results of the bitter political contest now raging in England, is the disappearance of what may be called the independent press, the two foremost representatives of which were the Spectator and the Economist. There has probably been no foreign or remote observer of British politics who has not, during the past forty years, been placed under deep obligations to both of these journals for the extent to which they furnished him with cool and impartial judgments of men and things, even at, or perhaps we should rather say, especially at, times of great party excitement. We doubt, indeed, whether any financial journal has ever played the part which all financial journals ought to play in politics—that of a perfectly disinterested looker-on—so faithfully as the Economist in Mr. Bagehot's day. Political criticism reached in its columns, when he was its editor and principal writer, a point of excellence to which perhaps no other periodical has ever attained. He saw with remarkable clearness that not only must a financial journal bring judicial-mindedness to the discussion of purely financial questions, but to the discussion of all questions. Nobody ever long relies, in pecuniary matters, on an adviser who takes passionate views of financial enterprises, or allows his forecast as to the results to be colored by his likes or dislikes of persons engaged in them. Not only is this true, but it is also true that nobody relies long in pecuniary matters on an adviser whose judgment in any of the affairs of life is greatly clouded by his prejudices, or whose temperament drives him into hasty or ill considered action. In other words, to be listened to respectfully by people who have money to invest, or who are making plans for the remote future, a man must be habitually cool, and cultivate what we may call the scientific way of looking at human activities of all kinds.

In Mr. Bagehot's day the Economist played this part in an eminent degree. He brought to the analysis of the political phenomena of the day precisely the same sort of acumen which he brought to the analysis of the last bank report or a new funding bill. Reading his articles was very like having a private and confidential talk with a shrewd and experienced man of the world, who had special means of information, but was perfectly indifferent to the bearings of the phenomena which he explained for your benefit. In fact, he brought to modern politics the same spirit of disinterested inquiry and minute observation which he brought to the examination of the history of national growth in his remarkable book on 'Physics and Politics.' He knew that his influence in the commercial world was dependent on his constantly cultivating in all things a spirit of philosophical detachment; that it would not do for him to rail about Disraeli, or grow enthusiastic over John Bright, if he wished to be listened to with respect about the bank rate or the trustworthiness of a foreign loan.

The London Spectator never could boast the judicial temper of the Economist, but it placed its readers under somewhat similar obligations by its steady application of moral standards to politics, and its constant habit of examining both political men and measures from the moral point of view. Its love of analysis, the manifestations of which in some fields—that of theology, for instance—were excessive, always found instructive and interesting expression in its treatment of politicians and pending questions of legislation. One might not agree with it; one might often grow wearied of its sublety or over-refinement, and often accuse it of fancifulness, and of too much prophetic spirit, and too great eagerness for signs and wonders; but its columns were always edifying to any one who was watching English politics simply as an observer, for the simple reason that he might always feel sure that the editor did not hold a party brief, and was not bound to extenuate or defend anything for party reasons, or to consider the effects of his utterances on party fortunes, and that he was treating every public man on his merits without regard to his political antecedents or surroundings.

We are sorry to say that the home-rule discussion has changed all this. There are no more violent party papers in England to-day than the Economist and Spectator. We do not mean by this simply that they argue against home rule, and are deeply impressed by its inconveniences or dangers. We mean that they attack it in precisely the same spirit and with the same weapons as the Times or the Standard, and are as worthless to a disinterested observer desirous of seeing the situation exactly as it is. For instance, there is nothing so tiresome and often disgusting, as all American newspaper readers know, as the way party journals have of dividing the voting population into two groups, one composed of ignorant and reckless people, blinded by their passions and hostile to, or careless about, property or order; the other composed of sober, thoughtful, industrious, patriotic, and God-fearing people, whose supremacy in national affairs is necessary, not only to peace and security, but to the very preservation of the social fabric. The division of the leading politicians is of somewhat the same sort. On one side are a band composed of reckless demagogues, without conscience or honor, seeking the ruin of their country for purely personal profit, through falsehood and perversion, and utterly indifferent to the consequences of their policy as long as it keeps them in power or enables them to win it; on the other, a band composed of calm, wise, moderate men, speaking and acting in politics with a single eye to the national prosperity and glory, eschewing all sophistry or misrepresentation, and constantly uttering pregnant truths, without caring for the effect on their own personal or political fortunes.

In England there has hitherto been less of this sort of classification than here, owing to the transfers of power from one party to another, which take place more frequently under the Parliamentary system than under ours. Every Englishman who has reached the age of forty has seen probably two or three of these transfers, so that it is impossible for the party press or orators to work him into that state of fear and suspicion about his political opponents in which Republicans, for instance, lived with regard to the Democrats during the twenty years before 1884. Nobody has hitherto been able to persuade the Liberals that if Salisbury came into power he would probably betray the Government to its enemies, and plunder the Treasury; or persuade the Tories that Gladstone would surely propose an equal division of goods and knock down the price of all securities 50 per cent. But just now the Economist and Spectator even, to say nothing of the rest of the Conservative press, talk in this to us very familiar strain. The Economist has got so hot in its fury against the Irish that it actually commends military courts-martial as the best tribunals for the punishment of crime—military officers, it says, making excellent jurors—and objectionable only on account of the prejudice against them among philanthropists and Americans. Chamberlain, who was its bête noire two years ago, when he was denouncing inequality of taxation, is now its model statesman.

But the Spectator far outdoes the Economist, as might have been expected, in the fervor with which it surrenders its soul to Liberal Unionism. It is impossible to read without a smile its accounts of the way in which not only common sense and common honesty, but mental capacity, has deserted that immense body of the British people who follow Mr. Gladstone. Not only are the Irish representatives all thoroughly dishonest and unscrupulous, and elected by 4,000,000 of rogues and assassins—this was to have been expected—but the Gladstonian leaders have become ignorant, absurd, sophistical, and stupid. Gladstone, John Morley, Harcourt, Bryce, Rosebery, Childers, Russell, and Trevelyan now never open their mouths without falling into obvious blunders or misrepresentations or fallacies. Eloquence and knowledge have both deserted them. They have lost either the desire or capacity to present any question in a right light. Not only are they wrong occasionally, in the old human way, but they are always wrong, in the diabolical way. On the other hand, Salisbury, Chamberlain, Hartington, Selborne, James, Holland, Goschen, nay, even Smith, Balfour, and Churchill, never speak without hitting the nail on the head. Their reasoning is always perfect; their illustrations apt; their forecasts timely and correct. In fact, the state of mind just now of the quondam independent journalist in England is enough to give a pessimist an illustration in which he would delight, of the flimsiness of the human mind and the weakness of the human character.

THE MARRIAGE OF LOUIS XV.

PARIS, May 7, 1887.

THE marriage of Louis XV. and a Polish Princess, Marie Leczinska, is one of the most romantic incidents of French history in the eighteenth century. M. Paul de Raynal, a French magistrate, has lately studied the circumstances which brought about this extraordinary union between the sovereign of the most powerful country of Europe and a poor and exiled Princess. I knew, in my youth, a gentleman who was old enough to remember Louis XV. He spoke almost with emotion of the fascination which was exercised by this sovereign in his youth. Louis XV. was like a prince of fairy land. He was as handsome as the day, to use a familiar expression of our ancestors; his manners were charming; he had been brought up with the greatest care. He had been promised, since his earliest infancy, to the daughter of the Duke of Anjou, the Infanta of Spain. Why was the Infanta suddenly dismissed, and why did the young King marry the daughter of a Polish nobleman, who had been kept on the throne of Poland for a few years by the protection of Charles XII. of Sweden, and who afterwards had become an exile and a pensioner of the French Government?

When Louis XIV. died, the Duke of Orleans was proclaimed Regent of the kingdom, and assumed an almost absolute power. He asked in 1721 the hand of the Infanta, Anna Maria Victoria, who was then three years old, for the young King of France. Philip V. gave his consent at once. The Regent obtained at the same time the hand of the Prince of the Asturias for his own daughter, Mlle. de Montpensier. Louis XV. was then eleven years old, and entirely under the influence of his preceptor, Fleury, Bishop of Fréjus. When the matter was brought before the Council of the Regency, Saint-Simon tells us that the eyes of the King were red, but that he said "Yes" in a low voice when he was asked to give his consent to the marriage, which was in consequence declared.

Saint-Simon was sent as Ambassador to Spain, and he gives in his memoirs full details of his mission. He paints with his usual vigor Philip V., who had become so different from the handsome Duke of Anjou; the Queen, who was his second wife, who had exiled the Princesse des Ursins, and completely enslaved the King and condemned him to a solitary and monotonous life. The Infanta was exchanged at the frontier for Mlle. de Montpensier; one of them was intended to wear the crown of France, the other the crown of Spain. The exchange took place on January 9, 1722, on the Bidassoa River. Soon afterwards the marriage of Mlle. de Montpensier was solemnized in Madrid. The Infanta, a mere child, was brought to Paris, and, on her arrival, Louis XV. gave her a doll worth 18,000 livres. "Tout le monde," says Barbier in his Journal, "trouve le mariage original." The King lived at the Tuileries; the Infanta was lodged at the Louvre. When Louis XV. attained his majority, he was left almost immediately without a guide, though he was only entering his fourteenth year. Cardinal Dubois died suddenly, and the Duke of Orleans was struck by apoplexy on the 2d of September, 1723, at the age of forty-nine years.

The Duke of Bourbon, the first Prince of the House of Condé, took the office of Prime Minister, as Fleury, who was the real master of the mind of Louis XV., did not yet dare to take it for himself. Monsieur le Duc, as he was called, was only thirty-one years old. He had lost an eye, and his contemporaries called him the sinistre or the borgne. He lived at Chantilly in great style. He had lost his wife, and was entirely under the sway of the celebrated Marquise de Prie. Mme. de Prie was the daughter of a wealthy contractor for the army; she was handsome, witty, ambitious, and affected an infidelity which was then the fashion with some members of the aristocracy. She was the declared mistress of the Duke of Bourbon.

The Ambassador appointed to Spain by the Duke of Bourbon was the Comte de Tessé, who was Marshal of France. Tessé had served with great distinction in the French armies, and had already filled many diplomatic missions. He accepted his new post notwithstanding his old age, and he was on his way to Spain when the news arrived of the sudden abdication of King Philip. The Prince of the Asturias was proclaimed King under the name of Louis I., and it was known that all his friends were enemies of the French alliance and partisans of the alliance with Austria. Louis did not like his French wife, who, says M. de Tessé, in one of his despatches, "had learned many things at the Palais Royal which she had not forgotten in his palace." The union of Louis XV. and the Infanta had been solemnly promised, but the Duke of Bourbon was very adverse to it. The Infanta was only six years old, and she could not become the wife of the King before the age of ten. The prolonged celibacy of Louis XV. was a danger for the succession and a danger for the King himself. Louis XV. took no pleasure in the Infanta; on the contrary, he could but feel for her a sort of aversion. If Louis XV. died without a son, the crown would pass to the Duke of Orleans, the son of the Regent, a virtuous prince who hardly concealed his contempt for M. le Duc and for Mme. de Prie.

Mme. de Prie kept her lover in a state of constant inquietude, and prepared him by degrees for a rupture with Spain and for the dismissal of the Infanta. It did not hinder her from asking for a grandesse for her husband and for her children; this request recurs often in the correspondence of Marshal de Tessé under the name of l'affaire des charbons. The Marshal does not seem to have been very anxious to procure this favor for Mme. de Prie. The King of Spain fell ill suddenly, and, at the age of seventeen years, died after a very short attack. The crown passed to the head of the second son of Philip V., the Infant Don Ferdinand, who was only eleven years old. The Duke of Bourbon was very much alarmed at the consequences of this change. It was clear that the young King would be completely in the hands of the grandees of Spain, that the kingdom would fall into complete anarchy. He wrote to Philip V., who was the only true friend of France in the peninsula, and begged him to come out of his retreat and assume the power himself. Philip consented, with some reluctance; and M. le Duc, confiding in his sentiments, in his love of quietness and peace, in his affection for his nephew, Louis XV., thought that he could now, without any danger of war, send the Infanta back to Spain and find another wife for the King of France. Mme. de Prie knew that she would never obtain the grandesse from the pious and scrupulous old King of Spain; it was thought by her as well as by her lover that the time for action had come.

Secret councils were held at the Duke of Bourbon's a few weeks after the death of the young King of Spain. They were composed of M. de Fréjus, of Marshals Villars and Uxelles, of the Comte de la Marck, the Comte de Morville, and M. Pecquet. The Duke of Bourbon explained the reasons for a prompt marriage of Louis XV. with another Princess than the Infanta, and the reasons that would prevent Philip V. from declaring war on France. M. de Morville is said to have exclaimed: "Certainly, the Infanta must be dismissed, and par le coche, so that it may be done sooner." The question at once arose, What Princess would be chosen in place of the Infanta? Seventeen names were pronounced in a special report made by Morville, among the others, "Marie, daughter of King Stanislas Leczinski of Poland, aged twenty-one." There were objections to all the names: some were promised, some were ill, some were of another religion. The Duke of Bourbon, however, gave his preference to Princess Anna, the eldest daughter of the Prince of Wales, and asked the French Ambassador to inquire of the Ministers of George I. if they would give her to the King of France, on condition that she should become a Catholic.

Time pressed; at the age of seven, the Infanta was to be solemnly affianced to the King of France. The Spanish Minister in Paris had no suspicion of any change in the intentions of the French court. Marshal Tessé was suddenly recalled and replaced by the Abbé de Livry, chargé d'affaires in Portugal. Louis XV. was made to write a letter to the Pope announcing that he could not marry the Infanta, and begging him to soothe the irritation of Philip V. Livry had to deliver at the same time a letter to the King of Spain announcing the change. Philip V., who had been previously made aware of its contents, refused to receive it; he showed calmness and dignity, but his wife, Elizabeth, was furious, as were all the Spaniards. The Abbé de Livry was ordered to leave the Spanish territory, and Mlle. de Beaujolais, who had been promised to Don Carlos, was sent back to France.

Mme. de Prie did not much approve of a marriage with an English or a Russian princess; she wished for some modest, poor, plain princess, whom gratitude would always tie to her. She found all she desired in the Polish Princess, who had neither wealth, nor pride, nor fortune. She espoused her cause with much warmth, and what she desired was soon after the wish of the Duke of Bourbon. She was helped by the English Government. The proposal which had been made by the Comte de Broglie for the young English Princess had been thought very flattering; the Count had shown the King a picture of Louis XV., who was at that time most beautiful. The religion, however, had been thought an insurmountable difficulty, and a negative answer was finally returned.

The disappointment of the Duke of Bourbon was great. He thought for a moment of one of his sisters, Mlle. de Vermandois, who had been brought up in the Convent of Fontevrault and wished to become a nun. President Hénault and some other writers of the time say that Mme. de Prie went to Fontevrault under an assumed name, and saw Mlle. de Vermandois. She spoke to her of her brother and mentioned Mme. de Prie. At the mention of this name, Mlle. de Vermandois interrupted her with vehemence, and manifested the greatest contempt for the person who had enslaved her brother. Mme. de Prie changed the conversation; her mind was made up—it was not for her to put the crown of France on the head of Mlle. de Vermandois.

From that moment the Polish Princess became the most eligible candidate. The humility of her position was an advantage, as it tended to soothe the irritation of Philip and of the Spaniards; the Infanta was not sacrificed to a great princess or to a powerful country. The marriage ceased to be a political affair. The offer was made, but not before Louis XV. had seen a portrait of the young Marie. She was not handsome, but she was agreeable and had a very pleasing countenance. Marie Leczinska was six years older than the King, but every objection was put aside. It is easy to judge of the emotion of the poor exiled King of Poland when he was informed of the project of the King of France; after having received the letter of Louis XV. at Wissembourg in Alsace, he entered the room where his daughter was sitting with her mother:

"My daughter," said he, "let us kneel and thank God." "My father, are you recalled to the throne of Poland?" "No, my daughter, God is more merciful—you are Queen of France."

The marriage was for a long time a happy one. The Queen had a very amiable disposition. When she made her presents to her ladies she said modestly: "This is the first time in my life I have been able to make presents." She did not, however, accept the tyrannical friendship of Mme. de Prie. Fleury, the Bishop of Fréjus, found in her an ally, and she became an unconscious instrument in the disgrace of the Duke of Bourbon. The victory of Fleury became complete. The Duke was dismissed from the Council, and Mme. de Prie was exiled to one of her estates. She fell into a state of despair, and the memoirs of the Marquis d'Argenson tell us that she lost her beauty, and that in 1727 she poisoned herself.

By a strange concatenation of circumstances, which completes the romance of the life of Marie Leczinska, this Princess, who was so poor that her father, when the offer of the King of France was made to him, had just pawned her jewelry, had, in fact, brought to France a magnificent dower: her marriage had for one of its consequences the reunion of Lorraine to the kingdom.

WESTERN MORTGAGES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Allow me a reply to "L." Western development has always been the profitable opportunity of Eastern capital. The older always lend to the younger States. Europe did it fifty years ago; now we do it from our own profits in Western growth and trade. Western mortgages are no experiment. System and experience have simplified the matter in both convenience and safety for the investor. The incident of loss by foreclosure has actually been eliminated. While foreclosure itself has been reduced to a fraction of 1 per cent., the profit of foreclosure is absolutely assured. A Western corporation of tried, prudent, and wealthy men, who themselves supervise the loans, and examine titles and values, and select their mortgages, can and does actually produce the choicest 6 per cent. security which the experience of insurance companies, savings banks, and private investors has been able to find during the past fifteen years. Of this there is ample evidence in the reports. We cite one—the Bank Commissioners of New Hampshire, 1886, page 419. There was no foreclosure in Western loans; all foreclosure was in Eastern mortgages.—Yours, H. W. Hall.

THE BEVERLY INCIDENT.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: That the "Beverly Incident" should be of sufficient importance to deserve an editorial certainly makes it worth while to correct, from the record, certain unintentional misstatements of fact which have found place in your article:

(1.) The move for separation is not an outgrowth of the summer population. In the Boston Globe of May 19 you will find the testimony of old inhabitants of the Farms who have been familiar with the plan for separation for more than twenty-five years.

(2.) It is not a tax-dodging move. The Farms are to take one-half of the town debt. The interest on this, the payment to the common sinking fund, and the Farms' share of other common fixed charges, make a rate of 8.95 on a thousand, upon the valuation of the Farms for 1886, or 14.89 on a thousand, upon the valuation for 1885. Adding the lowest possible tax for the expenses of the Farms themselves, the rate could not be less than $13 on the valuation of 1886, or $21 on the valuation of 1885. The heavy valuation of 1886 (said to be by way of punishment for the attempt to separate) was one of the chief grounds of complaint made by the Farms at the hearing this year. There is no hope of a tax rate below $15 at the Farms for many years to come. The rate in Boston last year was $12 70.

(3.) It is not true that the question was tried last year "on its merits" and this year not on its merits. Precisely the contrary is true. Last year there was so little interest taken that it was impossible to induce the Legislature to go t Beverly and see for themselves. This year nearly all the members of both houses, in bodies of thirty or less, went to old Beverly and to the Farms, and examined the ground and the people in the presence of representatives of both sides.

(4.) There was no material difference in the amount of money raised and spent by the Farms people last year and this. This year it was $18,000, last year it was $14,500.

(5.) In both years money was raised and lobbies were employed by both parties alike, and both parties used precisely the same methods. This is stated in as many words in the findings of the committee in their report.

(6.) Substantially the same counsel acted for the parties on both sides in both years.

While agreeing with you in your comment on the use of lobbyists, it must be borne in mind that the chief fault lies with the legislators themselves. If each member would kick a lobbyist instead of listening to him, the lobby would melt away in a week.—Very truly, Observer.

ANOTHER VIEW OF ALFRED STEVENS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your critic (Nation, No. 1142) handles M. Alfred Stevens's 'Impressions on Paintng' without gloves. I have not read the book and do not care to defend it—certainly the extracts your critic gives are not profound; but when he speaks of Stevens the painter with such contempt as "a painter of millinery and stuffs and fashion-plates," and as "a painter for the nouveaux riches," I feel impelled to protest.

I think I speak for the whole body of painters—certainly for all the painters I know—in saying that we find M. Stevens a painter for painters as well as for the nouveaux riches. I know many painters of the highest aims and of high achievement, and I know none of them that would deny to M. Stevens an exceedingly high rank in his profession, or that has not the heartiest admiration for his work. Would this be so if the work were as "vicious," as "shallow," and as "meretricious" as your critic thinks it? When painters of the most varied aims and methods agree in admiration of a brother painter's work, is it not safe to assume that there is something admirable in it?

M. Stevens is a born painter, of marvellous gifts. He has doubtless done much work which is unworthy of him, but it is not by that that he must be judged. His best work is marked by exquisite harmony of color, by an astonishing power of rendition, and by a mondaine grace and charm in his female figures not at all dependent on the "millinery" which they wear. M. Stevens chooses to paint well-dressed ladies presumably because he likes well-dressed ladies better than peasant women, and because the "stuffs" they wear give him the material for his delightful color-schemes; but ladies are human beings, and a man may paint them without making "fashion plates." I think even Titian had a fancy for painting ladies now and then, and dressed in the height of the fashion, too.

THE CRANSTON ARMS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: My attention has been called to a review of 'America Heraldica' in the Nation of May 5. I quite agree with the writer of the article in his estimate of the value of coats-of-arms in this country, but as the assertion of a right to their use involves a question of honesty, will you kindly permit me to give, in as few words as possible, the authority for the use of the Cranston arms, even though there "be wrong somewhere" in the Cranston pedigree?

The authority, both for the pedigree and arms, is a certificate given to Samuel Cranston, Governor of Rhode Island, under date of June 29, 1724, by Sir Alex. Areskine, Lyon King of Arms, Edinburgh. A second application was made to the Lyon office in 1881 with special reference to an error in the pedigree. The reply, signed Geo. Burnett, Lyon, states that "as regards the arms in question, it [the certificate of Sir A. Areskine] is absolutely authoritative, and not to be gainsaid by the dicta of Peerage or other works"; and he goes on to say: "There was a period in the first half of last century when the pedigrees, as detailed in the armorial certificates granted from the Lyon office, were not so carefully got up, or so absolutely free from error, as at other times." A little investigation has led me to conclude that the error in question was caused by a mistake of similar names in two branches of the same family.—Respectfully,

G. E. C.

[In regard to the Cranston case, the only information open to the public was the epitaph printed in the Heraldic Journal, page 59. It seems that at Newport, R. I., is a stone, inscribed as follows, over the grave of Gov. Samuel Cranston, who died in 1727: "He was son of Gov. John C., grandson of Rev. James C., chaplain to King Charles I., who was son of John C. of Pool, who was son of James, son of William, Lord Cranston." This is the most favorable view to take of the inscription as to generations. William, first Lord Cranston, died in 1627. By this pedigree, Gov. John C., who was born in 1626, was great-great-grandson of this lord, and yet born in his life-time. If not impossible, it was at least almost incredible. Now, Mr. G. E. Cranston gives us the authority of the present Lyon King at Arms, as endorsing the arms, though the pedigree is wrong somewhere. Our complaint against Mr. Vermont's plan was, that he puts this coat among well-authenticated examples without giving any authority, and very possibly without being acquainted with the private letter cited by "G. E. C." Until that letter is printed, no critic can be blamed for pointing out the very unsatisfactory state of the matter as it stands in the Heraldic Journal.—Ed. Nation.]

"IS BEING BUILT," ETC.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: On this form of expression a reviewer remarks, in your issue for March 17: "Dr. Hall gives it a respectable age: he has found it as early as 1769. A look for it in [Mr. T. L. Kington] Oliphant shows examples in 1447-48." If the reviewer had turned to Mr. Oliphant's alleged authority, he would have seen something noticeably different there.

Naming Shillingford's 'Letters,' Mr. Oliphant writes, in i, 273: "In p. 92 there is a startling change of idiom, which did not become common until 300 years later; being is prefixed to a past participle; wyn is being y put to sale; this idiom is repeated in p. 100."

Now, in Shillingford, pp. 91, 92, there occurs: "Wyn by his officers ofte tymes being ther y put to sale," etc. And at p. 100: "And so thei, being seised of the saide nywe tenements, made oute," etc. The interpolation by which Mr. Oliphant alters the first quotation to what he wishes it to be is not "startling" to any one who has scrutinized the peculiarities of his doings as a philologist. That here and elsewhere I am not unduly severe will probably be acknowledged by those who read to the end of this letter.

Referring to my quotations for "is . . . being acted," etc., Mr. Oliphant says of me, in ii, 188: "He seems unaware of the fact that the idiom was anything but new; see my book, i, 273; ii, 58."

It is obvious to ask why he did not cite something of the second passage from Shillingford, as he cited something of the first. Did his evil courage fail him, after scheming so as to foist in "is" once? Be this how it may, it is bad enough that, even on a single occasion, he has distinctly sophisticated an old text, apparently in order to make a point against me.

Again, he delivers himself very uncritically as regards the idiom under consideration: "Being is prefixed to a past participle." This is his definition of it; and it thus seems to be indifferent to him whether being built, for example, is preceded or is not preceded by is, was, or the like. Of phrases like those which, as given above, are met with in Shillingford, I do not claim to know the antiquity; but it has not been proved that they had not been long established before developments corresponding to Mr. Oliphant's spurious "wyn is being y put to sale" became at all current.

The expression "was being seducyd" is, perhaps, found in a translation, published in 1844, which is said to have been executed late in the reign of Henry VIII. If at any time I have an opportunity of consulting the manuscript of that translation, I shall return to the expression.

A letter written in the first quarter of the seventeenth century contains the locution, "Italy is being held dangerous," if we may believe Mr. Oliphant, who, building on his adulteration already spoken of, styles it "an idiom of the fifteenth century." Of what there really is in that letter I have, at present, no reasonable assurance.

Among the quotations connected with the construction before us which Dr. Murray gives in his Dictionary—all of which I had given previously—the first, as I have lately ascertained, should be dated 1572, not 1596; the second edition of the translation of Lavater, used by me, having nothing in it from which one would infer that it was not the first edition.

Further, since Dr. Murray treats only the quotations beginning with that of 1795 as unexceptionally exemplifying that construction, it is interesting to be able to adduce a similar one, which I have very recently chanced on, earlier by three years. William Roberts, in No. 26 of the Looker-on, published November 3, 1792, has the words, "while the Looker-on was being read."

Let me now touch briefly on the manner in which Mr. Oliphant has noticed the examination of his 'Sources of Standard English,' contributed by me to the North American Review for October, 1874. In the preface to his 'Old and Middle English' he says that he "cannot understand why an author need whimper under the rod of reviewers." Whimpering is unmanly enough, doubtless; but he has done much worse than whimper. Others may decide whether I am wrong in imputing to him, with respect to me, fictitious representations and breaches of veracity in the passages, taken from his work last mentioned, which I shall now produce and annotate. Very significantly, neither am I named by him, nor is any of my writings indicated, in connection with those passages. Clue there is therefore none, of his furnishing, for testing the fidelity with which he exhibits the matters that he animadverts on. As in every case here brought forward he has strayed into the region of downright fable, his rule regarding me is determined by the solitary instance where, exceptionally, he has satisfied himself with gratuitous carping only; for there he discloses my personality. This is at page 52.

I once spoke of "helpless slaves of what a metaphysician might call the sequacious diathesis" (see my 'English Adjectives in -able,' etc., p. 173). Just before thus expressing myself, I had come upon two pompous old acquaintances, "sequacious" and "diathesis," in the pages of the Saturday Review, Mr. Oliphant's ardent panegyrist; and these I jocularly fancied brought together, introducing them, as is seen, much as one would introduce a quotation. It was my imaginary metaphysician that married the formidable couple.

Adverting to my palpable jest, Mr. Oliphant informs us in his preface: "I have let off no fireworks like 'Asyndetic Coördination' or 'Sequacious Diathesis.'" But he could not rest there. On page 84 he classes me among "professors of fine writing"; and he likewise describes me as "one of them, who writes about sequacious diathesis." He knows full well that his gibe would have lacked all color of justification, and would never have been ventured, if he had been ingenuous enough to transcribe my context. For when and where did I ever profess to uphold "fine writing," or to do anything for which I should be ranked with "professors" of it? The English which I advocate for general use is precisely such as the common sense and the needs of our age account expedient, and not the piebald, jejune, vague, nerveless, and affected jargon which he champions; and of this he is perfectly sensible.

The remark of mine, "lesser enjoys his sanction," certainly affords no evidence of passion; and yet, crookedly avoiding citation of the remark, he does not shrink from saying, at page 268, "One critic was very angry with me for using this classic Old English form." The ineptitude of this falsehood does not require to be dwelt on.

Once more he writes, at p. 220: "One critic is much disgusted at my using overlord; in this I simply follow my betters. He would probably prefer superior dominator, or hyper-despot. He stands up for sociology as a neat compound; so he would, of all things, I suppose, prefer hyper-dominator."

Let us now look at the facts. Constructing a sentence "made up entirely of his own pet archaisms," as I accurately characterized it, I embodied in it the word "overlord"; and there an end. To assert that I was "much disgusted" at his using it is pure invention. As to "sociology," I merely asked, "who would prefer a circumlocution" to it? Shortly before I had observed that, "as to real verbal hybrids," such as "mineralogy," "terminology," "murderous," and "righteous," "we readily learn to tolerate them, if handy"; this observation following a comment on Mr. Oliphant, who had discovered, in "the wondrous word penology," a mixture of "Latin with Greek."

There is no ground, then, for taxing me with holding "sociology" to be "a neat compound." I applied no epithet to it, laudatory or otherwise. Moreover, where Mr. Oliphant says that I "would, probably, prefer" one thing, and, as he supposes, "would, of all things, prefer" another, since he supposes nothing of the kind, he consciously deviates from the truth, and that from sinister motives, indubitably. A wholesale and unscrupulous pseudologist, forsooth, is my Oxford-bred critic, if I may use a compound which, besides being strictly descriptive of him, one cannot deny to be sufficiently "neat."

For what I say touching "penology," "sociology," "lesser," etc., see the North American Review, as above, pages 317, 318, 325. In spite of my corrections, by the by, we read, in Mr. Oliphant's last work, 'New English,' ii, 217: "In a letter on prison discipline, printed in the Times of September 5, 1872, we find the wondrous word penology; the writer compounds Latin with Greek, and knows not how to spell the Latin he has compounded." Accordingly, idle as it is to gainsay the position, Mr. Oliphant is still unconvinced that, as of horology, so of penology, both the elements are Greek; and, in all consistency, he ought to deem it unscholarly to put penal instead of pœnal.

Here I drop my frontless defamer for the present. That I have vindicated myself against him in the Nation has its explanation in the fact that, in the country where I am writing, no journal, I believe, would permit the malpractices of an Englishman to be exposed in its columns by an American. Such, as long experience has instructed me, is British comity.—Your obedient servant,

FITZEDWARD HALL.

MARLESFORD, ENGLAND, May 14, 1887.

THE SENATORIAL SITUATION IN WEST VIRGINIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The two branches of the West Virginia Legislature having met in joint assembly, and having cast a majority of their votes for Charles James Faulkner, it now remains for the United States Senate to determine whether he, or the Governor's appointee, Daniel B. Lucas, will be seated. The construction which is placed by that body upon the clause of the United States Constitution which declares in mandatory terms that "the Executive may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies" (art. i., sec. 3), must decide the point at issue. This would be conclusive in favor of Mr. Faulkner's claim, were it not for that provision of the Constitution of West Virginia which provides as follows: "The Governor may, on extraordinary occasions, convene at his own instance the Legislature; but when so convened it shall enter upon no business except that stated in the proclamation by which it was called together" (art. vii., sec. 7), from consideration of which it appears that in no just and proper sense of the term has the Legislature yet convened. Beyond the expressly and specifically enumerated purposes for which the Governor called together in extraordinary session the component members of the Legislature of West Virginia, of which the election of a Senator was not one, there has been no "next meeting" of the Legislature; and the result of their balloting for Senator is as absolutely null and void of force and effect as it was violative of their oaths to support the United States Constitution, and defiant of the organic law of their own State. Suppose, on the day following the expiration by constitutional limitation of the last regular session, the members of that about-to-become historic body had met in joint assembly and chosen a Senator, without awaiting the call of the Governor, merely dispensing with that purely formal ceremony; does any one claim that their action would have been valid, or entitled to the respect of the Senate? Yet, would any greater violence have been done the State Constitution than it suffered in the attempted election of Judge Faulkner? On the other hand, as far as the transaction of any other business than that stated in Gov. Wilson's proclamation is concerned, would it not have been as truly and as validly constituted a meeting of the Legislature within the meaning of the United States Constitution? Wherein consists the difference so far forth as relates to the election of a Senator? In other words, if the last-mentioned instrument, as "the supreme law of the land," can and does so override the Constitution in that particular which shears the Legislature of all power except within the express terms of the grant of the Executive, can any reason be given why it should not wholly dispense with the necessity for the Governor's proclamation, and validate any action of the assembled members which resulted in the expression of a choice of a Senator, though such meeting were wholly fortuitous? These facts, considered in the light of that broad principle of law and common sense which declares that two instruments, or two statutes, or two clauses of the same instrument, shall be so construed as to give effect, if possible, to both, offer an easy solution of the question by which the sanctity of the United States Constitution may be preserved inviolate, not having its revered provisions distorted and stretched to cover cases it was never intended to embrace, and the Constitution of West Virginia escape desecration by her own sons. D. L. B.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 18, 1887.

SOMETHING NEW ON METEMPSYCHOSIS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the New York Independent for April 28 Mr. Henry F. Reddall discourses concerning "Unnatural Natural History," and exposes several popular and, we trust, also, unpopular fallacies. Speaking of the impression which some have, that pelicans feed their young from flesh of the mother's breast, Mr. Reddall says:

"The fact that the pelican is provided with a large bag under her neck, into which she thrusts her finny prey, and, digging therein with her gory beak, feeds her young and dabbles her plumage with bloody fragments of fish, has given rise to the mistake concerning her habits."

With such a caption as "Unnatural Natural History," it is impossible to criticise this item; but inasmuch as the ordinary pelican has the "large bag" upon the under mandible of her beak, and not upon her neck, might it not be that, in some occult manner, Mr. Reddall's pelican has received the soul of that amiable old gentleman in 'Oliver Twist' who was continually offering to eat his head, but was ever diverted by some passing thought from accomplishing his purpose? It seems reasonable.

CONWAY M. MILLAR.
MINNESOTA UNIVERSITY, MINNEAPOLIS.

Notes.

WE regret to learn that the three-volume 'Life of Darwin' by his son Francis will not be brought out this summer, but next autumn—doubtless a more favorable time for its proper consideration by a public now absorbed in the contest over Irish home rule.

Ticknor & Co. publish immediately 'The Sunny Side of Shadow; Reveries of a Convalescent,' by Mrs. S. G. W. Benjamin; 'Letters of Horatio Greenough to his Brother, Henry Greenough'; and 'The Nigritians' and 'The Melanesians' in Mr. A. Feathermann's laborious series called "The Social History of the Races of Mankind."

We learn from the last number of the Harvard University Bulletin that the Corporation have authorized the publication, through Charles Scribner's Sons, of a memorial edition of the late Prof. E. A. Sophocles's 'Greek Lexicon of the Roman and Byzantine Periods,' under the oversight of Prof. Joseph Henry Thayer. In this number of the Bulletin, by the way, is bound up a list of works on North American Fungi, published before 1887, by W. G. Farlow and Wm. Trelease. Works on Schizomycetes are intentionally omitted.

Lee & Shepard announce 'Life Notes; or, Fifty Years of Outlook,' by the Rev. William Hague, a prominent member of the Baptist denomination; and 'The Obelisk and its Voices,' by Gen. Henry B. Carrington, a poem inspired by the Washington Monument.

Judge Wilbur F. Bryant's 'The Blood of Abel,' which the author will publish at Lincoln, Nebraska, appears to be an apotheosis of Louis Riel, and a campaign document directed against President Cleveland, "whose judgment," the Judge says, "none of us would accept as to the value of forty acres of wild prairie land." This opens up a new vista of tests of Presidential candidates.

Subscriptions are solicited for 'New Papers on Canadian History, Art, Science, Literature, and Commerce,' gathered from those read before the Canadian Club of this city. The volume will be edited by G. M. Fairchild, jr., and illustrated by Thompson Willing, R. C. A. Profs. Goldwin Smith and Chas. G. D. Roberts, Principal Grant, and George Stewart, jr., are among the contributors. Mr. J. S. Ross, Canadian Club, No. 12 East Twenty-ninth Street, has the book in charge.

Maisonneuve ("Librairie Orientale et Américaine") has in press volume v. of the "Mémoires et documents pour servir à l'histoire des origines françaises des pays d'outre-mer," edited by M. P. Margry. The fifth volume of this collection has recently appeared. It has for a special title: 'Première formation d'une chaîne de postes entre le fleuve Saint-Laurent et le golfe du Mexique, 1685-1724.'

The publication of a valuable work for the study of French history and literature is announced. It is an 'Album paléographique,' a collection of important documents relating to the history and literature of France, reproduced in heliogravure from the originals in the national libraries and archives, with explanatory notices by the Société de l'École des Chartes; and an introduction of twelve pages by M. L. Delisle. It is a large folio, containing fifty plates of facsimiles. Three hundred and fifty copies have been printed at 150 francs each.

A great deal of enterprise has been shown by the West Publishing Company in completing what it calls the "National Reporter System," by which the legal profession is furnished weekly with "all the current decisions of the Federal Courts and the courts of last resort of all the States and Territories"; and also monthly with a Digest of all these cases. There are nine series of these Reporters, viz., two of the National Courts, the "Supreme Court" and the "Federal," and seven of the State and Territorial Courts, the Atlantic, Pacific, Northeastern, Northwestern, Southwestern, Southeastern, and Southern. The type is good. The chief drawback to these reports is the absence of a statement of the facts, or the slight statement of them. But, taken just as they are, the quick furnishing of them at a price under $50 a year for the whole of them, including the Digest, is an immense advantage to the lawyer. Indeed, by rendering easily accessible to judges and others these current decisions of all our American courts, it is probable that this enterprise will have a considerable influence in developing and unifying our law.

We have received a prospectus of the Modern Muse, "a quarterly review of poetry," to be launched at Buffalo in January next by C. W. Moulton & Co. Poetasters need not take heart; the scheme offers no place for "original verse." It involves the reprint of standard poems by living and dead poets, and selections from the current poetry of magazines on both sides of the water. Biography and critical and explanatory annotation will go hand in hand with bibliography and liberal indexing. "With number two will be published a bibliographical list of all the verse, English and American, issued in book form during 1887." Scrupulous editing is promised.

Another novelty in periodicals is the weekly Public Service Review, already in its third or fourth number (New York, Broadway and Thirty-third Street). Its range takes in the military and naval service, and the civil service of municipality, State, and nation. The backing of this enterprise is chiefly from the army, and one feature of the Review is a monthly showing of the stations of the land and naval forces of the United States.

The Illustrated News Company, of this city, is printing, "from duplicate plates, by special arrangements with the proprietors," the Illustrated London News and other foreign pictorials.

Notes and Queries for May 7 speaks of "George Eliot (née Mary Ann Cross)."

Some vigorous and intelligent art criticism is contributed to the May Portfolio (Macmillan) by Mr. F. G. Stephens, whose theme is William Mulready—a first paper. He strikes impartially in a sentence that will displease the English as much as the American public, when he classifies the existing "schools of artistic motives," naming the third "the sentimental school, as exhibited in the works of Ary Schefer [sic], certain Germans, and numerous Englishmen, who have affected the twaddle and whine of Longfellow and such-like falsities." But there is much to respect in his judgments, and on Mulready he is an authority. A clever etching after this artist's homely "Choosing the Wedding Gown" forms a frontispiece to the present number of the magazine. David Wilkie is the principal subject of Mr. Walter Armstrong's third illustrated paper on Scottish painters.

The Studio for May mingles with its independent criticism of the late exhibition at the National Academy of Design, and of George Fuller's work as a painter, six full-page photographic illustrations representing as many pictures of the Wolfe collection, now the property of the Metropolitan Museum. It announces for the July number a portrait of Mrs. Cleveland, etched by Paul Rajon, of which, as usual, proofs on Japanese paper will also be made, to the number of 500, for such as desire to procure them, and proofs on large paper.

The Pall Mall Gazette "Extra" No. 34 is an illustrated catalogue of "The Pictures of 1887" to be seen in London, as, at the Royal Academy, the Grosvenor Gallery, the two Water-Color Exhibitions, that of the British Artists, etc. In a certain number of cases the preliminary sketches are also reproduced, and now and again information is given as to engravings to be made after the paintings here sketched.

Mr. Christern sends us the illustrated catalogue of the Salon of 1887, in which we remark the increased number of memorandum sketches, owing to the greatly diminished scale admitted. There is the usual range of subjects—the thousand and one excuses for the nude; war scenes, but these equally distributed in time and not promotive of revanche; portraits in the greatest abundance, but few striking—one, Boulanger on horseback, besides a portrait bust in which the most is done for his common physiognomy; literary topics, like Musset's 'Namouna' at one extreme, and Renan's 'Abbesse de Jouarre' at the other; and such repulsive delineations as a clinic at the Salpêtrière, or cholera morbus. We notice the work of one American painter, "St. Genevieve," by C. S. Pearce, and there may be others. The English rendering of the titles exhibits its customary infelicities. Two snake-charmers, "Charmeuses," become "Bewitching Women," while "Une Charmeuse" is "A Charmeress." The types are responsible for "The Soul Deperling to Heavens."

The article of greatest popular interest in the last number of Petermann's Mitteilungen is on the Yakuts, by Prof. Ed. Petri, who controverts the assertions made by Vámbéry and others that this most northern representative of the Turcoman race is dying out, though he describes their condition as extremely wretched and a disgrace to the Russian Government, which has done little or nothing for them. He also vigorously defends them from the accusation of a lack of poetic feeling, and gives an interesting analysis of one of their popular tales, "The Bride-Quest [Brautfahrt] of Jurung-Uolans." It contains many religious and mythological allusions. Other articles are by J. Menges, on the caravan route between Suakin and Kassala; and by Dr. Th. Posewitz, on the island of Blitong.

The May Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society opens with a paper on the "Alpine Regions of Alaska," by Lieut. Seton-Karr, who dwells especially upon the admirable field for research into glacial action which Alaska presents. This is followed by an account of the explorations of Dr. Junker in the country to the west of the upper Nile, by Mr. J. T. Wills, who indicates to some extent the character of the country and the people through which the Emin Pasha Relief Expedition may pass.

The Scottish Geographical Magazine for May contains an article on the "Landslopes Separating Continents," with especial reference to the West African coast, by Mr. J. Y. Buchanan. Among other peculiarities of the ocean bed, he describes an immense submarine cañon extending from the mouth of the Congo some thirty-five miles into the ocean. Here it is six miles wide and 3,000 feet in depth below the surrounding ocean bed. Its origin he attributes, not to erosion, but to the upbuilding of its sides by the river silt. Mr. Carmichael contributes another article on the "Place-Names of Iona."

The extracts from the journal of Benjamin Constant, which have been the most attractive feature of the Revue Internationale during the first three months of the present year, are now brought to a close, but a new series, also from the family papers of his relatives, is offered to us in its pages. In the number for April 10 are the first eighteen of the "Letters of Benjamin Constant to his Family," which a note of the editors of the Revue informs us are published through the kindness of Mme. de Loys de Chandieu, and of her son, the Marquis de Chandieu, a descendant of one of Benjamin Constant's maternal aunts. The recipient of the greater part of the letters was another of the Chandieu sisters, the Countess of Nassau, to whom Constant wrote faithfully and untiringly until her death in 1814. All but three of the letters in the present number are addressed to her, most of them during the early months of the year 1794, the last two being written immediately after his arrival in Paris in May of that year. The first of the series is one to his aunt, Mme. de Loys, when he was between twelve and thirteen years old. It is one of the astonishingly precocious productions of the young Constant, who never appears older or more worldly than in his very youthful letters.

The Nouvelle Revue announces a new series of papers by the anonymous and composite personage who signs, with the name of Comte Paul Vasili, the gossiping and at times indiscreet revelations concerning society in the various European capitals which have appeared in the pages of the Revue during the past two years, under the titles "La Société de Londres—de Berlin—de Saint Pétersbourg," etc. The new series, to be called "La Société de Paris," will make several volumes when completed. The first of these is to be 'Le Grand Monde.' While 'La Société de Rome' was appearing, M. Henri des Houx was seriously suspected of at least furnishing materials for the ubiquitous Comte Paul Vasili, as other literary and political persons had been before suspected of doing for the preceding works of the series. The present opinion, however, seems to be that various persons supply the material, which some one, probably Mme. Adam (Juliette Lamber), works over into a systematic account.

The late O. H. Marshall's 'Historical Writings relating to the Early History of the West' (Albany, N. Y.: Joel Munsell's Sons) is a volume possessing great merit in its way. Marshall was a careful, industrious, and conscientious investigator; and though all his work was of a local and special nature, it is of very considerable value. His papers on the expedition of Denonville against the Senecas, and that of Champlain against the Onondagas, are favorable examples, as is also his account of the expedition of Céloron de Bienville down the Ohio. He generally combines a personal examination of localities with a close study of original documents, partly from originals in the Archives of Paris, which he visited a few years ago. He had a good knowledge of French and a well-grounded distrust of translations.

Had we any title to be counted among the "many friends" of Mrs. Amos R. Little, we fear we should not have joined in their urgent solicitation that she should describe her tour of the globe in 1883-4 in a quarto volume of 476 pages ('The World as We Saw It.' Boston: Cupples & Co.). However, let us be thankful for the handsome manner in which the volume is got up, and for the illustrations — some kind of phototype — which are excellent and unhackneyed. Persistent readers of books of travel will have little to learn from this lady's journals. Her route to the East was by way of New Zealand, Tasmania, Sydney, and Port Darwin. The great earthquake has, since Mrs. Little was in New Zealand, made havoc of the Hot Lake region and of the terraces that she visited. It is reported, however, that a new White Terrace has been discovered not far from those destroyed. It is not yet very large, nor has it the glittering fretwork and lovely coral-lipped basins that characterized the old terraces, but, as it is in process of formation, these will probably in time make their appearance.

A philological curiosity has been published in Russia for the use of Russians—a pocket glossary in 100 languages. Of these 70 are spoken in the Russian Empire itself, 10 in Central Asia, 10 in various Slavic States, and 10 in other European countries.

—The Atlantic for June contains two articles of special interest to students of the relation of political theories to history. Mr. A. L. Lowell traces the rise and transformations of the "Theory of the Social Compact" as the source of civil government. He finds it first in old ecclesiastical Hooker, and follows it through Hobbes, Locke, Rousseau, the Constitution of Massachusetts, and Kant, with brief abstracts of their doctrines and a strong grasp on the course of history. He shows that a different disposition of mind in the thinker and the particular set of political circumstances in his horizon made the theory a ready servant of absolutism, democracy, revolution, or transcendental ethics, as the case might be; and one ends the article with a very strong sense of how much easier it is for men of the best brain to decide rightly on the practical problem of their time than to give a reason for so doing that shall be of general application. In a day when knowledge is running so much into detail as now, such an article as this, with its broad views held simple and whole by means of strict definitions, and touching solidly whatever it touches at all, is a very notable paper. The second instance of the relation of political theory to history is given in Mr. John Fiske's discussion of the debate on the Executive Power in the Federal Convention. It is a commonplace that the mode of election of our President is not at all that contemplated by the Constitution. On the general question Mr. Fiske emphasizes the fact that Sherman made a suggestion which, if followed out, would have framed the Presidency on the modern ministerial idea instead of on the ancient monarchical idea; and he ascribes the error, as he thinks it, to the absence of definite political facts to govern and direct the argument, and to lack of an understanding of the ministerial development of the English Constitution, which had been obscured by the accident of George III.'s personal rule. He declares plainly against our system and in favor of the English. The executive might have been made, he says, "what it ought to be, the arm of the legislature, instead of a separate and coördinate power." He seems to hold the same view as to the judiciary, likewise; he accepts the popular will expressed by a parliament immediately responsible as the whole of authority. This has no more weight than a private view; but the history of the theory of the fathers about the executive, and the way events dealt with their schemes and arguments, make an instructive lesson in politics.

—In Harper's Bazar for May 7, "T. W. H." cites certain figures in support of his position that American literature is not only progressing, but is increasing in a ratio rivalling that of the material progress of the country. The Athenæum, in its issue of the same date, comments on the Bazar statement as follows: "The number of books copyrighted in the United States last year was 11,124 as against 2,076 in 1880. So says 'T. W. H.,' an accurate writer; but we should like to know whether the number for 1886 (more than twice that of English copyrights in the same year) is exclusive of works produced on this side of the Atlantic." The Athenæum's question is partly answered by the statement that every issue of the "Seaside" (and, we believe, other "libraries") claims copyright; but, aside from this, the assertions of "T. W. H." cannot be maintained. In the first place, the number of books copyrighted in 1880 was not 2,076, but 7,108; hence "the suddenness of expansion" which he mentions does not exist. Then, as regards his comparison of the two countries in respect to the number of copyrights, we should like to know where he got his English figures. So far as we know, the statistics of the British Copyright Office are not published, and we suspect that "T. W. H." used not these, but the figures of the compiler of the English Catalogue. But the figures of the Catalogue are not only exclusively of books, but of published books; those of our Copyright Office are of titles entered, which entry is often not followed by publication. Moreover, of the entries classified as "books," probably one-half are "books" only in a legal sense, being telegrams in newspapers, pamphlets descriptive of every variety of article in trade, from silverware to quack medicines, blank-books and forms in immense numbers, as well as "dime" and "half-dime" literature. We cannot claim accuracy on this point, but it is our belief that none of these would figure in the statistics, if accessible, of the British Copyright Office; they certainly do not figure in the English Catalogue.

—The article in the April number of the English Historical Review to which most readers will turn first is Mr. Gladstone's review of Greville's latest Journals, covering the years from 1852 to 1860. A survey of this period by Mr. Gladstone is a valuable contribution at first hand to our knowledge of history. The principal subject covered by this article is the Crimean War, with regard to which it expresses the judgment that it "will hold in history no dishonorable place." The reconstitution of Italy and the commercial treaty with France are also treated at considerable length. The opening article of the number is by Mr. Thomas Hodgkin, upon Visigothic Spain—a subject which he is especially qualified to treat. In the condition of Spain during this period, he says in conclusion, "we see not only the historical preparation for feudalism, but also its historical justification." Our countryman, Mr. Henry C. Lea, has an article on a subject peculiarly his own—"Confiscation for Heresy in the Middle Ages." There is sometimes a disposition, in writers of excessive liberality, to apologize for persecution on the ground of the sincerity and single-mindedness of the persecutors. Mr. Lea shows, however, by a cool analysis of events, that "of course it would be unjust to say that greed and thirst for plunder were the 'impelling motives of the Inquisition'; but we are perfectly safe in asserting that, but for the gains to be made out of fines and confiscations, its work would have been much less thorough, and that it would have sunk into comparative insignificance as soon as the first frantic zeal of bigotry had exhausted itself." The fourth article is by Mr. O'Connor Morris, upon Turenne. The Notes and Documents are of unusual interest, containing a very long examination of the Semiramis legend by Prof. Robertson Smith, and another, by D. G. Hogarth, upon the "Deification of Alexander the Great."

—Mr. A. H. Bullen has added to his edition of the old dramatists the works of John Marston, in three volumes (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.). In mechanical execution this edition is all that a standard work should be—convenient in size, beautifully printed, built to last, and at the same time inexpensive; but the editor does not show that improvement upon acquaintance which might be expected from a growing student. Mr

Bullen seems to be in haste. He has already edited many books, but he has not yet elaborated any thoroughly scholarly plan worthy of one ambitious to be a successor of Dyce. Misprints are common, and they are by no means all listed in the "errata," which unfailingly accompany his books. Other errors, rather to be classed as oversights than misprints, are frequently to be found, as, for instance, such persistent ascription of the speeches to a wrong character as occurs in "The Fawn,"i, 2, 70-81. The best of editors cannot avoid slight mistakes occasionally, but a large number of these indicate carelessness. The lack of system in the notes is a worse defect; sometimes they are unnecessarily full and sometimes they are altogether to seek. Cross-references, without further explanation, are excusable when made to the work itself, but to other books they should be made sparingly, in explaining words at least. The general impression one gets from Mr. Bullen's notes is that if anything occurred to him about the passage he put it in, and if nothing came to mind he said nothing; one perceives quite plainly limitations to his reading and to his memory. An unpleasant trait, as it seems to us, is the familiar and colloquial tone and extraneous matter that sometimes intrude upon the text, as when, in connection with an emendation in "The Insatiate Countess," he has to mention Mycerinus, and adds, "I saw his bones this afternoon at Bloomsbury!" Such remarks in books of this sort are impertinences. It may be excused to Dr. Furnivall that he lately incorporated his son's bicycle record as a part of the dedication of a Shakspere Quarto-Facsimile, but it is to be hoped that such personalities will not become an example to young editors. It must be added, too, that Mr. Bullen's notes are certainly exposed to the charge brought against Gibbon, of making learning a cover for grossness. A considerable acquaintance with Mr. Bullen's work has convinced us that his editing can be amended in carefulness, system, and taste; but his services are very considerable; he is conscientious in investigation, and his texts, in spite of blunders, are excellent. His faults are principally annoyances.

—In the present case we have an edition of Marston which brings within easy reach all the works with which, as playwright or satirist, his name was memorably connected; and of them "Eastward Ho," in which Jonson and Chapman coöperated, is one of the great comedies of London manners. "The Malcontent" is the play he himself lives by, and the farcical scenes of "The Dutch Courtesan" are good citizen-drama. For Marston's other work, excepting as a part of the history of our stage, we have but slight regard; it is not great, and one can say no more for it than that it is Elizabethan—it had a kind of greatness thrust upon it. It is usually foul and often brutal, and makes one feel the grossness of the audience. It plays, as is easily seen, better than it reads, and to us its most interesting trait is its contemporary echo of Shakspere, which is frequent, and is especially instructive as to the latter's popularity and literary influence. Marston seems to have been an embittered man, better than his fate, and he was a clever dramatist, having the stage and the audience in his eye, and ever alert for a good hard blow at an enemy, particularly Jonson; but the poetry was left out of him, and his intellectual parts were too exclusively satirical in their operation. The enthusiasm of an editor, especially of one who works in the dreary rhodomontade, crudity, and filth of the early drama, leads Mr. Bullen to overpraise; but when he attempts the critic, he is far less successful than when he keeps to his editorial task. Lamb's name has shielded a vast amount of nonsense about these minor dramatists, and Swinburne is making himself responsible for a good deal more; between the two, Mr. Bullen has fallen into bad judgment and an unreined style. It would not be the worst thing that could happen should Time grant nine-tenths of Marston's prayer, and give that proportion of his works to oblivion.

—Perhaps, after all, the disgraceful scenes which recently led to the withdrawal of "Lohengrin" at Paris after more than 200,000 francs had been subscribed for the first ten performances, will do more to insure a great future for Wagner's music in France than an uninterrupted series of performances would have done for the present. They have thoroughly disgusted all educated Parisians, and ranged them practically on the side of the Wagnerites against the Chauvinists. In 1861, after the failure of "Tannhäuser," Berlioz wrote to his son that "Wagner, on going out, was treated on the staircase like a scamp, an insolent fellow, an idiot. . . . The press is unanimous for his extermination." "This whole 'Tannhäuser' affair," writes M. Jullien, "from whatever point of view we regard it, is anything but honorable for us," and he mentions that only four of the critics—Baudelaire, Weber, D'Ortigue, and Franck-Marie—showed any sense of justice on that occasion. But in the "Lohengrin" affair all the respectable newspapers were on the side of Lamoureux, and resented the gutter censorship of the gamins in art matters. Several things have contributed to this change of attitude: Wagner's death, a spreading knowledge that he was not such a swallower of Frenchmen as he had been supposed to be, and a rapidly growing taste for his music, thanks partly to the compositions of his French imitators, and partly to familiarity with his own works acquired at the concerts of Lamoureux, Colonne, and Pasdeloup. As a writer in the Temps remarks: "The fact that the ashes of Rossini left Paris at the moment when Wagner made his entrance, was an accident, but this accident is the symbol of an interesting truth: Italian music has ceased to give us pleasure, German music is triumphant. And it would be wrong to think that this victory is only apparent; that it is the work of a few fanatics and music-maniacs, or a caprice of the wealthy classes, consenting to be bored for the sake of fashion and in order to get the reputation of being intelligent music-lovers. The Sunday concerts are besieged by a motley crowd of which the petites gens form the majority, students, shop-clerks, office-clerks; all these come with worshipful fidelity to hear with concentrated attention this mystic music, which at first frightened them a little, and into which they now plunge with ecstasy." M. Jullien, in an appendix to his Wagner biography, gives an account of what has been done at these Sunday concerts for Wagner's music. The latest success is the Flower Girl Scene from "Parsifal," which had to be repeated. Other specifically German composers are also coming to the foreground in Paris. The Société Nationale recently gave Bach's Christmas Oratorio, and (mirabile dictu) one number, a chorale, was "encored." At the Opéra as well as at the Comique, Weber's "Oberon" is in preparation; and the list might be easily enlarged.

—Concerning "Lohengrin," a few more details may be added from the foreign papers. It seems that some commotion was excited in Germany by the report that Kapellmeister Levy of Munich, who had been invited by Lamoureux to attend the dress rehearsal in Paris, had remarked that the performance was "a humiliation to Germany." Lamoureux consequently wrote a public letter in which he explained that Levy simply intended to compliment him on having given Wagner's score complete, whereas at most German opera-houses extensive cuts are made. The correspondent of the Berlin Boersen-Courier states that Lamoureux's orchestra of ninety was admirable, consisting, as it did, of some of the best men of the two Paris opera-houses, with the addition of talented pupils from the Conservatoire. He adds that "the mise-en-scène was greatly admired in Paris. We Germans are accustomed to something better." The principal singers—Devriès, Van Dyck, Blauwaert, and Duvivier—are all well spoken of; but it was regretted that, after more than twenty rehearsals, the rôle of the King was taken away from a competent German and given to an incompetent French singer, for fear of arousing "patriotic" suggestions. For the same reason, Nuitter removed from the text all allusions to Germany. Difficulties of copyright made it necessary to retain Nuitter's translation instead of Victor Wilder's, in which the words are more carefully adapted to the accents of the music. Wilder also translated "Die Walküre" for Brussels, where it has just met with such extraordinary success. There is every reason to believe that the Parisians, when they read that the authorities at Rome have just renewed their contract with the manager of the opera on condition of his giving "Die Meistersinger" at an early date; when they read of the great success of German opera in New York, and that twenty-three performances of "Die Walküre" were given at Brussels this season—will imperatively demand some more of this music which Alphonse Daudet finds "au-dessus de tout."

A FRENCH CONSTITUTIONALIST ON THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION.

Le Développement de la Constitution et de la Société Politique en Angleterre. Par E. Boutmy, Membre de l'Institut, Directeur de l'École Libre des Sciences Politiques. Paris: E. Plon, Nourrit et Cie. 1887.

A REVIEWER of Boutmy's essay on the development of the English Constitution has before him a task which, if pleasant, is also difficult. He must describe, if possible, the qualities of thought and expression which mark out our author as a writer of undoubted originality, not to say of genius. He must, in the next place, give the intelligent readers of the Nation some idea of the kind of results attained by a thinker who brings a fresh mind, stored with wide learning, to a topic which, though so often worked, is still so unexhausted as is the Constitution of England.

Boutmy's genius is best described by the statement that he is the most brilliant representative of that school of French legists and historians who combine the erudition of Germany with the lucidity of France. To call our author the representative of a school is in no way to detract from his individuality. His writings bear that indescribable impress of personal character which gives to every page of a book, such, for example, as De Tocqueville's 'Ancien Régime,' a charm that nothing else can replace. It is, in fact, because he is so distinctly not a mere collector of information, but a living author, that Boutmy represents so completely the best traits of a band of scholars from whom France and Europe must hope much. It is hardly possible to conceive that such a writer stands alone. The whole tone of his writings sufficiently proves that he is stirred by feelings and inspired by aims common to a class. We shall hardly be mistaken in the conjecture that Boutmy, together with Glasson and others, belongs to a school who have determined to restore to their country that reputation for thorough, thoughtful workmanship which has been, to say the least, obscured by the acknowledged preëminence of French authorship in lucidity of style and in epigrammatic form of expression.

The truth appears to be, and it is a truth well worth attention, that in one department, at least, of thought—in the province, that is to say, of legal and historical study—Frenchmen are preparing once again to astonish and instruct the world by exhibiting that capacity for putting forth fresh life after crushing calamities which is the most marked trait of French history. However this may be, the one thing which is absolutely certain is that Boutmy has, by combining erudition, lucidity of expression, and insight, given a new impulse to the comparative study of constitutions. His earlier book, 'Études de Droit Constitutionnel,' contained, in three or four hundred pages, a greater number of important observations on the contrast between Continental and English or American constitutionalism than any work with which we are acquainted. From the nature of things, a great deal of it consisted of matters which could not have any novelty for Englishmen or Americans. But for all this, these Studies in Constitutional Law brought out, in a very striking light, contrasts between what may be called the French and the English idea of a constitution, which might easily escape the notice of persons who, if well acquainted with England or America, had never studied the constitutions of the European Continent.

What is true of the 'Études de Droit Constitutionnel' applies with even greater force to Boutmy's new book, 'Le Développement de la Constitution et de la Société Politique en Angleterre.' Here again we have displayed thorough knowledge of his subject. Hallam, Stubbs, Freeman, Gneist, Pollock are all as familiar to Boutmy as they are, or should be, to every educated Englishman. He has done much more than analyze the works of these writers: he has appropriated and assimilated all their best ideas. He has seized as firmly, for instance, as Gneist, the truth that the growth of the Constitution cannot be separated from the growth of the political society of which the Constitution (in the limited sense of that word) is merely a part. He never forgets for a moment the connection, which Stubbs and Freeman impress in every page upon their readers, between the immense power originally possessed by the English Crown and the subsequent growth of English freedom. He has followed out the characteristics of the English land law as sketched by Prof. Pollock, and now, it may be assumed, understands the mysteries of English manors and English settlements as thoroughly as does his teacher. Boutmy has, in short, achieved what hardly any other writer on the Constitution has rarely accomplished, the combination, namely, of the legal with the historical aspect of constitutional history. Nor has he stopped at this point. He has attempted, at least, to comprehend within his view the economical no less than the political and social sides of English life. If in some degree he is perhaps less to be trusted on economical than on legal or political questions, the reason is that his authorities are not quite so trustworthy as are the authorities on whom he can rely when dealing with history or law which is strictly constitutional. It may, perhaps, be doubted whether Mr. Toynbee's speculations, however ingenious, were not inevitably too immature to support the inferences drawn from them by Boutmy; and Arthur Arnold's political principles may, a critic cannot but feel, have made him not quite an unbiassed witness on the condition of English land or of English laborers.

The credit, however, to Mr. Boutmy of having studied writers who might naturally seem to lie out of his path, far outweighs any discredit which the most unfair criticism could attach to him for having occasionally relied upon guides whom an Englishman might feel to be possibly rash or prejudiced. It would, moreover, be the greatest mistake to suppose that our French author brings nothing to his subject but what he has gained from the books he has studied. He contributes a lucidity of style certainly not gained either from Gneist or Stubbs; he has a vivid perception, which could hardly be attained by any one but a Frenchman, of the instructive contrasts between the course of English and of French civilization; he exhibits in its highest form that French capacity for generalization which, if it leads an ignorant man into absurd blunders, is, when combined with knowledge, nothing less than a keen eye for the essential features of great subjects.

We have all learned from Gneist and Stubbs that the overwhelming power of the early Norman kings checked the disruptive tendencies of feudalism, endowed England with an administrative system far in advance of its age, established the rule of equal law, and, by compelling the nobles to become the leaders of the people, laid the foundation on which were ultimately built up the liberties of England. On this topic Boutmy must of necessity follow his predecessors. But it is characteristic of his genius that he has one or two new and valuable remarks to make on a subject which, it might well have been fancied, was worn down to triteness. He, for example, emphasizes the effect produced by England being an island: "The sentiment of national unity [solidarité séparée] springs up and acquires force far more rapidly in an island than in a continental country." The consciousness of a separate national existence hence grew up in England centuries before it was known to France, or, indeed, we may say, before there was a France in which it could be known. Even at the time of the Reformation, there was serious danger lest the monarchy should be dismembered by the wars of religion. "The French nation needed still to be created [était à faire] in the seventeenth century. She was no longer a federation; she was not yet a separate people." France, in short, when she met the perils of the great religious revolution, had still to encounter difficulties which in England had been overcome in the time of John and earlier. Nor did the smallness of the country tell in favor of national progress only by intensifying national feeling: it increased the power of the Crown, which, in the Middle Age, meant the authority of the law. Feudal monarchies were weak because the authority of the Crown extended nominally over territories too vast to be really subject to its power. In England the kingdom was small, manageable—if one may use the expression, "handy." The county, the largest administrative division, equalled on an average not more than half a modern French department, and was a small district indeed compared to a French province. It was, too, as Boutmy points out, a happy circumstance for English freedom that Scotland was not added by Edward to his kingdom. Such an addition would, it is likely enough, have led to the creation of vassals powerful enough to balance the authority of the Crown. No doubt other writers have noticed the effect on the progress of English civilization produced by the insular character and the smallness of England; but no one with whom we are acquainted has placed the matter in so clear a light as this French critic, who understands England because at every moment he compares English institutions with the institutions of France.

The most original, if not always the soundest, part of our author's work is his statement and explanation of the paradox presented by English progress during the eighteenth century. The paradox is this. The period, as contrasted with the ages which preceded it, was one of apparent repose, not to say immobility. The religious contests of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries had ended; the political revolution which had led to the death of one king and to the exile of another, was closed. The tyranny of Charles and the ecclesiastical despotism of Laud were as dead as the Protectorate of Cromwell or the Westminster Assembly. Between 1689 and 1829 there occurred hardly any great constitutional change. Historians have naturally agreed to describe the eighteenth century, politically at least, and as compared specially with the seventeenth century, as a tame period of peace and conservatism. Yet if the matter be looked at from another point of view, to which Boutmy specially directs attention, the political turmoil of the seventeenth century was productive of far less real change than the political stagnation of the eighteenth. The Puritans attempted large changes in Church and State, and the Whigs of the Revolution finally put an end to all danger of royal despotism. But neither the Commonwealth nor the Whig leaders of 1689 attempted to effect social changes. The men of the eighteenth century, on the other hand, carried out, unconsciously, for the most part, a gigantic system of political or social revolution or reaction. They founded or extended the rule of the gentry—that is to say, of the titled and untitled landowners—throughout the country. The Parliament, under an elaborate system of party government, came to be mainly controlled by large parties led either directly or indirectly by the greatest landlords in the country. Politics became more and more a matter of family, and the contest between George the Third and the Whigs, though it broke down the predominant influence of the great Revolution families, and to a certain extent increased the influence of the rich mercantile classes, did not substantially affect the real established system of government. The yeomen, who had been a real power at the time of the great rebellion, dwindled away. Those of them who succeeded in the struggle for existence joined the class of large landowners; those who failed sold their land, increased the population of the towns, or emigrated to the colonies. Strict settlements had all the effect of entails, and the land fell more and more into the permanent possession of large landowners. The country laborers, meanwhile, became more and more dependent on the Poor Law, and the Poor Law was administered, like everything else throughout the country, by the magistrates, who systematically favored the extension of outdoor relief, and whose legal powers were constantly increased, while the checks on the exercise of these powers, which, in the time of the Tudors, had been a reality, were, by almost imperceptible changes in the law, made little better than a sham. The eighteenth century, in short, was in England marked by the gradual transformation of the Government into something like an "oligarchy"—if the word oligarchy can be applied to a class so numerous as that of the gentry.

The causes, moreover, of this change are not hard to trace. The diminution of the regal power prevented the growth of any "administration," in the foreign sense of that word, which could supervise or check the exercise of the powers lodged in magistrates or in small corporations. The smaller towns were absorbed in the country; the large cities which now fill the north of England, were only coming into existence, and had no share in the political representation of the country. The yeomanry were turning, under the stress of economical causes, into farmers; the great merchants connected themselves by marriage with the landed nobility, and, from the time of Pitt, at any rate, found easy access to the peerage. The manufacturers were not yet a power. The city artisans and the country laborers enjoyed personal freedom and parish relief, but as a body took no part in politics. The country, moreover, flourished, and the mechanical inventions which, by raising up a great manufacturing population, were destined to cause the political fall of the gentry, were for the time beneficial to their power because they tended to increase the wealth of the landowners.

A more masterly sketch of constitutional and social changes of which many eminent writers on the English Constitution do not appreciate the importance, can hardly be found than the picture given of it in the third part of Boutmy's treatise. Two criticisms on his views are allowable. He is apt, like most Frenchmen, to attribute, in language at least, rather more to conscious design on the part of statesmen or classes, and rather less to the unconscious pursuit by all human beings of their obvious interests, than facts warrant. Not a single statesman, Whig or Tory, contemplated, we suspect, the transformation of the English Constitution from a more or less popular to a more or less oligarchical system of government. Scarcely justice, again, is done by our author to the real justification for the authority assumed or exercised by the gentry. They were in the main the rulers of the country because they were, on the whole, the class best fitted to govern it. Tried by the only fair standard, that is, by a comparison with the system of government existing during the eighteenth century in other countries, the English oligarchy are entitled to the verdict that they ruled the country with skill. England prospered, personal freedom was secured, and the body of magistrates, in whom, as Boutmy points out, were vested really vast powers, were, though sometimes incapable, neither oppressive nor corrupt. It may, indeed, be doubted whether any men wielding power under very slight legal restraints have ever been more free from the vice of personal corruption than those justices of the peace whom novelists and satirists have agreed to deride. When Chatham and his son wished to reform the representation, their idea of improvement was to increase the weight of county representatives. Such a reform would, as events proved, not have met the necessities of the case. But we may assume that towards the end of the eighteenth century the county freeholders were the soundest and least corrupt part of the nation.

If, however, Boutmy has done a little less than absolute justice to the way in which the gentry exercised their authority, he has rendered an immense service to students of constitutional history by forcing on their attention an aspect of English institutions which we constantly overlook. A French constitutionalist naturally fails to see some things easily perceived by Englishmen; but Englishmen, on the other hand, may learn from a Frenchman like Boutmy many important and disregarded facts about the development of the English Constitution.

THE opportunities which a reader of current fiction may have of giving an hour or two of his time to the work of other than unskilled and frequently presumptuous writers, are, relatively speaking, only too rare. The immense quantity of trash that is thrown into the form of novels, and in some way provided with publisher and audience, is so noticeable that to even speak of it seems commonplace. It is not at all wonderful that we should have this vast stream of fiction, which can in no way be classed as literature, constantly flooding the book-stalls; yet, like some other plainly visible and unremarkable aspects of the time, it is regrettable, and must be, to some who look to fiction to become a great teacher, discouraging. To these latter, and to all who care for good work, 'The Feud of Oakfield Creek' will appeal strongly. Prof. Royce has made his novel one of California life, concerning which he can speak from the chair; and while the scenes and the mechanism of the story are so perfectly flavored with the soil that one feels distinctly enough the impossibility of detaching the lives of Escott and Eldon, of Margaret and Harold, from their environment, yet one at the same time realizes, even more distinctly, that the passions and natures of these people are true to humanity. What is better still, they are true to a phase of humanity which is neither degraded nor trivial, but which, though of necessity marked with error, is nevertheless essentially noble and high. We know of no instance in fiction where a love between man and woman, which could not exist and be given expression to within the bounds of honor, has been depicted with the quiet strength and delicacy, and with the entire absence of anything vicious or demoralizing, that characterizes the history of Margaret and Harold. Without sentimentality, one pities the pair, and looks on them leading their separate, sorrowful lives as creatures of an inevitable fate —too strong to be rolled in the mire, and only strengthened and chastened by their past. The story is not altogether sombre, however, though one might reasonably ask that a little more cheerfulness had been scattered here and there throughout a tale essentially sad. Alf Escott is the only really cheerful figure, and what one sees of him at first hand is very telling in its lightening effects; but the book is so largely a narrative in the past tense, and the incidents in Escott's life are so persistently unfortunate, that one thinks more on his broken existence and wasted talents than on the bravery, modesty, and evenne s—almost recklessness—of temper with which he bears ill-luck. But, for all that, there is a very strong personality about the man, a genuine integrity and independence that makes one have a kindly feeling toward him, even as a mere acquaintance.

It is because so great a part of the book is written in a narrative form, also, that there is only now and then occasion for anything more than the plain, straightforward, vigorous style that counts for so much in the admirableness of the whole work; but when there is occasion for a dramatic scene, it is always drawn with power and truth and (notwithstanding the appearance sometimes of gracefulness sacrificed for strength) secundum artem. In fact, the novel is sterling throughout. It is good in plot and workmanship, and in the portrayal and conception of character; it is natural and lifelike, and it is interesting. It is all this not now and then merely, but continually, and with an even, level temper which looks as if the writer had kept carefully within the limits of what was positively attainable. One gets an idea, that is to say, that the next novel one may have the good fortune to receive from the same hand will be even better than this one.

'A Child of the Century' is another novel which is better than the average; but it is not so good as it ought to be, nor would it be fair to compare it too closely with 'The Feud of Oakfield Creek.' The tone is much less earnest, for one thing, and the impression of trivial nothingness which the admirers of an older school of novel-writers complain so much of nowadays, is rather strongly given. And it may be said generally that when a writer's endeavors to be brilliant, or witty, or epigrammatic—to make airy nothingness charming in itself—become noticeable, success at the same time becomes impossible. Mr. Wheelwright introduces his hero at the age of thirty-five; yet, if the election to Congress were omitted, one would never take him to be other than the ordinary hero of from anywhere between twenty-two and twenty-eight, who is only a hero by courtesy because of his place in the cast. A child of the century may, in the restricted sense of a definition, be one who is wholly commonplace, who is tolerably honest, who talks intelligently of Dante for years and then resolves in vain to read his poem, and who, above all, takes a steamer for Europe as ordinary mortals take a horse-car; he may be one, to quote Clough's line from Mr. Wheelwright's title-page, among the "Feeble and restless youths, born to inglorious days."

But because the class thus defined is so situated as to give a certain color to much of what might be called society literature, one is not therefore to conclude that true heroism has died out of the world, nor that plain living and high thinking are altogether gone out of fashion. The scenes of the novel, like the conversations, are somewhat fragmentary, and skip about from country to country and city to city with true modern capriciousness, and some of them—such as the strike in the Valley Iron Works or Cyrus Penniman's breach of trust—are unnecessary and distracting. There is one very unfortunate quotation of Miss O'Hara's from Swinburne which is out of character and taste.

Two anonymous novels, 'Two Gentlemen of Boston' and 'Two Gentlemen of Gotham,' are somewhat alike as well in the artificiality and pretentiousness with which they are written as in their names. The former, one can venture to guess, is by a woman, and, for impossible situations, overdrawn characters, magical friendships, and the whole machinery of opportune deaths and sudden illness, can be recommended to them that like the mildly sensational. There is such a confusion of persons and places, and the "two gentlemen" have so little which identifies them with any special locality, that Boston might be any one of half-a-dozen different cities by merely changing the name of a street here and there. 'Two Gentlemen of Gotham' seems to have been written in partnership, and partly for the purpose of showing how apt the writers could be at making quotations. Percy Aylmer is something of a prig, though he was evidently drawn for an admirable Crichton. Some of his dissertations do not sound particularly fresh or original, and even the cultured Mr. Vere—whose portrait might with justice be objected to as personal and smacking too much of journalistic pen-pictures—does not despise an illustration or a story because it happens to be an old friend. Simple-hearted Dick Twyffert, too, must have unconsciously remembered Goethe's Autobiography and Lili's ruse of "brushing," when he shattered the Sèvres vase in his predicament. Altogether, the book is more a reminiscence of other books than a product of thought and observation.

'The Whole Truth' is a study of an exceptional phase of character, which, developed under morbid conditions and portrayed by means of incidents and combinations highly improbable and melodramatic, serves no good purpose either in life or in art. One is never more strongly impressed with the fact that it takes more than a good plot or a single well-drawn character to make a novel of any worth than when reading stories like 'The Whole Truth,' in which the writer, seemingly confident that the mere strangeness of his conception will suffice to arouse all the sympathies and emotions that are necessary to his end, neglects the simpler but better and more difficult methods of his art.

Mr. Downey, on the other hand, is to be blamed for making too much of unimportant things. Not that he gives them too much weight in the evolution of his tale, but rather that he gives them too much space when they have nothing at all to do with the story. The result can only be fragmentary and disappointing.

The subject of strikes is just now so general that one is not surprised to meet with it in fiction. While the writer of 'The Strike in the B—— Mill' has not signally succeeded either in producing a worthy novel or in shedding any new light on the question of labor and capital, he has nevertheless shown a fairness of temper and a kindliness of spirit that will insure the success of his book's purpose. This, as modestly expressed in the preface, is merely to emphasize in the minds of his readers the evils and dangers attendant upon certain manifestations of the present day in this country.

Theo. Gift still shows the rapid and skilful hand which makes novel-writing almost a matter of mere manual labor, and turns out three volumes of properly balanced love and hate, mystery, jealousy, and surprise as neatly as a moulder makes a cast. Neither 'Lil Lorimer' nor 'Victims' can be praised as showing anything higher than a great facility for stringing episodes and using adjectives, together with a knack of character painting and a knowledge of the value of contrasts. The former is by far the better of the two, and is here and there delightfully fresh and breezy, especially in the South American scenes; but the unnecessary tragedy and depressing sadness of the latter cannot, even by the buoyancy of the style and the hurried action of the story, be sufficiently relieved.

There is an excellent tone of earnestness about Mrs. Wildrick's book, a sincerity and conscientious effort to honestly do the best possible, which is all the more gratifying to meet with because it is so rare. The novel, one might say, is a novel for its own sake; and while it does not turn out a sermon, still there is nothing in it but what is elevating. The influence of romance is perhaps always a refining one, and there is a good deal of the romance of a past century woven in with a very pretty tale of the present one.

Books on China are already so numerous that tourists in the Middle Kingdom find it well, on their return home, to cast their notes in the form of sermons, essays, or novels. Considering the mass of weighty documents in the library on China, this course is rather to be commended than condemned. It need not necessarily spoil a story, though there is danger of overloading the warp and woof of plot and dialogue with too heavy embroidery of unnecessary particulars. The novel before us is as full of brilliant color, almost to gaudiness, as a butterfly's wings. The author's note-book during a sojourn in Foh-kien province became, with jottings of native scenery and customs, and Chinese and foreigner's gossip, as full as a larval grub. Then, hieing to the seclusion of Nikko, Japan, the chrysalis state was entered, and now we have the gorgeous novel. The story illustrates Chinese marriage customs, wherein it is easily possible for old knaves to outwit their relatives-in-law by substituting the ugly for the pretty; and, under stress of temporary need, the wrong sex for the right one—tricks which are common in Chinese Asia, and as old as Laban and Jacob. The Lovely Wang, a charming maiden and a noble character, thus falls unwittingly in love with a male scapegrace of a Hung, who has been introduced in place of his lovely sister into the sick-room of her (Wang's) brother. By a counter-deception practised by Wang's father, the lad and maiden, already in love with each other, are married. Hung junior then flies to Peking, and, in straits of poverty, sells himself as a slave. Meanwhile, the sick boy Wang dies, and the "Lovely Wang," his sister, finds out that she is actually wedded to her supposed sister-in-law, who is a man. She goes to Peking, finds and redeems him, and all ends happily. The novel is a clever production, full of pictures of Chinese scenery, but rather too full of the port-gossip of foreigners' hongs and tiffins, with plenty of fun, facetious description of domestic life, and accounts of the fox superstition and of slaves and their redeemers. In short, it is a lively story for a summer's day, and an easy way of enjoying a peep into Chinese domestic life.

"One can be profound without a great number of details, and subtle without a great many words," says Canon Joseph Roux, in his 'Nouvelles Pensées.' A more exact description of the style of the writer whom the Earl of Lytton has introduced to the English-reading public, by his translation of Karl Erdmann Edler's three stories—'Baldine,' 'Notre Dame des Flots,' and 'A Journey to the Grossglockner Mountain'—it would be difficult to find. Nothing is lacking to render the charm of these simple yet profound stories supreme. Plot, dialogue, description, are all that could be asked, and they are couched in exquisite prose. Without being in the least sketchy, they leave much for the reader to fill in from his own heart and sympathies, and the delicate art of the writer is as convincingly displayed in this respect as in that portion of his tales which he has expressed in words. The reader instantly comprehends what is required of him, and it is only when he reaches the end of the volume that he realizes how much has lain between the lines, and what a triumph the author has scored in guiding him so deftly and imperceptibly to supply it out of the fulness of his own nature, instead of himself giving utterance to it. An outline of the plots of these three life tragedies would convey but a feeble idea of their dramatic, poetic, and romantic worth, which the reader must obtain for himself at first hand. Their artistic value is well set forth in a preface by the translator, who will, it is to be hoped, afford the world a further opportunity of studying so refreshing a writer. That the translation is an entirely adequate one, is a matter of course. If there is any criticism to be made upon it, it is that some of the author's sentences are amplified or rounded out, though not at all to their injury. It is possible that the different editions may vary to this extent, and this theory is the best to adopt, in view of the perfection of workmanship.

A Handbook to Dante. By Giovanni A. Scartazzini. Translated from the Italian, with notes and additions, by Thomas Davidson. Boston: Ginn & Co. 1887. 16mo, pp. viii., 315.

THE object of this volume is, in the words of the translator, "to furnish intending students of Dante's works with the necessary preparatory information, historical, bibliographical, biographical, and literary." Scartazzini's edition of the 'Divine Comedy' is so good as to afford assurance that any work of this sort from his hand will be of value. But the Handbook is fitted rather to be a companion to the student than an introduction to the study of Dante. The information contained in it is so multifarious as to be likely, in some part at least, to be confusing to a student at the outset, and to become of interest and service to him only when he has made some advance in knowledge of the wide field of study. To every such student the book, in either language, may be confidently recommended.

The translation is moderately well done, but it bears marks of haste and of occasional unscholarly carelessness. For instance, on page 7 we read, "It having occurred to Leonardo Bruni d'Arezzo . . . that Boccaccio had written of the life and character of Dante as if he had been writing about Filocopo, Filostrato, or Fiametta, made [sic] up his mind for his own pleasure to write anew the life of Dante." The sentence, correctly translated, should read, "As it seemed to Leonardo Bruni d'Arezzo that Boccaccio had written of the life and character of Dante as if he had been writing his 'Filocopo,' his 'Filostrato,' or his 'Fiametta' [that is, as if he had been writing a romance, for these are the names of three well-known romances of Boccaccio], he undertook," etc. Again, on page 30, Mr. Davidson gives us the following unintelligible sentence: "He [Dante] succeeded by assiduous study in attaining such a knowledge of the divine essence, and of the other separate intelligences, as cannot be comprehended here below by human powers." Properly translated this sentence should read: "By assiduous study he came to know respecting the divine intelligence and the other separate intelligences whatever may be comprehended of them here below by human wit." Mr. Davidson's cannot is to be accounted for by his mistaking ne, "of them," for the negative particle nè.

Translating, on page 43, words of Leonardo Bruni, Mr. Davidson writes: "The cavalry of Arezzo conquered and overcame the company of Florentine cavalry in such a tempest that the latter, being (almost) surrounded and taken captive, were," etc. Here are two errors. Bruni's words are, "con tanta tempesta vinsero e soperchiarono la schiera de' cavalieri Fiorentini, che sbarrati e rotti," etc.—which mean, not "in such a tempest," but "with such fury of onset conquered and overcame the band of Florentine horse that the latter were" not "(almost) surrounded and taken captive," but "put in confusion and routed." In the original passage from Bruni, the word rotti is misprinted in Scartazzini's 'Manuale' as tolti, and the misprint accounts for one of Mr. Davidson's errors. Misprints have been a snare to him. On page 83 he states, that "in the sentence of condemnation pronounced on the 27th of January, 1302, it is said that Dante and his companions . . . were cited and summoned, according to law, by means of the Commune of Florence, to appear within a certain time." How they could be cited and summoned by means of the Commune does not seem evident. The words in the Manuale are per mezzo di, correctly translated "by means of," but the mezzo is a misprint for messo, as Mr. Davidson might have learned by looking at the original text of the condemnation, where he would have found per nunptium ("by a messenger") of the Commune.

There are many other errors similar to these, which detract from the confidence to be placed in the book, and which would be less surprising in the work of a translator of less literary pretension than Mr. Davidson.

A more serious fault is to be found in the notes he has added to Scartazzini's text. Some of them, indeed, are excellent, supplying omissions or correcting errors in the original; but most of the longer ones are controversial, and have a tone of assurance, and even of arrogance, such as happily is less frequent in the writing of scholars to-day than it was some generations ago. In this Mr. Davidson follows the unfortunate example of Scartazzini himself, who, in the earlier part of his comment on the 'Divine Comedy,' exhibits an astonishing command over the resources of the Italian vocabulary of terms of literary abuse. But it would have been better had his translator taken note of Scartazzini's open repentance in the preface to the "Paradiso," where the first rule that he lays down for a supposed editor of a future edition of his comment is—Si cancelli assolutamente ogni parola, ogni sillaba, di polemica che si troverà nei tre volumi. Had he but regarded these words, Mr. Davidson might have spared us such phrases as, "All this is a piece of special pleading without any foundation whatever"; "absolutely groundless assertion"; "this conclusion is utterly illogical, unfair, and at variance with facts," and others of the same sort. In some instances Mr. Davidson has good ground for regarding Scartazzini's views as incorrect, and his arguments as feeble, but in others his own position is decidedly more questionable than the one which he attacks. An instance of this is his long and presumptuous note (pp. 132, 133) on the translation of three verses from one of Dante's eclogues, in which, as it appears to us, he is manifestly in the wrong, though in so saying we ally ourselves with many scholars who, according to Mr. Davidson, have committed "a gross blunder," and hold to what he esteems "a curious and amusing misunderstanding and mistranslation," than which he hardly knows any more so.

The proof-reading of the volume has been very careless, and errors abound in the pages—for example, page 8, "Valutello" for Vellutello; "Liber . . . nunc primum editus" for " . . . nunc primum editum;" page 9, "Moreno" for "Moreni"; page 11, "compilate" for "compilata"; page 14, "Biografi de lui" for "Biografi di lui"; "A work of marvellous erudition, but less essential," for "A work of marvellous erudition not less essential." Subsequent pages show a multitude of similar errors.

In spite of its defects, however, the book is one that many students will find useful.

Charles Reade, D.C.L., Dramatist, Novelist, Journalist. A memoir compiled chiefly from his literary remains. By Charles L. Reade and the Rev. Compton Reade. Harper & Bros. 1887.

THIS is a somewhat remarkable memoir. It is made up of extracts from the private papers of Charles Reade, in the shape of letters, diaries, and unpublished squibs, and also of a connecting narrative of great fluency and spirit. Responsibility for the former part rests upon Charles L. Reade, the literary executor of the novelist, and that for the latter upon the Rev. Compton Reade, a nephew—a division of labor so carefully insisted upon by the two partners in the book that each seems to be disclaiming any share in the other's work instead of standing for his own. The greater interest lies in the narrative portion. It is salacious, and smacks much more of its author than of its subject; but as he is apparently every inch a Reade, one learns something of the distinguished novelist's character vicariously by the idiosyncrasies of his nephew, evidently a chip of the same original block. In fact, one understands very readily the petulance, quarrelsomeness, and violence of Charles Reade by observing in how similar a way his relative expresses himself. There are two things which the nephew cannot think of without getting into a rage: one is Mr. Slatter, a schoolmaster of the stupid flogging kind, from whom several of the Reades suffered, and to whom the writer administers a literary birching of such long-continued ferocity that the reader half wishes that he would "let up" on the brute; the other is the society of the Fellows of Magdalen College, toward whom he entertains a most scoffing spirit. If the objurgations of Slatter and the gibes at Magdalen were left out, the memoir would lose a large share of its vigor, which is mainly of the fighting variety. The Rev. Compton Reade is not a man much given to respect, however, and there would still be plenty left to give him a character for speaking his mind with frankness and fulness in regard to all matters of offence to him. Charles Reade's mother, to whom he is said to have been tenderly attached, had her peculiarities, and these come out with sufficient clearness; but it was hardly necessary for her grandson to add, after having freely exhibited her less amiable traits, that she was "a domestic tyrant." One cannot think that Charles Reade would have approved such an expression about his mother in his own memoir. This is perhaps the worst slip; but to point out instances of bad taste in the Rev. Compton Reade's narrative would be as superfluous as to stop to remark upon his English, which, as any one may observe, tomahawks syntax and diction with a reckless dexterity very amusing to witness.

We dwell so long upon the Rev. Compton Reade because his personality is really the one that affects the reader; he effaces his uncle except where the extracts from the latter's diaries and letters force him to give place. This is, of course, wholly unintentional, and, indeed, only the unconsciousness of the self-assertion would excuse it. But when one comes to the end and asks what more he knows about Reade than he knew before, the ineffectiveness of such a method of biography is very plain. Reade came of a county family of old stock, and the opening chapters about the Squire and his home and the childhood surroundings of the novelist are the best part of the book. It was a fine, sturdy, evangelical, fox-hunting, India-emigrating family, Charles Reade being the eleventh and last scion, and all its members were of excellent British stuff and took their stations in the world as they ought. It fell to the lot of this youngest son to be a Fellow of Magdalen, which provided him with an income for something over fifty years—a small income for a gentleman, it is true, but cheap, since he did nothing for it worth mentioning. He was also a make-believe lawyer, an expert in the repair of old violins, and a candidate for theatrical honors; and at last, rather late in life, he made a success as a playwright and became famous as a novelist. The letters which he wrote home when he was travelling abroad are without character, and the other material from his papers is of little value. Of his nature one learns very little not already well known, and few new illustrations of it are to be found in these pages. Mrs. Seymour, his housekeeper, is a mere figure, and no light is thrown upon the bond which united the two, though the Platonic character of the attachment is strongly insisted on.

On the whole, the memoir is chiefly remarkable, next to the Rev. Compton Reade's pugnacious sprightliness, for its plentiful lack of fresh information respecting its subject. Reade's peculiar temperament, his methods of work, and his controversies are an old story. As an Englishman he was the type of the man who proverbially writes to the Times; as a writer, he was a novelist only because he could not be a dramatist, and in his books he tried to come as near to writing a play as the form of the novel permitted. He lives by a few strong stories, now, and will live by 'The Cloister and the Hearth,' it is to be hoped, a long time; but his anomalous position in literature is well illustrated by the almost infinitesimal place occupied in his biography by other literary persons. It is unfortunate that his life was not told by some one less like himself, and in a simpler and calmer style. As to the main matter, whether Reade led a life worth any fuller record than that given to it by his works, one inclines to the conclusion that there was not much to tell.

The Evangelical Revival in the Eighteenth Century. By John Henry Overton, Canon of Lincoln and Rector of Epworth. Anson D. F. Randolph & Co.

THE third volume of the "Epochs of Church History" series has a more interesting subject than either of its predecessors, but it is not a more interesting book than Canon Perry's 'Reformation in England,' or the Rev. Mr. Tucker's 'English Church in Other Lands.' The author has done little more than give a dry compendium of events, which only needed a spark of genuine sympathy, it would seem, to set them all aflame. Perhaps he was discouraged by the fact that Southey, and Lecky, and other effective writers, had been before him and said all the good things. Brevity in historical writing is not always the soul of wit. It is much oftener its body of death from which it fain would be delivered. But that the Evangelical Revival can be treated briefly and at the same time effectively is proved by Mr. Lecky's ninth chapter in his 'England in the Eighteenth Century.' His treatment is considerably briefer than Canon Overton's, but while it omits nothing of importance that is here expressed, and contains much of importance that is here omitted, it is full of interest and fascination.

The whole is sometimes greater than the sum of all its parts, and while Canon Overton's account of various separate parts of the Revival is faithful and significant, we miss a proper and inspiring sense of its unity and integrity. His introduction is extremely brief. It is for the most part concerned with the causes of the religious apathy at the beginning of the Georgian era. The cause most insisted on is the influence of Sir Robert Walpole. This influence, he avers, "contributed more than all the other causes combined" to that condition from which Methodism was a violent reaction. But it was an apathy which was relieved by the great names of Berkeley and Butler, and William Law, whose 'Serious Call' was the fountainhead of the Revival, though Law himself had little admiration for the deepening and expanding stream.

The arrangement of Canon Overton's material is good so far as it goes, but the material is insufficient. A movement passionately ethical and pietistic is regarded almost wholly from an ecclesiastical point of view. The chapter upon Wesley is discriminating, and, for an ardent Churchman, even sympathetic, but the emphasis is almost wholly on Wesley's relation to the Establishment. We are interested in seeing how little of the practical working of the Revival was deliberately planned; how much of it was determined by the various exigencies of the time, in spite of Wesley's predilections. In the chapter upon Whitefield, Charles Wesley, and other "helpers," the balance is very evenly held between Whitefield and Wesley. The achievement is an easy one for Canon Overton because he is himself "a moderate Calvinist"; less Calvinistic than Whitefield, more so than Wesley.

When we read that Charles Wesley wrote more than 6,000 hymns, we wonder that more of them were not good by merest chance among so many. In the account of Fletcher of Madeley there is no mention of his controversial work, the most important on the Arminian side the time produced. A chapter on "Methodism and Evangelicalism" distinguishes the Revival in the Church as opposed to Methodist forms of activity, from the Revival freely using novel means of propagation; and Canon Overton's inclination is evidently to include as much as possible under the head of "Evangelicalism." Loyalty to the Church is his cardinal virtue. Wesley's appointment of Coke and Asbury as bishops for America is his single heinous fault. Newton's slave-trading is reserved for the climax of his unconverted wickedness; but of the relation of Whitefield's predilection for "a plantation of fat niggers" to his converted sanctity nothing is said. The literature of the Revival has a chapter to itself, the longest in the book. It was decidedly inferior to the religious literature immediately beyond its scope—Butler's, Berkeley's, and Law's. It is to be hoped that the chapter on the results of the Revival is imperfect—that there were other results of the Revival more important than any named, except the abolition of slavery in the West Indies. Wesley's opinion of slavery, and not Whitefield's, was generally held by the reformers. Thomas Clarkson's part is needlessly depreciated to enhance the value of Wilberforce's, the credit of which is claimed for the Evangelicals. The nature of the opposition to the Revival, its doctrines, and its relation to other religious movement are treated briefly in the closing chapters.

Some Chinese Ghosts. By Lafcadio Hearn. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

WHILE the ghosts of Japan and Corea seem to be wet and bedraggled creatures, born of wells and water and swamp, the Chinese ghosts manufactured by Mr. Hearn are wrought out of fire. The author, possibly, has been in the Middle Kingdom and made himself familiar with the proper environment of the spirits that dwell in bronze and pottery. He has read well the writings of Sinologists, and saturated his mind with images delightful to the fancy of the sons of Han. His style is exquisitely polished, his vocabulary is the cream of language, and his six stories are told with literary art. "The Soul of the Great Bell," "The Story of Ming-Y," "The Legend of Tchiniu," "The Return of Yen-Tchin, King," "The Tradition of the Tea-Plant," "The Tale of the Porcelain God," with appendices in the form of notes and glossary, complete his modest table of contents. The booklet has less than 200 pages, and to each chapter, besides the title-page, is appended a line of Chinese characters. At least the mystic marks are intended to stand for Chinese mottoes, Buddhist banner legends, sentences from the classics, the name of China, etc. They show, in their tell-tale craziness of copying, crookedness of writing, and roughness of engraving, their Occidental manufacture. This, when laundrymen are numerous in every American city, is unfair to the shades of Confucius as well as to the ghosts. If it be little glory in the West to be killed in battle and have your name misspelled in the despatches, surely the spirits evoked by the literary resurrectionist should be rightly written. Not only does Mr. Hearn mix his proper names as given in German and French spellings, but he even calls up a ghost known only in Japan to frolic and masquerade in China. Nor should even the Chinese be held to account, in addition to all their other sins, for the lascivious coloring given to a very simple legend. "The Tradition of the Tea-Plant" seems to be the most artificially and clumsily constructed of the six stories. "The Soul of the Great Bell" is that of the virgin daughter of a bronze caster who could not win success in his mould except by the cremation in the crucible of a beautiful maiden. Ming-Y is a lad who holds wassail and gains priceless literary relics from a famous courtesan whose spirit hovers over the ruins of a palace razed centuries ago. Tchi-niu is a paragon of filial reverence; and the Porcelain God is the deified man who baked himself into his own clay biscuit, and is now worshipped by potters and furnace-tenders in China.

Altogether, the impression made upon a Western reader of Mr. Hearn's semi-Chinese productions is not pleasant, though it might have been made so. Still, those who keep and enjoy the art products of Cathay welcome whatever legends will unlock the mysteries of the Chinese wonder world. Just as with the fairy and mystic lore of Japan, after the bloody, revengeful, and licentious elements are eliminated, there remain enchanting meadows of perfume and fragrance, so in Chinese literature and folk-lore there are yet untrodden gardens of sweet fancies. So long as the art of Asia is studied, there will be need of popular interpretation for Occidentals. Ghosts flourish most when there is a demand for them, and the multiplying museums and private collections of the bric-à-brac of Sinim call for occasional works like this modest book of Mr. Hearn, which, while in taste and emphasis of objectionable elements not wholly worthy of him, is a promise of better things to come.

New York: The Planting and Growth of the Empire State. By Ellis H. Roberts. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1887.

To condense within the limits of 700 small pages the story for 280 years of a growing State, describing material conditions, unfolding the sequence of events, portraying inherited and personal character in the men who guided them, and whom in turn they controlled—to impress this picture with continuity and dispose it in due perspective, is no easy task. It is not surprising, then, that the author of these volumes offers his readers abundance rather than coherence of material, and that his examples overwhelm the philosophy his history should teach.

The annals of no other of our thirteen primary commonwealths offer the diversity that causes this difficulty. New York alone among them was planted by one people and conquered by another, changing nationality with name. It was the only colony that welcomed all faiths and blended all races. She alone bore the stress of war with the most potent and civilized of European States on the one side, and the most compact and cruel of savage confederacies on the other. She carried on trade, conflict, and diplomacy with alien neighbors as no other colony was forced to do. After independence, the second war disturbed commerce, harassed the frontiers, and strained relations with the Federal Government more severely for her than for other States which stood less resolute and less faithful. And as to her political history, whether as colony or as State, her mixed population, with its early control by great families and its later concentration into great cities, singularly complicates the study.

In either of two methods the growth of such a commonwealth might be treated. One is to analyze the national elements composing it, and the material conditions under which these developed, tracing their interaction on philosophic principles, supported by copious illustration; the other is to set down in consecutive narrative the more important points in its progress, with color of incident, but without research into causes and their workings. The author seems to have adopted neither method frankly, halting between the two. He does sometimes state a principle and accumulate relative facts, but refuses the labor of demonstrating their living connection. This occurs oftenest where the causes are more simple and obvious, in colonial times. In the story of later days, since the century began, the attempt is less often made, and for its neglect may be pleaded the obscurity and complexity of the elements for study. Yet in a history brought down to last year, one naturally asks for some account of the rise and reasons of the Labor party, or some note of the portentous growth of Romish pretensions.

As instances, taken at random from the most diverse classes of subjects, of the want of proportion in the author's historical treatment, the topic of land and rent is discussed in eight pages, while a single page recalls the Liberty party, mentioning only one of its leaders, and omitting those who inspired its ideas. A page is devoted to the battle of Plattsburgh, while an incidental mention and a dismissal with less than two lines are all that is given to that on Lake Erie. An extended account of the French invaders' enterprises, religious and warlike, among the Iroquois, throws into the shade the far more important relations of the tribes with Dutch and English colonists.

In general, however, that part of these volumes recounting colonial history is written with more care and clearness than the sequel, opening with this century. The portraits of royal governors are done with some touch of individual quality, far more lifelike than the style of the detached sketches of later statesmen, reminding one of reporters' little biographies, pigeonholed for obituary issue. Hardly an attempt is made to show the development in the State of legal doctrines on such important topics as the rights of women and the relations between the spheres of national and of State governments. And though some details are touched upon illustrating the evils of legislation in early times, we must regretfully dissent from the conclusion that "the standard of morality and honor for legislators is higher than it was in the earlier days."

The index is carelessly pitched together, omitting, for example, any mention of the Erie Canal or of Myron Holley, one of its chief promoters, as he was also one of the New York creators of the Liberty party, though all these subjects form part of the volume. In brief, the work may be summed up as a rather perfunctory and far from thorough record of dates and facts, useful so far as it goes, but falling much below the dignity of a monograph on the history of the State of New York.

The Game of Logic. By Lewis Carroll. Macmillan. 8vo, pp. 96.

IT need not strike any one with wonder that the author of 'Alice in Wonderland' should write a book about logic. Even if he were not known as a mathematician, it might safely be predicted that a man who could make such beautiful nonsense as that book contains would have a very good head for sense. The principle that it takes a thief to catch a thief does not hold here: one must have a very pretty taste for logic if he wishes to compose pleasing specimens of unlogic.

This little book describes a device for working syllogisms by means of compartments marked out on a piece of card-board, and counters, red and gray, which indicate respectively that the compartments are occupied or empty. The counters are put into their proper places in accordance with the demands of the premises, and then whatever results are irrespective of the middle term are read off as the conclusion. This plainly does not constitute a game, but merely a mechanical plan for working out a series of puzzles. As a logical machine for three terms, it is very workable, and possibly amusing. If there are some children or some grown people who may be led by the pleasing device of colored counters to exercise themselves in drawing or in testing conclusions, it will doubtless do some good. The same thing is more readily accomplished, however, by algebraical than by geometrical means.

But mechanical logical methods do not show to good advantage in anything so simple as syllogism. Their proper field is in more complicated combinations of premises. It may well be doubted whether they do not injure rather than add to the automatic feeling of the inevitableness of a conclusion, which is what one has to trust to in real life. One does not strengthen the legs by using crutches, although they form an admirable means of getting over the ground when legs are found to be inadequate. If a person is unable to say at once what conclusion, if any, follows from any simple pair of premises, he may feel sure that his logical machinery is in need of oiling. What plan is best for putting it into good condition it is not an easy matter to decide. Probably the ideally perfect method would be for the person who sees at once, to drag out of the sub-conscious regions of his mind the actual process by which he sees, and to set it forth in the plain light of day, and then to discipline the patient with countless instances until the process has become automatic to him also. To expound to him the rules of syllogism is a very different thing; it is a matter of accident whether they follow the actual course of thought or not in any given instance. At the same time, he ought to have perfect command of some good and simple method, and to be able to apply it with ease as a means of last resort in cases of difficulty. That such cases are not far to seek, it would be very easy to show. Euclid himself does not seem to have been aware that the contrapositive of a proposition is always true. And his latest followers, with the single exception of Mr. Halsted, so far as we have noticed, have thought it necessary, for instance, to prove that two parallels to a line cannot go through a point, or, in other words, are parallel to each other, although it is a mere restatement of the axiom that through a point only one parallel to a line can be drawn.

Fine Arts.

THE AMERICAN ART ASSOCIATION.

At the Third Prize Fund Exhibition, under the management of the American Art Association, there is a collection of some 230 pictures. As has been the case in the two previous exhibitions, many of the important canvases have been contributed by American artists abroad. This year, however, Messrs. Harrison, Simmons, Mosler, Walter Gay, Bridgman, and Donoho, who have been prominent contributors in the past, are unrepresented, and Messrs. Boggs and Ulrich are exemplified by comparatively unimportant pictures. The good average which has characterized the exhibitions is well sustained this year, for there are some new names of note among the contributors from the foreign colony, and the artists at home seem to have made even more than the usual effort to be well represented.

In figure-painting the honors are carried off by Mr. Robert F. Blum, whose picture, "Venetian Lace Makers," No. 24, is much the best work he has ever exhibited. A dozen of the proverbially picturesque Venetian girls of the people are seen in this picture seated in groups around their cushion-stands in a large room, the doors and windows of which are shaded from the outside glare by green blinds. The gay, almost gaudy, colors of the girls' dresses are happily contrasted, and the picture is excellently painted throughout. In fact, it is marked by unusual knowledge and completeness in treatment, and is in every respect a strong picture. There are some delightful bits in it, such as the figure of the girl bending over her work near the door in the middle of the composition, and the one in the red dress in the foreground, in which admirable delicacy of color and breadth of painting are shown. The effect of diffused light in the room is well rendered, and the girls, chatting and laughing over their work, look natural and real.

"A Difficult Duet," No. 128, by F. D. Millet, is a picture which shows to perfection this artist's recognized cleverness in painting subjects of the latter part of the eighteenth century. The young woman at the piano, the man in striped changeable silk coat and periwig playing the violin, the quaint old piano, the music stand, the round mirror on the wall, are all executed with the preciseness and prim charm of a Dutch master. The picture is simple in composition and quiet and agreeable in color.

One of the best genre pictures in the exhibition is "Forging the Blade," No. 62, by F. S. Dellenbaugh. The subject is nothing more than a blacksmith standing by a forge with a long blade on which he is at work in his hands, but it is so well painted, the effect of light coming through a narrow window and falling on the figure and the dusty brick walls of the forge is so truthfully given, detail is so carefully painted, while completeness of ensemble is preserved, that this little picture is admirable.

"The Death of Minnehaha," No. 69, by W. L. Dodge, which is said to be the work of a young painter of one-and-twenty, is certainly a picture of much promise. The canvas is large, and contains three life-size figures. The dead body of Minnehaha is laid on a bier in the middle of the picture, and two warriors are seen mourning, the one on his knees on the ground at the head of the bier, the other seated, holding his head in his hands, at the foot. The painting is in general broad and skilful, and the picture possesses many excellent technical qualities. It is in no way remarkable for color, and it is seriously deficient in drawing in parts, notably in the figures of the two mourning braves; but the nude torso of the dead girl is good, the picture holds together well, and is well managed as to general treatment. It is the most ambitious work in the exhibition, and as the contribution of a young artist, who has but recently come into notice among the American artists abroad, it is entitled to consideration as well as for its intrinsic merits.

"A Souvenir of Picardy," No. 167, by F. C. Penfold, a life-size study of a fisher-girl carrying a heavy seine net on her shoulder, with a background of beach and ocean—a strong, vigorously painted figure; "The Toilers of the Sea," No. 105, by George Hitchcock, a party of fishermen and women coming across the sands at low tide, painted in a strong effect of light with great truth of observation and justness of values; "The Tired Moss Gatherer," No. 127, by J. Gari Melchers, a peasant girl lying with her basket at her side on the dunes at early evening, a picture painted in a quiet key of color, and noticeable for its fine quality of atmosphere; "Arrival of the Fishing Boats," No. 156, by W. E. Norton, a scene on a stone pier at Dieppe, representing a crowd of market people and idlers congregated at the water side, where a mass of boats are being moored, whose tall masts and broad sails rise in picturesque lines against the gray French sky—an effectively composed and frankly painted picture; "Charity," No. 84, by C. L. Fox, life-size figures of a strolling player-girl lying on a rush mat in a hut, with a wrinkled old crone bending over her, in which there is some good painting, but which is insufficient in drawing; "Lavoir in the Gatinais," No. 32, by Amanda Brewster, a large canvas with a number of figures of washerwomen at the edge of an enclosed basin of water, composed in a haphazard sort of way, but of considerable excellence as a study; and "Consolation, Church of St. Fiac, Brittany," No. 182, by H. M. Rosenberg, a nook in an old country church, with five old peasant women sitting in a row on a bench awaiting the coming of the priest—a picture which is sober and dignified in intention, but which would be more successful were it less bizarre in composition—are other works by figure painters sent to the exhibition from Europe which merit commendation. To these should be added Mr. Childe Hassam's three excellent pictures of Paris scenes—"Les Grands Boulevards," No. 102; "Over the Seine," No. 103, and "À Paris," No. 101.

"Woman Milking," No. 225, by Horatio Walker, which shows the interior of a stable with a strong light coming in through the open doorway and a woman milking a cow—a vigorous and healthy piece of realistic painting; "The Year was Young," No. 176, by Mary C. Richardson, an excellent life-size study of a young woman with a child in her arms, painted in an out-door effect with a background of green foliage, remarkable for its subtle modelling and simplicity; "In Blossom Time," No. 60, by Herbert F. Denman, two young girls in pseudo-Greek costume, painted in a delicate color scheme of pale tints, and noticeable for refined decorative quality. "The Wedding Gown," No. 152, by Rhoda Holmes Nichols, a strongly painted study of a young woman sewing on a white satin robe; "Searching for the Will," No. 12, by W. V. Birney, a clever genre, in which an old woman is seen bending over a table piled with quantities of musty books and papers; "Giving an Estimate," No. 135, by Leon Moran, a nicely painted conceit of a sign-painter (in the time of Louis XVI.) and his patron discussing the cost of a gorgeously carved and gilded sign-board; "Inspiration," No. 20, by Edwin H. Blashfield, a large canvas with a female figure of Music, seated in a sort of niche, and an angel or muse hovering above her—a decorative picture possessing many substantial merits; and "Sappho," No. 126, by G. W. Maynard, a picture of the poetess seated on a high bench in a marble hall with clouds of incense floating about, possessing great beauty of tone and refined in sentiment—these may be picked out of the large number of other figure pictures for special mention.

"Still Life," No. 229, by J. Alden Weir, a study of blue and white jars, a brass lanthorn, a copper basin or two, and a bunch of lilacs, the whole placed on an old table, with a piece of the wall of a studio as a background, is exceedingly handsome in color. In the same field are to be seen two still-life pictures by Emil Carlsen, "Decorative Panel in Yellows," No. 41, a rather ineffective and forced arrangement of yellow roses and yellow stuffs; and "Azaleas," No. 42, a great bunch of pink flowers in a stone jar which are certainly peonies, and whose title of Azaleas in the catalogue must be owing to a mistake—a color study of considerable beauty, strongly and freshly painted.

The present exhibition is very weak in portrait work. There are only five or six altogether, and of these only one, "Portrait," No. 52, by Kenneth R. Cranford, a half-length figure of a gentleman, has much merit to recommend it. In landscapes there is a fine showing.

> "Over all the hill-tops is rest,
> Even thro' the trees thou feelest
> Scarcely a breath,"

is the daring title given by Mr. Thomas Allen to his picture, No. 3, in the catalogue. It is a large landscape, simple and noble in composition. A hill sloping down from right to left, with a group of massive trees half-way down the descent, a purple-tinted evening sky, and the newly risen moon riding in the sky just above the crest of the hill, is the motive, and it is broadly and amply painted. This picture belongs among the best American landscapes of recent years. It is an excellent example of the best kind of realistic treatment of nature combined with a fine poetic feeling. Two pictures, "An October Day," No. 213, and "Night," No. 214, exemplify the charming talent of Mr. Tryon. "Night" is a picture of the moon nearly at its full, rising just above the horizon, with a low-roofed barn and a hay-stack in the foreground of the composition. The artist has succeeded admirably in rendering his effect, a very difficult one, too, and in getting rid of the presence of paint in his picture. The moon seems actually to light the picture, in every part of which there is a vibrating sense of atmosphere in both light and shadow. This picture by Mr. Tryon is of a high order of merit, and would hold its own in the most distinguished company. "Broad Acres," No. 86, a large canvas signed by Edward Gay, is thoroughly American in subject. A waving field of ripe grain fills the foreground, and in the middle distance are seen a row of telegraph poles indicating a roadway through the fields, and a stage-coach toiling wearily along under the hot sun; clusters of country houses are scattered along the rising ground in the distance, and a luminous noon-day sky stretches high up over all. There is a great deal of nature in this picture, and it is conscientiously and frankly painted. "By the Woodside," No. 153, by Burr H. Nicholls, is an autumn scene, of woods and fields and a distant river, in which there is some excellent drawing of trees. "Snow and Sunshine," No. 164, is one of Mr. Walter Palmer's effective and truthful studies of winter sunlight. "Late Afternoon," No. 59, a large landscape by Charles H. Davis, reveals a flat plain and low horizon with a broad expanse of pale-tinted sky and a mountain of pink clouds. It is delicate and pretty to the point of weakness, and is artificial and false in effect. "Moonrise," No. 166, by Richard Pauli, reminding one strongly of the methods of Daubigny, yet possessing good qualities of its own; "The Tide River," No. 241, by Charles H. Woodbury, a large landscape representing marsh lands with stacks of dried grasses and a stream of tide water winding through them, luminous and fairly good in effect, but altogether too brutal in texture; "The Close of an Autumn Day," No. 45, by B. W. Clinedinst, a nicely-painted picture of a garden, evincing accurate observation; and "A Garden by the Danube," No. 82, by R. B. Fitz, a study of a potato-field, in which there is excellent quality of atmosphere—are some other notable landscapes. Mr. Murphy is well exemplified in "September Noon," No. 144, and "Morning Greys," No. 146; Mr. Dewey in "October," No. 64; Mr. Van Boskerck in "Near the Sea, South Plymouth," No. 221; and Mr. Minor in "September Afternoon," No. 131, and "Solitude," No. 133. Mr. Rehn exhibits a strongly-painted marine, "The Surging Sea," No. 173.

American Society for Psychical Research.

The Research work of the Society is at present divided between five Committees:

1. The Committee on Thought-Transference is engaged in ascertaining whether a vivid impression or a distinct idea in one mind can be communicated to another without the intervening help of the recognized organs of sensation.

2. The Committee on Apparitions and Haunted Houses wishes to collect accounts, from trustworthy sources, of apparitions of absent or deceased persons, of premonitions, whether these occur in dreams or in the waking state, of disturbances in houses described as "haunted," and of any cognate phenomena.

3. The Committee on Hypnotism is engaged in the study of the mesmeric or hypnotic trance, with the object of ascertaining its causes and of elucidating its psychical and physiological accompaniments.

4. The Committee on Mediumistic Phenomena is chiefly concerned with the experimental investigation of the phenomena commonly described as "Spiritualistic," and is particularly desirous of obtaining opportunities for investigation with private and unpaid "mediums," or other persons in whose presence "mediumistic" phenomena occur.

5. The Committee on Experimental Psychology is making investigations in folk-thought or the study of sociology in its psychological aspects. It seeks to ascertain the psychical characteristics which many individuals may possess in common in virtue of their being members of particular races or communities.

Communications are earnestly requested from all persons interested in any branch of the work of the Society.

Back Numbers of "The Nation."

In response to frequent inquiries from subscribers:

An incomplete set of the Nation has little or no market value. Partial sets, bound and unbound, are always obtainable (usually lacking the earliest volumes), and do not command high rates, the bindings generally counting for nothing. Volume I. has readily brought $10 and upward when complete, but will bring very little in proportion if a single number is missing. Volumes II. and III. are also scarce, but not so high-priced as the first.

Complete sets, both bound and unbound, have sold for $100, with tolerably quick bidders, and have an increasing value year by year.

Single numbers not more than a year old can usually be supplied by the publishers at 10 cents each. For numbers more than a year old purchasers are referred to Mr. J. W. Christopher, 47 Dey St., New York, dealer in back numbers of periodicals, who can frequently supply them, having purchased, a few years ago, a large quantity from the publishers. Mr. A. S. Clark, 34 Park Row, also has a stock on hand.

The publishers no longer undertake to buy or sell numbers or volumes more than a year old, and can only recommend sellers or purchasers to negotiate with a dealer, or to advertise in the Nation.

[Publication was begun July 1, 1865, Vol. I. comprising the last half-year. Two volumes per year have since been issued, Vol. XLIII. comprising the last half-year of 1886.]

JUST PUBLISHED.

Word Studies in the New Testament.

By MARVIN R. VINCENT, D.D. The Synoptic Gospels, Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of Peter, James, and Jude. 8vo, $4.00.

THE REV. THEODORE L. CUYLER, D.D., in the New York Evangelist:

"A huge wagon, packed and piled with the golden sheaves of many years of thorough Bible research, is this precious volume. It is not a commentary. It is not a dictionary. It is not a series of dry scraps on philology or lexicography. It is not a cyclopædia for lazy ministers to crib sermons from. It is just like no other work on the New Testament that we can find elsewhere, and therefore it fills a niche that has hitherto been left empty. The very things which a young minister—and many an older one also—ought to know about the chief words in his New Testament, he will be able to learn in this affluent volume."

Around the World on a Bicycle.

From San Francisco to Teheran. By THOMAS STEVENS. With a Preface by THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON. With a Colored Frontispiece—Portrait of the Author in Costume—by KELLY, and over one hundred other Illustrations. 8vo, $4.00.

"For the originality of its idea, the physical endurance and pluck necessary for its execution, the dangers involved in it, and its own inherent interest, this bicycle trip round the world will pretty certainly remain unequalled in our time."—Pall Mall Gazette.

In Ole Virginia.

Marse Chan, and Other Stories. By THOMAS NELSON PAGE. Including "Unc' Edinburg's Drowndin'," Meh Lady, Ole 'Stracted," No Haid Pawn," and Polly. Cloth, 12mo, $1.25.

"Mr. Page enjoys the reputation of having written the most exquisite story of the war that has yet appeared. . . . His stories have been felicitously characterized as 'variant treatments of the same motif,' for which we feel no disposition to quarrel with Mr. Page, being eager to hear the tale as often as he may find ways to tell it, and grateful to him for such beautiful and faithful pictures of a society now become a portion and parcel of the irrevocable past."—Harper's Magazine.

SECOND SERIES.

Obiter Dicta.

By AUGUSTINE BIRRELL. Including Essays on Milton, Pope, Johnson, Burke, The Muse of History, Charles Lamb, Emerson, The Office of Literature, Worn-Out Types, Cambridge and the Poets, and Book-Buying. Elzevir 16mo, gilt top, $1.00.

A collection of charming essays on literary and kindred topics as entertaining as their predecessors, and which will without doubt attain an equal popularity.

"The book is neat, apposite, clever, full of quaint allusions, happy thoughts, and apt unfamiliar quotations."—Boston Advertiser.

"An original and delightful story."

The Story of a New York House.

By H. C. BUNNER. Illustrated by A. B. FROST. Cloth, 12mo, $1.25.

"It shows in every page a true artistic feeling. We value it not only for the neatness and grace of the style, but for the symmetry of the construction, just balance of sentiment, and an indefinable beauty of tone which is perfectly sustained from the first page to the last."—N. Y. Tribune.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JUNE 2, 1887.

The Week.

AN idea has gained currency that since a new bank in this city has conceived the plan of taking silver bullion on storage and issuing warehouse receipts for it, and since the Stock Exchange has voted or may vote to list these receipts and have them "called" from day to day, therefore New York will soon "control the silver market of the world." What is meant by controlling the silver market is not quite clear. What would be the gain to us if we should achieve this distinction is not stated. The silver market is at the present time controlled by India, that being the country which uses silver more than any other. The quotation made in London for bar silver is the resultant of the Indian demand —expressed by the regular auction sales of India Council bills or drafts on Calcutta and Bombay. These drafts enable the buyer of goods in India to meet his obligation payable in silver rupees. We get our quotation of silver from London, and London gets hers from the sale of Council bills, and these sales are dependent upon the state of trade with India, in the same way that the price of sterling exchange here is dependent upon the state of trade between us and the Old World. This state of things will continue after the warehousing of silver bullion and the listing of silver warehouse receipts begins, as before. Nevertheless there are some advantages to be gained by the proposed system, because it will save time and labor in the transfer of property.

In filling the important office of the new Circuit Judgeship for this district created by the last Congress, the President has made another appointment which extorts the heartiest commendation from even his most bitter political opponents. We are quite content to adopt as our own the comments of the Tribune, which says: "President Cleveland's appointment of Mr. E. Henry Lacombe to the office of United States Circuit Judge is a commendable one. Such an addition to the Federal Judiciary will be approved by the bar as well as by the public at large. Mr. Lacombe will add strength and dignity to the bench of this circuit. He has shown himself to be well fitted by temperament, character, and legal ability for this promotion. The only thing that can be said against it is that it takes away from the city a public officer whose duty has been so well done as to make his removal a loss to the public service."

The Blaine idea of public office is admirably illustrated in the comments of that typical Blaine newspaper, the Philadelphia Press, upon the appointment of Mr. Andrew H. Dill as United States Marshal for the Eastern District of Philadelphia. The Press concedes that Mr. Dill has every qualification to fill the office with the highest credit: "The President has certainly named a man big enough for the office," it says. "But," adds the Press, "it is not an appointment to vitalize the party," inasmuch as "Mr. Dill will not make that active, every-day political use of the office that some of those urged for the place would have done." The Republicans made a thorough trial of the theory of "vitalizing the party" by having servants of the public "make active, every-day political use of their offices," in 1884, and Mr. Blaine himself endorsed this theory, in the most conspicuous way possible, by "toting" the Postmaster of Augusta, Me., around the country with him as his personal attendant, and taking the United States District Attorney for the Brooklyn district in his train on a stump-speaking tour. But the party did not appear to have quite so much vitality when it was all over as it had possessed twenty-four years before, when it had no offices to make use of.

Senator Ingalls of Kansas is credited with having recently made this remark: "I have no hesitancy in saying that granting the right of suffrage to the colored people has proven an absolute and unqualified failure." From the standpoint of the Republican politician, this is a correct statement of the case. The negroes were given the suffrage upon the theory that they would all vote with the Republican party, and would thus keep that party indefinitely in power in the Southern States, and by consequence in the nation. This theory has utterly broken down, and to-day every Southern State is controlled by the Democracy. The trouble is that the theory presupposed that the intelligent whites would consent indefinitely to be ruled by a mass of ignorance, which was impossible. The Republicans expected that negroes, not one in a hundred of whom could read his ballot, would have Republican ballots put in their hands by carpet-bag leaders and be conducted to the polls in droves like cattle, there to outvote the whites, who included ninety-nine-hundredths of the intelligence and owned ninety-nine-hundredths of the property. Intelligence and property revolted, as was inevitable if civilization were to be preserved. The Supreme Court, with all but one of its judges Republicans, has virtually decided that the Federal power cannot be employed to impose the rule of ignorance upon a State. It is settled that the negroes will never again vote as they once voted, like beasts, who were to be counted as always solid for one party because of the color of their skin. Gen. Armstrong of Hampton, during his recent tour through the South, found that the more intelligent blacks do not want to see that day return. As the negroes gain in intelligence they will find their votes sought by rival parties among the whites, as is the case to-day in Texas, and ultimately they will come to vote as generally as the whites; but when that happens they will divide their votes like the whites, and they will resent as white men would do the assumption that they can be counted as solid for any party simply because of their color.

Signs of the breaking down of the color line in politics multiply. A Richmond despatch to the Tribune says of the county elections in Virginia on Friday: "In many counties colored men voted with the Democrats, and the Republican party gained many white votes." In Texas, both sides are working hard for the colored vote in the canvass over the prohibition amendment. The advocates of the measures claim that the intelligent negroes as a rule are on their side, but the Opposition are fooling many of the ignorant by telling them that prohibition is only the first step towards putting them back into slavery. Thus the San Antonio Republican, which says to Republicans generally, "Stand as one man and vote against prohibition," makes a special appeal to the negroes with such balderdash as this: "Let the colored people keep their heads out of the prohibition snare. They have a long and tedious road to travel to secure their personal liberty without joining in with the Prohibitionists to curtail the liberty of their fellow citizens. Suppose the Legislature should pass a law declaring that no colored person of African descent should be allowed to enter a saloon, and any saloonist who sold such African-blooded citizen a drink would be subject to fine and imprisonment, what would the men among the colored people think of it? And yet that is prohibition, pure and simple."

Verily, these are strange times in politics, and distressing for the old fogies, who keep on talking the same old partisan rubbish. "The public must look to the Republican party for this work in behalf of moral purity and righteousness, as it has looked for so many others to the same source," said Senator Hoar of Massachusetts in his letter to the anti-saloon meeting in this city on Wednesday week. But the San Antonio Republican, the Texas organ of the party whose name it bears, in a vigorous editorial article on the situation in that State uses this language: "We say to Republicans over Texas, stand as one man and vote against prohibition." In the same letter Senator Hoar said: "Certainly it can look for no help to that party which is, and so long has been, supported and controlled by the liquor-selling interest of this country." But a Waco correspondent of the Voice writes that the leading Democrats of Texas, including Senator Reagan, ex-Senator Maxey, and a majority of the Democratic Representatives in Congress, have declared for the amendment, and adds: "Who will deny that if the leading Republicans of Michigan had favored prohibition as the leading Democrats of Texas are favoring it, the amendment would have been adopted?"

King Alcohol must have been terribly alarmed when he saw the list of Vice-Presidents of the Anti-Saloon Republican meeting at Cooper Institute last week, but he probably recovered himself afterwards. A better array of names could not be drawn out of the census of New York. If we can imagine these gentlemen as fired with one idea in the same way that the anti slavery men were fired in times gone by, and as Judge

Davis advised them to be fired at the meeting, we should say that Sheridan Shook and the Republican saloon-keepers had best beat a hasty retreat out of this city and State, because they would surely lose "the protection to which they are entitled." But since no such firing has taken place or can take place in a party organized and built up for different ends, the danger to the saloonists is not so alarming as the list of Vice-Presidents would make it appear. It is not for us to throw cold water upon the cold-water army, but, speaking plainly, we do not recognize in this assemblage anything more destructive to the forces of King Alcohol than a pious opinion that there is too much drinking in the community, and a solemn conviction that the Republican party ought to fight the liquor-sellers enough to satisfy the Prohibitionists, but not enough to lose many votes in the next election. The resolutions adopted by the meeting demand prohibition of the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia and in the Territories, and pledge the Republican party to the enforcement of whatever ordinances, statutes, or constitutional amendments may be adopted in the several States to restrict or suppress that traffic. The meeting declared itself in favor of the submission of prohibition amendments to the people, but did not declare itself in favor of their adoption. Why not? Why demand prohibition in the District of Columbia and in the Territories, and not in the States, unless for the reason that the District of Columbia and the Territories do not vote in a Presidential election?

The temperance question seems to have been definitely settled in Switzerland by the result of the popular vote, or referendum, as it is called, taken on the 15th instant, on the Federal law giving the Government the sole right to manufacture and sell spirituous liquors. The law has been approved by a vote of 252,791 to 127,474. This is doubtless to the American Prohibitionists an awful piece of legislation, as engaging the Government in a criminal enterprise, but the Swiss people, who have been for some years back wrestling with the liquor question, owing to the terrible increase of drunkenness in the Cantons, have concluded that in no other way can they so effectively diminish the quantity of liquor consumed, and at the same time secure the purity of what is consumed. Of course they could not reach this conclusion by starting from the great premise of our Prohibitionists that liquor-dealing and murder are in the eye of the moralist exactly the same thing. They reach it by starting from the premise, which is that of the great majority of rational men, that the moderate consumption of alcoholic drinks, even if it be a physiological mistake, is not in itself an offence against the community, and that it is the excessive consumption which society has to complain of, and is bound to repress, until the individual man has learned that his wisest course is to abstain wholly.

Mr. Tom Platt's letter to the Governor offering to resign the office of Quarantine Commissioner, if he (the Governor) would agree to appoint Col. Fred. Grant in his place, is interesting as an exhibition of cheek, but upon the whole it had been best left unwritten. Platt's strong point is silence. His strength is all latent strength. Now he has come out of his enchanted castle and declared himself, and invited public inspection. Naturally the first thing he tells is an untruth, viz.:

"Now that the Legislature has adjourned, and the Republican Senate has refused to be frightened by the howls of the Bourbons or the shrieks of the Mugwumps into delivering over the Quarantine Department to Democratic control, and have declined to confirm the successor you name for my place as Commissioner of Quarantine, permit me to offer a few facts, and to submit a proposition, that may tend in some degree to mitigate the disappointment which this result may have occasioned."

It is, however, notorious that the Governor, by nominating two straight Republicans and one Democrat as Quarantine Commissioners, put his opponents in a hole, and made it impossible for anybody to charge that he was seeking to put the office under Democratic control, or if anybody should so charge, made it easy to prove them to be liars. Mr. Platt has walked into the hole with the intrepidity of a veteran. The Governor says that two and one make three. Platt rejoins that it is no such thing, and that he will prove it by resigning his hold-over office if the Governor will agree to appoint a particular person to the vacancy. Of course such an agreement must be in writing, and that would look so funny, being the first and only agreement of the kind on record, that Platt must have been convinced that the Governor would never make the bargain in that way. The offer is therefore extremely cheap in appearance, but we think it will prove costly in the long run, since it shows that Platt has lost the power of holding his tongue.

The Governor's unofficial response to Tom Platt's impudent letter is a very neat and effective use of the fine opportunity which Platt had given him. "I must decline," says the Governor, "to give any assurance or engage in any dicker in reference to this or any other office." If Platt had half the cunning with which he is credited, he would have foreseen that so quick-witted a politician as Gov. Hill is would make precisely that response; but he has fallen a victim to the force of habit. He has become so accustomed to dickering in private, and to looking upon public office, not as a public trust, but as a private, personal concern, that he forgot entirely that other people did not share his views. The most striking aspect of his letter is the frankness with which he lets it appear that he looks upon the office which he holds as primarily a basis upon which to make a "bargain" or a "deal." "Come, I'll trade with you for it," he says to the Governor, and is so impressed with his own smartness that he does not for a moment suspect that the people of the State may not like his way of using one of their public offices. He has actually given David B. Hill an opportunity to pose before the public as a stern enemy of "deals" and "dickers." After that we do not see how anybody can ever again call Platt a shrewd politician.

By their failure to act upon the Quarantine appointments, the Republicans have succeeded in offsetting the Democrats of the Legislature for their vote to repeal the Civil-Service Law. It will be useless for the Republicans to point to the Democratic vote as a proof of the latter party's hostility to civil-service reform, after this Republican action keeping bad men in office for years after their terms have expired. The notorious fact that the politicians of both parties have no sympathy with the reform, was never more clearly illustrated than by these two acts. Yet we presume that the Republican politicians and newspapers will go on denouncing the Cleveland Administration for its "humbugging pretensions" about civil service reform with as much vigor as ever. In fact, the only war-cry which the Republican party has in sight now for the fall campaign, besides this denunciation of the Cleveland Administration, is "Down with the Mugwumps." The old delusion that a Mugwump's vote does not count on election day appears still, in spite of repeated disasters, to possess a large number of the party leaders. And yet we have to see a politician whose opinion is worth anything who will not confess, when closely pushed, that there were never so many Independents abroad in the land as now.

We believe it was that eminent economist, the late Artemas Ward, who remarked that "In the midst of life we are in debt," a destiny pathetically sure for most of us. The select few of the "coupon-clippers" may escape it, but for them, it seems, peculiar dangers lurk. That a man should be in bodily peril while engaged in cutting off coupons seems absurd at first sight; but Mr. Alpheus Hardy of Boston last week, while engaged in that gentle exercise in the Union Safe Deposit Vaults, dropped upon his leg the scissors which he was using, inflicting a severe cut, which had to be sewed up. This accident need not operate to deter anybody from industry and thrift, because it will appear on reflection that a capitalist may hire persons to cut his coupons, or the safe-deposit companies may introduce machinery proper for the purpose. Still, these things must cost money, which will be so much clear deduction from capital, increasing therefore in a minute degree the difficulty of getting rich, and putting a new obstacle in the way of Dr. McGlynn's Anti-Poverty Society.

The confession of Canon Fleming that he helped himself from a sermon of our Dr. Talmage's by "inadvertence," is one of the most humiliating admissions of recent times. We have always considered that listening to the Brooklyn divine in a pew half an hour or so was as much as any educated man ever did, and something which but few educated men have ever done more than once. But it would seem that Canon Fleming not only reads Talmage in his study, but reads him pen in hand, and laboriously makes extracts from him as one might from any of the great masters of thought. This is, in theological circles, a descent which we can only compare to the campaign charge which in politics used for some years after the war to be freely made against Democratic candidates — of having driven a one-armed soldier with curses from his door, or cheated a blind freedman out of a small mule. The preacher who would steal from Talmage is in fact, in that line, as Voltaire said of Habakkuk, "capable de tout."

The London Spectator lately printed a paper on Jewish pauperism which showed an enormous disproportion of poverty in the Jewish community of the British metropolis. It has now, by way of contrast, assembled figures bearing on the incomes of the richer members of that community, with the result of showing a similar disproportion of wealth. Indeed, the preponderance of poor at one end is more than balanced by an excess of wealth at the other end of the Jewish social scale. The Spectator says that the figures which it gives "are based upon an extremely able series of papers published in the leading organ of the Jewish community three years ago. They are the result of a series of investigations made by the most careful statistician in the synagogue, a gentleman who occupies a semi-official position, and who had access to every available source of information." They are, of course, only approximate, but the Jewish community in London is very small (under 50,000 persons), and there is no difficulty in arriving at the "least" amount of income possessed in most cases. The Spectator's tables show that, at the very least, the total income of the London Jewish community, divided equally among its members, must amount to £82 per head, whereas the average throughout the United Kingdom is but £35 per head. "So that at the very lowest computation the Jews have per head about two and a half times as much money as the non-Jewish residents of the country. They form, to put it in another way, a seven-hundred-and-fiftieth of the population, but have between them about a three-hundredth of the total wealth." And comparing the ratio of large incomes to population, the great preponderance of rich people among the Jews becomes evident. Thus, collating Prof. Leone Levi's tables ('Wages and Earnings,' 1885), which are based on the Income-Tax Commissioners' Returns, with the figures quoted by the Spectator, the following results appear, tabulated so as to show at a glance the proportion of incomes in the case of the Jews and the community generally:

Incomes over	Number per 50,000, United Kingdom.	Number per 50,000 Jews in London.
£10,000	4.5	100
1,000	85	1,400
500	150	800
200	785	3,200

That is, among the Jews, those having over £10,000 annually are more than twenty times as many in proportion to population as are found in the community generally; those having over £1,000 are nearly seventeen times as many; those with over £500 are more than five times, and those with over £200 are more than four times, as many.

This is very interesting; but the Spectator goes on to deal with the obvious fact that among the Jews "the ratio of incomes rises as the incomes rise, and the superiority of the Jew over the non-Jew is more marked in the larger amounts than in the smaller. Taking incomes in proportion to families, we get results more striking still. For the United Kingdom, we get one income of £10,000 in every 2,500 families; among Jews, one in every 100 families. The community at large has one income of over £1,000 to every 130 families: the Jews, one to every 7 families. The United Kingdom counts one income of over £500 to every 75 families; the Jews have one in every 12 families. The whole of the country reckons one income over £200 for every 14 families, while the Jews can claim one in every 3 families." The singularly disproportionate share of the Jewish working classes appears from the fact that whereas in the general community quite one-third of the annual income of the country is derived from the "laboring" people, only about one-twenty-fourth is derived from that class among the Jews, who yet on the other hand exhibit one thirty-fifth of the total number of incomes over £10,000 in a general community of which they form only one seven-hundred-and-fiftieth part. The Spectator's table, it is to be observed, which is topped with a simple "over £10,000," takes no account of the Jewish millionaires, the four Rothschilds and Sir Julian Goldsmid, or others of lesser but still great fortunes, like De Worms, Bischoffsheim, Goldschmidt, etc., inclusion of whom would bring the average far beyond the "safe" computation actually used, and would show an average income per head among the London Jews nearly three times as great as the common average of Great Britain. Whatever else the disproportion at the lower end of the scale may signify, we believe that, to the credit of our Jewish brethren, it does not imply unusual suffering, and the disproportion at the other end certainly indicates peculiar genius for business affairs.

It is almost useless to speculate about or comment on the new French Cabinet. It is essentially an omnium gatherum affair, made up rather of men who will not refuse office than of men who want it, or are expected to take it by the public. The weak point in it is the Minister of War, who, of course, has the most difficult place to fill, owing to the political complexion which Gen. Boulanger has given it, and owing, also, to the small number of prominent generals who are competent to make a respectable appearance in the Chambers. There are but few French soldiers who have had any oratorical or political training or gift, and those who have any such gift, like Gen. Boulanger, are apt to have too much of it for the good of the country. But the greatest difficulty the new Cabinet has to encounter lies in the fact that the Goblet Ministry was overthrown with the help of the extreme Conservatives of the Right, and the new one will have to count on this help to a greater or less extent, in order to stay in. M. Rouvier is to represent retrenchment and peace and a general cutting down of State aid. In the present condition of French politics even those Republicans who think these are good things are apt to take a distaste to them when they find the monarchists advocating them. So the ministerial crisis is probably not over.

The chief reason why the French "Opportunists" have opposed the retention of Gen. Boulanger in the Cabinet, is to be found in the figures of the budget on which the Goblet Ministry went out of office. Ever since 1879, the cost of the enormous public works which the Government is carrying on in various parts of France has been met by borrowing. This it is now proposed to insert in the annual taxes. But the cost of reorganizing the army and navy, and making cross roads, has long been met by borrowing also, and it is proposed to continue the practice. The Minister of Finance, in short, asked for this year, from one source or another, $650,620,947. Last year the revenue receipts only amounted to $587,022,153. Supposing the returns to be no better this year, the Minister will have to provide for a deficit of $63,598,794. Of this he proposed to raise $27,253,583 by new taxes, and to borrow the rest. The cost of the reorganization of the army and navy and the construction of new cross roads—also a military measure—is estimated at $36,441,000, every cent of which is to be borrowed. It must be remembered that in this the ordinary expenses of the army and navy are not included. In addition to it, however, the sum to be paid to the railroad companies, as a guarantee of interest, will also have to be borrowed. So that, all told, the sum to be borrowed this year will be in round numbers $56,041,000, which will bring the floating debt—that is, the loans for short terms—up to $140,511,792, in round numbers. All this is in addition to the old debt left after the war of 1870, which has virtually not been touched in the way of reduction. The new armament of the troops, new barracks, and new fortifications are this year to cost $8,000,000, and the improvement of the navy $5,000,000, in round numbers.

The Opportunists in the Chamber have long been opposed to this steady deepening of the financial gulf, and last year took for their motto, "No new loans and no new taxes." But this simply brought them to loggerheads with the Ministry, and caused the ruin of the budget and the voting of the necessary supplies in monthly twelfths, as a sort of compromise. As long as Boulanger was in the Cabinet and represented the national policy, retrenchment was impossible. No Ministry could keep him going and try to retain its hold on the country through his policy, and at the same time bring the expenses within the limits which, in the opinion of prudent financiers, the situation calls for. His last proposal was to ascertain whether his preparations for war were working well by "mobilizing" a corps d'armée at the cost of nearly $1,000,000 in cash. "Mobilizing" literally means putting the corps into the field, in full readiness for active service, with its supplies and transportation of every description, with its reserves under arms, and with military seizure of the railroads within the zone of proposed operations, reducing the number of trains available for passenger and other ordinary traffic to two trains a day. This of course involves a disturbance of industry which would cost indirectly many millions more. The Germans have their mobilizing machinery in a state of the utmost readiness, but they got it up without borrowing, and took plenty of time for the task.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, May 25, to TUESDAY, May 31, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

THE President has appointed E. H. Lacombe, Corporation Counsel of New York, to be the additional United States Judge for the Second New York Judicial Circuit. Other appointments by the President are: Henry F. Downing of New York to be Consul at St. Paul de Loanda, Portugal, and Edward J. Hill of North Carolina to be Consul at Montevideo.

The President has denied the application for pardon of James J. Stanley, who was convicted of fraudulent registration at St. Louis, saying, "I cannot pardon a crime against the election laws except it be in a case presenting unusually strong considerations for clemency. I consider such offences the worst of all crimes, and I know of none the punishment of which is more important to the public."

In the drill of militia companies at Washington on May 26, two Southern companies, the Vicksburg Southrons and the Memphis Zouaves, left the line because a colored company from Virginia was given a place in front of them. At a reception on the evening following, the President shook hands with every member of the colored company. The largest prize awarded—$5,000—was won by the Lomax Rifles, a company from Alabama.

A reversed civil-rights suit for damages has been begun against the Central Railroad of Georgia. The complainant is a white man, who is aggrieved because he was not allowed to ride in the car specially set aside for negroes. He claimed that his ticket entitled him to ride anywhere on the train, but the conductor ejected him from the special colored people's car.

Mr. Geo. W. Cable has cancelled an engagement to lecture at Raleigh, N. C., as well as at Columbia, S. C., on account of the ill feeling against him.

A feature of the Memorial Day exercises at New Orleans was the delivery of an oration by Mr. Theodore S. Wilkinson, member-elect of Congress, who, though too young at the time to bear arms, was in complete sympathy with the South during the war. All the Confederate veteran organizations were represented by committees bearing floral tributes. At Richmond, Virginia, many graves of the dead of both armies were decorated by the same persons.

Gov. Hill of New York has vetoed the Vedder Liquor-Tax Bill, which put a graduated tax on dealers. The specific reasons for his veto are, that "the tax is not uniform throughout the State," and that "the bill provides that the taxes raised shall go into the State Treasury, rather than into the treasury of the localities where the licenses are granted."

A bill has passed both branches of the Michigan Legislature which requires persons intending to marry to secure a license from the County Clerk. A certificate of consent from the parents or guardian must be filed with the Clerk if either of the contracting parties is a minor. The Marriage-License Law in Pennsylvania has been so amended as to confer on the police magistrates the power to hear applications and to forward them to the Clerk of the Court, who grants the license if the proof is found sufficient. It formerly required the applicant to appear in person before the Clerk.

A stringent high-license bill, which has passed the lower branch of the Michigan Legislature, has been reported in the Senate with the addition of the civil-damages clause which is a part of the present law.

Edward F. Curtis has been appointed Chief of State Police of Rhode Island, vice Charles R. Brayton resigned. The duty of this officer is to enforce the Prohibitory Liquor Law.

Gov. John W. Davis of Rhode Island was inaugurated May 31. He is the first Democratic Governor that the State has had for thirty-four years. A Democratic Lieutenant-Governor was elected by the Legislature.

A bill to regulate telephone rates was rejected in the Massachusetts House on May 25 by a vote of 57 yeas to 105 nays. On the preceding week the House accepted the bill by a vote of 75 yeas to 71 nays. Another effort to admit veterans to the civil service of Massachusetts, without the examination required by the present law, provoked an adverse report by the legislative committee to which the bill was referred.

The Knights of Labor in Cleveland, O., have decided to organize a separate political party. They are said to be able to control about 5,000 votes in the county. They have resolved to put a full State and county ticket in the field next fall.

Not less than 17,000 men are idle in Chicago on account of the strike and lockout in the building trades, and it is believed that 1,000 mechanics have left the city and found work elsewhere. It is estimated that $900,000 has been lost in wages by the men out of work. In addition to this there must be counted, as the financial effect of the strike, a very large sum, representing capital withdrawn from building enterprises this season.

There arrived at Philadelphia, May 29, on the Scandinavia, from Dublin, 100 pauper emigrants from Ireland—men, women, and children—all from County Mayo, who were detained by the Custom-house Inspectors, under the Pauper Immigrant Act. Their passage was paid by the English Government, and they received drafts on the American Exchange, New York, for amounts ranging from £1 to £5. Most of them, however, were met a few days later by kinspeople and friends who were able to provide for them, and they were allowed to land.

During the week ended May 28, 1,531 emigrants left Queenstown for America. This is 400 more than during the corresponding week in 1886.

Customs officers at San Francisco on May 28 seized the German bark Nautilus from Hamburg, on which $3,000 worth of Havana cigars and a quantity of French brandy were found. The brandy was found in boxes labelled "salt pork."

The cup at the intercollegiate athletic meeting May 28 was won by Yale. The sport was good and the intercollegiate record was broken in four events. Harmer of Yale ran the mile in 4 min. 36 4-5 sec.; T. G. Shearman of the same college jumped 21 feet 7½ inches in the running broad jump, and Coxe, also of Yale, threw the hammer 98 feet 6 inches, and put the shot 40 feet 9½ inches, both being new records.

The damage done by the forest fires in the Northern Peninsula of Michigan during the past fortnight is reckoned at $7,000,000, including $2,500,000 caused by the destruction of the town of Lake Linden. Eight persons are known to have perished, and destitution prevails throughout the burned district.

One of the largest fires that have broken out in this city for several years was the burning, early on the morning of May 27, of the Belt Line Street Railroad stables on Tenth Avenue, between Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Streets. The loss is not less than $750,000. Nearly 1,200 horses were burned alive. Several tenement-houses near by were destroyed, and many narrow escapes were made by the occupants. At very nearly the same hour on the same morning the stable of a street railroad company in Cincinnati was burned. It contained more than 300 horses, but none perished.

Near the Horseshoe Bend on the Pennsylvania Railroad on the night of May 28, by a collision of trains eight persons were killed and six injured. On the St. Johnsbury and Lake Champlain Road, near Hardwick, Vt., on the same day, a landslide caused the wreck of a freight train, and three men were killed.

The third death from yellow fever occurred at Key West May 29. The Board of Health has made application for the use of the hospital building at the United States barracks, situated in the outskirts of the town.

Walt Whitman celebrated his sixty-eighth birthday May 30. He received many letters and telegrams of congratulation.

Among the notable persons who have died during the week are: Josiah Sutherland, for many years presiding Judge of the Court of General Sessions, and for twenty years a judge of the New York courts; John K. Tarbox, Insurance Commissioner of Massachusetts; Thomas R. Trowbridge, one of the best known and most respected business men of New Haven; the Rev. Richard Newton, an Episcopalian clergyman of Philadelphia; Mrs. Eliza Blake, one of the first settlers of Indianapolis, whither she went fifty six years ago; Ben: Perley Poore, the well-known Washington newspaper correspondent, and writer of reminiscences of public men and events at the capital; and Henry J. Ramsdell, another well-known Washington correspondent.

FOREIGN.

A new French Cabinet has been formed by M. Rouvier. It consists of M. Rouvier, Premier and Minister of Finance and of Posts and Telegraphs; M. Fallières, Minister of the Interior; M. Flourens, Minister of Foreign Affairs; M. Spuller, Minister of Public Instruction; M. Mazeau, Minister of Justice; Gen. Ferron, Minister of War; M. Barbey, Minister of Marine; M. Barbe, Minister of Agriculture; M. de Hérédia, Minister of Public Works; and M. Dautresme, Minister of Commerce. M. Rouvier declared, in announcing his policy, that the new budget would be prepared in accord with the recent vote of the Chamber. He would maintain the Goblet Cabinet's military bills, and his foreign policy would be firm and prudent. Preparations for the exhibition in 1889 would be actively forwarded. He announced the determination of the Ministry to resign unless they obtained a majority of the Republican votes in the Chamber; that the Ministry would firmly apply the existing legislation on education; and in regard to economy in the public expenditures they proposed to retrench 60,000,000f. Referring to the political color of the Cabinet, the Premier said: "We do not reflect especially the views of anybody." Some one cried: "You are Ferry's double." A resolution was moved of want of confidence in the Government, in the Chamber of Deputies, May 31, and was rejected by a vote of 285 to 139. Deputies of the Right estimate that of the 285 votes received by the Government, 130 were cast by members of the Right. If this be correct, the Government has a purely Republican majority that is very small.

On May 31 a number of youths gathered outside the Chamber of Deputies and cried "Vive Boulanger!" In the evening there was a brilliant assemblage at the military fête at the Opera-house. While the company was assembling, thousands of persons gathered in the vicinity shouting, "Resignation!" "Resignation!" "Long live Boulanger!" "We will have him!" The crowd increased in numbers until it became so turbulent that the Republican Guard, which had been held in readiness, was ordered out to disperse it, and the guard was greeted with hisses. But it was not necessary to make arrests.

The Opéra Comique in Paris was burned on the evening of May 25, when it was filled with an audience. The fire broke out during the first act of the opera "Mignon." One of the wings caught from a gas jet, and the whole stage was immediately enveloped in flames. The fire soon spread to the rest of the house, although the iron curtain was lowered. The audience was panic-stricken, and it is thought that nearly 200 persons perished. On May 28, 75 corpses had been recovered from the ruins. The library of the theatre was destroyed with all its contents, including many valuable scores, and 6,000 costumes were burned. A pamphlet was vended on the streets, two days after the fire, which set forth that if Ministers of Fine Arts had had as high a sense of public duty as has been shown by Gen. Boulanger, the disaster would not have occurred. The Chamber of Deputies has voted a credit of 200,000 francs for the relief of sufferers, and the municipal authorities have ordered the managers of the Palais Royal, the Renaissance, the Ambigu, and the Variétés Theatres to close until alterations have been made which will afford greater security to the public.

The great strike of miners and other laborers in Belgium is not yet ended. The Socialists have taken advantage of the strikes to make demonstrations at various places. They have held meetings at which violent speeches have been made and the red flag displayed. At Verviers the Anarchists incited the strikers to plunder. A mob attempted to parade the streets, but was dispersed by the police with drawn swords, and the gendarmes with fixed bayonets. A committee of strikers wrote to Premier Beernaert demanding universal suffrage and the abandonment of the Cattle Bill, and hinting that if he failed to reply the strikers would march upon Brussels. At a Progressionist-Liberal conference on May 29, a resolution against universal suffrage was adopted by a vote of 317 to 127; but the conference, by a vote of 379 against 45, pronounced in favor of granting the franchise to citizens able to read and write. The North German Gazette (Berlin) says that the Belgian Government has approached Germany on the question of mutual action against Socialistic conspiracies. Since the outbreaks of the strikers the German press has described Belgium as the home and hotbed of Anarchists.

The cotton-spinners at Ashton-under-Lyne, England, have agreed to the proposition made by the spinners in Manchester that the mills should be run on half time for eight weeks in case two-thirds of the trade agree to the plan, on account of the dulness of trade.

Two hundred and twenty miners were entombed in a coal pit at Blantyre, near Glasgow, May 28, by an explosion. The shaft was blocked with débris and many of them perished. Some of the bodies have been taken out, charred and mutilated.

The various British chambers of commerce and similar associations have agreed to issue a protest against the import duties on iron and steel imposed by the Canadian Government.

At Bodyke, Ireland, many tenants have been evicted, and many more have barricaded their homes and organized their friends to assist in resisting the police. A serious conflict is feared. A crowd of 1,500 farm laborers in Wales, May 28, surrounded 200 soldiers and police sent to protect an auctioneer who was selling cattle distrained for tithe, forced them back, caught the auctioneer, turned his coat inside out, led him in procession through the town, and, after roughly handling him, made him sign a promise never to act as auctioneer in that neighborhood again.

Mr. Gladstone wrote May 31 that as the Unionist Liberals have assisted in passing the second reading of the permanent Coercion Bill, the Irish question is virtually settled for the present.

Canon Fleming, one of the Queen's chaplains in ordinary, has been accused by the Pall Mall Gazette of plagiarism, in using as his own in a volume of sermons a sermon by the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage of Brooklyn. He has written to the Gazette that the use of the sermon was "an act of inadvertence." He apologized to Dr. Talmage for the "mistake," but the Gazette declares that no apology can cover his sin.

The race for the (English) Derby Stakes, for three-year olds, was won May 25 by Mr. J. Simons Harrison's bay colt Merry Hampton. On May 27 the race for the Oaks Stakes, for three year old fillies, was won by the Duke of Beaufort's chestnut filly Rêve d'Or.

In the first race on May 28 by the English yachts from Southend to Harwich, the course of fifty miles was finished first by the Thistle. The second boat to cross the line was the Genesta, and she was followed by the Irex. The forty-five-mile yacht race off Harwich May 30 was won by the Irex; and so was the third race on May 31, by a time allowance.

The Anglo-Turkish Convention relative to Egypt provides for the maintenance of all existing firmans and the neutralization of the Suez Canal, and guarantees internationally the inviolability of Egypt. It is stipulated that the British shall withdraw from Egypt in three years unless the country is threatened with danger. England shall thereafter supervise the whole Egyptian Army for two years more, with the right to reoccupy, with or without the aid of Turkish troops, if order is disturbed or an invasion is feared. Russian objection to the convention finds expression in the declaration by the Novoe Vremya of St. Petersburg, which says that it places Egypt under the perpetual tutelage of England.

English engineers are fortifying Herat. Walls and trenches are being strengthened and redoubts built to resist artillery. The Afghans are displaying hatred of the English, and the Amir has been obliged to appoint military officials to protect the men employed on the works. The aim of the English auhorities is to enable a garrison of 10,000 men at Herat to withstand a siege for ninety days.

The Czar has issued a ukase prohibiting aliens from acquiring real property in Russian Poland, and the heir of a foreigner in order to inherit must become a naturalized Russian. The measure has excited indignation at Berlin and Vienna. In the Polish portion of Hungary 2,000 families are themselves property-holders, or have near relatives who are property holders in the proclaimed district. In Germany the act is looked upon as another blow at the German subjects in Western Russia. The law, moreover, which prohibits foreign Jews from carrying on business within the Russian Empire, has now been extended to Poland.

Successful experiments in cotton culture have been made in three different districts of the Caucasus. American, Egyptian, and Caucasian plants are found to flourish equally well. A company has been formed to establish the first extensive plantations, which will be in the vicinity of Erivan. The Caucasian Agricultural Society is about to send two experts to America to study the system of cotton culture there.

Later reports of the incendiary fire near St. Petersburg on May 24 are that sixty houses were destroyed. Placards were posted two days before, declaring that the villas would be burned. When the fire was started, a wind carried the flame from one house to another, and it could not be controlled until sixty villas had been burned. The loss amounts to several million rubles.

The Rothschilds' petroleum conduits near Batum, in Russia, have been destroyed with dynamite. The outrage is said to have been caused by trade jealousy,

The Hungarian Diet was closed May 26, and Emperor Francis Joseph, in a speech to the members, said: "While you, equally with us, desire to maintain peace, should this be impossible, you have shown that every son of our beloved Hungary is ready to defend with his blood the possessions and interests of the throne, monarchy, and fatherland."

At a Papal Consistory, May 26, Mgr. Pallotte and Father Bausa were made Cardinals. Ten bishops were preconized in France and one in Mexico. The Pope proclaimed the new Catholic Hierarchy of Australasia, making the Bishops of Adelaide, Brisbane, and Wellington Metropolitans.

The Vatican, replying to a request for an interpretation of the Pope's recent allocution, has sent circulars to the Papal Nuncios abroad stating that although the Pope's declarations are moderate nothing will be changed, and if the Italian Government desires peace, the Pope is disposed to treat on the basis of the restoration of his temporal power.

The Italian Chamber of Deputies, by a vote of 170 to 49, on May 30 adopted a naval credit for 85,000,000 lire. The money will be expended on ironclads, torpedoes, and forts, the credit to extend over a period of ten years.

The central crater of Mount Etna was discovered to be in a state of eruption May 31. The flow is increasing in volume, and heavy clouds of smoke and masses of stones and cinders are issuing from the crater.

Herr Krupp has finished a 40-centimètre gun, the biggest ever made at Essen. At a trial of the weapon it shot into pieces armor 97 centimètres thick at a distance of 3,000 feet.

Arrangements have been made for a great celebration of the anniversary of the battles of 1870 around Metz. Veterans will go from all parts of Germany.

The report of the English specialist, Dr. Mackenzie, on the condition of the German Crown Prince—that his disease of the throat is not so serious as to debar hope that the trouble may be removed with proper treatment in the course of time—is less assuring than had been expected, and has cast a gloom over official circles in Berlin. A return of the trouble in a more serious form is feared.

A cyclone in India and the Indian Ocean on May 28 destroyed much property and caused the loss of a number of ships. A Calcutta steamer, with 750 persons aboard, was caught by it and has not since been heard of.

Emin Pasha has reported the discovery of a southern affluent of the Albert Nyanza.

Lord Lansdowne spoke at Ottawa May 26 about the O'Brien "invasion," treating it jocularly. He said: "I understand a further object of the invaders was to overrun the country, and above all things to put to flight a certain high official of the State, of whom, unless I misunderstand what has taken place upon this occasion, the people of Ottawa are not particularly anxious to get rid just at present." Mr. O'Brien made an address at Albany May 26, and on the next night made another speech at Montreal. On the 29th he spoke in Boston, where a reception was given to him on the next evening.

The Legislature of Quebec has passed a bill for the abolition of the tax on commercial travellers.

An effort is being made to float a new Quebec loan of $3,500,000 in France. It is expected that more favorable terms will be obtained there than in England.

The first train on the Canadian Pacific Railroad reached the Vancouver ocean terminus May 24. Before that day trains stopped at New Westminster. There was a great celebration of the completion of the line.

Earthquake shocks were felt in the City of Mexico and throughout the valley at 2:50 o'clock on the morning of May 29. The shock lasted five seconds. Next there came, after a low roar, a violent oscillation of the earth from east to west, lasting thirty-nine seconds. Houses swayed and persons arising from their beds were thrown to the floor. Bells were rung in the hotels, and doors were forced open. Then came still another oscillation of much violence, proceeding from north to south. On the same day four shocks, one being of great violence, were felt at Ancona, Italy.

It is reported from Cucuta, Santander, Columbia, that inoculation for yellow fever has proved successful. About 10 per cent. of the inoculated patients have been attacked by the disease, but none of them has died.

REFUNDING THE DEBT.

THE Financial Chronicle makes the suggestion that the reduction of the principal of the public debt which has gone on continuously for more than twenty years, ought not to stop even for the short space that intervenes before the maturity of the 4½ per cent. bonds. These bonds, $250,000,000 in all, become payable in 1891. The Chronicle does not offer any plan for continuing the debt-paying process, but thinks that it is not impossible to contrive some refunding plan that would be acceptable to the bondholders, whereby surplus revenues might be continuously applied to the lessening of the debt, although at some less rapid rate than has prevailed heretofore.

We agree with the Chronicle that debt-paying ought not to stop even for a short time, and that we ought not to dismantle our tax machinery while so large a claim as $1,100,000,000 is still outstanding. The public mind will be in a state of uneasiness as soon as the public debt becomes a stationary, immovable mass, calling for a fixed amount of interest yearly. The people are perfectly willing to be taxed for the reduction of the debt. Indeed, it may be said they are not willing not to be taxed for it. They have been impatient of the debt from the beginning, but impatient only to see it honestly paid and discharged. They have taken a just national pride in seeing it melt away. There have been periods of temporary craze, when a minority have demanded the payment of the bonds in greenbacks. Some few have bewailed the resumption of specie payments because the restoration of parity between specie and paper made the paying of bonds in greenbacks no longer advantageous to the one side or disadvantageous to the other. But among the great mass of citizens there never was a time when any questionable mode of payment would have been acceptable. Nor will there be any such time hereafter. The only ground for discontent will arise when the payment of the debt shall be checked by the inability of the Government to get hold of any bonds to pay and cancel. That time will arrive before Congress meets again in regular session, so that the present discussion is by no means premature.

The Secretary of the Treasury can dispose of his surplus for a few months by anticipating the payment of interest on the debt. That is an awkward scheme of finance, but not so awkward as piling up money in the Treasury. A few millions might be accumulated without danger to business interests, but if any disturbance should occur in the money market, from any cause whatever, it would be ascribed to the hoarding of the Government, and the political consequences would be serious. The Administration would be held accountable for the prosperity of the country at all points. Every man whose business did not go to his liking would blame the Government for making money tight. Paying the interest in advance would be open to criticism in ordinary times, but, as an alternative to the hiding of the people's money in a napkin, it would be approved by ninety-nine out of every hundred persons in the community. It is only as a temporary expedient, and in some sort a necessity, that anybody would recommend it.

What is wanted is a plan for continuing the payment of the principal of the debt without intermission, and without greatly extending the time for the ultimate redemption of the whole. If the whole of it were due now, it would take about ten years to pay it off. Therefore, an extension of some part of it for ten years would be admissible. Any long extension in exchange for a lower rate of interest would not be acceptable. The public mind is fixed rather upon the principal than upon the rate of interest. Refunding cannot be brought before Congress with any hope of success if it contemplates any considerable postponement of the time of final payment.

What, then, can be done? The bondholders cannot be forced to take their money before it is due. A contract has been entered into which must be observed. At the time when it was made it was deemed greatly advantageous to the Government. Bonds bearing a high rate of interest were refunded at a lower rate than had been considered possible in this country. Only ten years have passed, yet so great has been the accumulation of capital in that time that twenty-year loans can be had on Government security at about 2½ per cent. per annum. The 4 per cent. bonds, whose negotiation at par was looked at as something wonderful in 1877, bring nearly 30 per cent. premium. The holders do not want to be disturbed. They only ask to be let alone. Large amounts of the public debt are tied up in trusts and cannot be disturbed. But there are other large amounts, whose situation is well known, that the Government may deal with in a manner satisfactory to the holders and to the taxpayers, i. e., the bonds held by the national banks.

The amount and description of bonds held by the banks are subject to frequent change, but we may assume that they will hold as much as $200,000,000 for all purposes until the maturity of the 4s in 1907. The amount to be paid on these bonds running till 1907 is twenty years' interest, or $160,000,000, plus the principal, being $360,000,000 in all. Now, the problem is to pay as much as possible of this aggregate sum before the next batch of bonds, the 4½s, fall due. If the interest could be reduced to 2½ per cent. instead of 4, the Government could afford to pay the other 1½ per cent. in a lump sum now, seeing that it has no other use for its money; but the banks could afford to take less, since they are in the money-lending business, and could use this premium or advance payment of interest in their loans and discounts at a better rate than 2½ per cent. The 30 per cent. premium on the bonds is realizable now by any holder, whether a bank or a private person. It can be obtained by a mere sale in the open market. Therefore the Government would confer no favor upon any holder by offering him $30 in cash and a new 2½ per cent. bond for his present holding. The banks, however, could and would take less than the market premium, because their premium is not realizable while their notes are outstanding. They can only get it by retiring from business as banks of issue. Upon condition of a change in the law which would not lessen the security of the bank circulation at all, they could afford to take in lieu of the $30 premium a sum which, invested at 2½ per cent., would produce $30 in twenty years. A bank holding $100,000 4 per cent. bonds has a marketable article of $130,000. But this is subject to a shrinkage of $1,500 per year, the whole premium being extinguished in twenty years. By remaining in statu quo the premium is lost. Therefore it can accept less than the premium as a present payment. If the Government can negotiate for anything less, and can substitute a bond at 2½ per cent. instead of 4, it will make a clear gain besides using its present revenues to pay off a future liability.

To illustrate in another way: A bank or other holder of $100,000 4 per cents will get by mere inertia $80,000 interest in twenty years. By accepting a 2½ per cent. bond he will get $50,000 interest plus $30,000 cash (if that should be the agreed premium) plus the use of the $30,000 for twenty years. Of course the agreed premium would not be $30,000, but it might be as much as $20,000. Such a plan would be attractive only to the enterprising class of bondholders, but the banks belong to this class. So also do the savings banks and the life-insurance companies. They know how to make profitable use of the premium if they can once get it. There is another factor in the case of no small importance, viz., the tax on bank circulation. This amounts to 1 per cent. per annum. It is no longer needed by the Government, yet it may properly be used as a make-weight in any plan for refunding the bonds held by the banks.

It has been urged that this plan would have no chance of success in Congress, because it is too complicated to be understood by the people, that an outcry would be raised against the payment of a premium to the bondholders, and that this outcry would be all the louder if the national banks were the ones to reap the premium. The plan has been before Congress for some years without attracting much attention. It was first suggested by Mr. John Jay Knox, then Comptroller of the Currency. It was subsequently introduced in the House by Mr. Hewitt and advocated by him in a speech. It was also, we believe, urged by Senator Jones of Nevada in the Senate. It was not treated seriously in either house, because the subject was not then a pressing one. It has now become pressing and must be treated seriously. We have little doubt that all persons can be made to understand it who can understand any financial question. At all events, a really necessary measure cannot be postponed because a portion of the community are too ignorant or too indolent to comprehend its merits.

DUMB LEGISLATION.

THERE is no phenomenon of our State government, as we see it at Albany, more startling than the increasing tendency to push through pieces of legislation of the most startling character, seriously affecting public and private rights, not only without adequate discussion, but without any discussion whatever. That is to say, we see every winter very grave changes made in the law without being any better informed, or in fact nearly so well informed, of the reason of them than if we lived in Russia, and were governed by imperial ukase, instead of living in New York and being governed by acts and resolutions of a deliberative body controlled by a Constitution. For instance, the Field Code, making marked modifications in the law under which the people of this State have lived for two centuries, was passed in the Assembly, without debate, by the aid of half a-dozen loafing members called in hastily from the lobby. We know what the author of the Code and a number of other well or ill-informed persons have to say for it; but we do not know what reasons influenced the Assembly in passing it. There was no more debate about it, no member thought it any more worth his while to give the people of the State an account of his reasons for making these great changes in their laws, than if he belonged to the Imperial Chancellery at St. Petersburg.

The same thing may be said of the bill providing for the Constitutional Convention. It was, everything considered, a very peculiar bill in various ways, as any one may see by reading Gov. Hill's veto of it. It made various startling departures from what any plain man would consider the natural and proper course in calling such a convention. These departures may have been justifiable. But whether they were justifiable or not, why the bill was first drawn one way and then drawn another way, none of the majority thought it worth his while to tell the public. They simply passed it, just as the Czar issues a decree, as their will and pleasure.

About the High-License Bill, owing to the great public interest in it, there was some discussion, but about the Vedder bill there was very little by legislators. Nobody knows why any legislator voted for it, unless it be Mr. Ernest Crosby, who will never tell. Nor does anybody know why the Insurance-Tax Bill was passed, or what was the influence which operated in the last hours of the session to cause the hurried passage of the shameless bills virtually taking the control of the Central Park out of the hands of the Commissioners in this city, by handing it over to the National Guard as a parade ground, and fixing the portions of it which may be used by bicycles.

We might greatly multiply these illustrations, but the above will serve our purpose. They show that enormous powers over the fortune, comfort, and safety of the people of the State are exercised freely by one of the most dangerous bodies known to civilized men—that is, an assembly which gives no reasons for its decisions. We do not allow judges trained in the law, and selected with care for their probity and capacity, to behave in this way. In every civilized State they are compelled, either by law or usage, when they decide an important controversy, to give in detail the arguments by which they reached their conclusions, not only in order to show whether the conclusions are sound, but also as a check on caprice, or corruption, or favoritism. We know that even bad men shrink from acting wrongly if they are bound to put on record the reasons for acting. And yet we in this State allow a body of obscure men to get together in Albany every winter, and for four or five months to play ducks and drakes with the gravest interests of a great community, without giving anybody the slightest explanation of their conduct, and then sneak back to their villages and farms, with their tongues in their cheeks, to live on their booty, laugh at the indignation of their victims, and be forgotten.

Of course we do not expect every man in the Legislature to get up and give the reasons for his vote. Heaven forbid. But we do expect every political party which shapes or controls legislation in a deliberative body to put forward men capable of speaking for it, of expounding its motives and justifying its policy. Had the Republican party at Albany any such man this winter? Not one. Or last winter? Not one. Has there been the slightest sign of shame over this dumb contempt for the public? Not the slightest.

It will probably be said or thought by some that this silence of the party in the Legislature is at least made up for by the outspokenness of the party organs in the press. Those who think so are egregiously mistaken. The solemn truth is—and we commend it to the serious attention of all good men and women in this State—that the more outrageous or inexplicable the conduct of the majority in the Legislature is, the deeper the silence which the party newspapers maintain about it. Take as an illustration that extraordinary, and, indeed, we might say unprecedented incident, the refusal of the Republican majority in the Senate, for several years running, either to confirm or reject the nominations of Democratic Governors for the Quarantine Commission, so that Republican partisans should be enabled to hold for four and five years offices of which the terms were two and three years. If ever there was conduct by public men which needed explanation, it was this. The need of explanation became absolutely crying when Gov. Hill made three first-class nominations this spring, two of them Republicans, to fill the vacancies, and the Senate again "hung them up." Not one syllable of excuse or elucidation touching this extraordinary performance has come from any Republican in or out of the Senate, and be it well remembered that the Republican party press has been as mute as the politicians. The Organ in this city, which is believed to have more influence with these little gangs of conspirators at Albany than anybody else, and ought to have it by right, has been silent as the grave about the whole matter. The remedy is plain enough. There is only one, and it is easy of application. We must have a revision of the Constitution which will curtail the powers of mischief of these dumb but predatory animals.

FAILURE TO COMPROMISE IN VIRGINIA.

All negotiations between Virginia and her English creditors are at an end. As it is now clear that the sole endeavor of the State was to effect by persuasion what it had failed to effect by laws, threats, and years of litigation — that is, a substantial acquiescence with the "Riddleberger" settlement—the negotiations were of course foredoomed to failure. The creditors are no doubt disappointed, but a review of their position should make them take heart again. The niggardly policy of the State has at least prevented them from being tempted to abandon all their real security by the offer of a large sum, and they will be spared the future bitterness of finding their claims denied to them, principal and interest, and themselves treated to insult and warmed-over excuses, after the manner with which Tennessee treated her creditors. As they now stand, they can fight on, sure that their coupons will have some value not dependent on the pleasure of a repudiating party or State, and it is highly probable that this value will slowly rise after the immediate present.

If, after thus reviewing their position, any of the creditors still fail to feel the advantage of having a legal right in place of Virginia's bare word for a round sum, let him send for a file of Virginia papers and read them. He will find that the refusal to accept the munificent compromise is considered by the repudiators "as a declaration of war." Now who would care to trust to people who can so twist facts that, after harrying their creditors for five years in order to drive them from a legal stronghold, and failing in that, they call the mere refusal to vacate at request an act of aggression too great to be borne?

The newspapers, of course, are full of the severe measures the State will take. They threaten to pass a constitutional amendment repudiating the whole debt, to levy monthly taxes, and darkly hint at other "honorable" measures for destroying the tax-receivable quality of the coupons. But, as the Baltimore Sun dryly remarks, the remedies are not of obvious efficacy. The editors also trust to the chapter of accidents. Stress is laid upon the fact that the death of Mr. Justice Woods will give the President a chance to appoint a successor who will join with a minority in the present court to reverse the decision making coupons tender for taxes. This is puerile. The President may be trusted to fill this important position with an honorable man, learned in the law. The bondholders need ask for nothing more. Such a man will follow what has, with very few exceptions, been the custom of the Supreme Court, and abide by its past decisions. So strong is this rule of abiding by decided cases that there is no fear that the judges who dissented from the opinion in the 114th United States Reports would reverse the decision now. They abode by the majority opinion in the 116th United States, and the necessary grounds of the decision are too narrow to be changed by anything short of reversal. The Virginians should recognize once for all that nothing short of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States can change the tax-receivable quality of the coupons.

As to the chapter of accidents outside of the courts, the bondholders have much more to hope. Virginia is now probably at its lowest moral and intellectual ebb. Though the State as a whole is richer than before the war, its best people, by a transfer of wealth, are poorer. In consequence its energetic blood has emigrated, its citizens have taken high places, especially in Maryland, New York, and the Pacific States, and are indeed scattered all over the West and North. The gap left has not yet been filled. On the contrary, Mahone, Riddleberger, and Massey have been the dominating influences over both political parties, to which men of placid temperament and not particularly strong character, like Fitz-Hugh Lee, have been obliged to succumb. Emigration has not set in sufficiently to make its influence felt. But in the future, when the West becomes practically filled up, it is not unlikely that the population of Virginia will change. Western and Northern capital and energy will develop it, and bring in business principles to replace the present mawkish sentimentality and public dishonesty. Then Virginians will see that it will actually pay to have good credit, and will settle their debt. So far the whites only have been spoken of. With the colored people there is still more hope of advance. The schools are educating them rapidly, and with education they will be far more subject to the appeals of reason and honesty than at present. A Riddleberger and a Mahone will find them less supple tools for their demagogic purposes.

At the same time, unless the creditors could continue to worry the State, their position would be a precarious one. If the State could prevent the coupons from entering its treasury, its legislators would feel so rich that the same faults of intellect and character which prevent them from paying their debts, would cause them to run into all sorts of extravagant expenditures. Even now State pensions begin to agitate the politicians' brains, and next we should hear of internal improvements, schemes for making Norfolk rival New York, subsidies to railways, monuments to public characters, and the other hundred schemes for frittering away the public money. But upon this the coupons will be a constant check. The higher the taxes the more temptation for paying them with coupons, and their menace will spoil the State's credit. Thus it will be impossible to forget their debts, and the two greatest dangers in a matter of this sort, stolid forgetfulness and actual inability to pay, will be prevented. In 1795 Georgia made her famous Yazoo land sales. In 1796 she repudiated the sales and publicly burnt the Act of '95 before the State-house, using a sun-glass that fire from heaven might be called down upon the act. In 1798, to emphasize further her repudiation, a new Constitution was formed to embody it, and that same year, at her instigation, the eleventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which gives States immunity from suit, was passed. Yet, with all these barriers against the claims, they continued to be agitated, and in the end the State was glad to cede the lands, subject to the claims, to the United States. The matter thus became transferred to the national Government, and, through the virulence of John Randolph, long remained unsettled, but finally, in 1814, a compromise was made by which the creditors received $8,000,000.

No better instance could be given of the difficulty of shaking off a just claim. The Yazoo land sales were undoubtedly carried through the State Legislature by bribery, and the equity of the claimants depended solely upon the fact that they were innocent purchasers for value. In Virginia's case there is no question of bribery or doubt that she has received full value; and her creditors, instead of having nothing except pluck and a strong sense of right to depend upon, have in the coupon an automatic torment for the State Treasury.

DIRT ROADS.

ABOUT this time of the year Americans begin to give an amount of attention to roads and road-making which is sadly wanting during the rest of it. There is probably no people in the world which has made such progress in the arts of civilized life generally that seems to care so little for what a good many social philosophers put among the very foremost of them, the art of road-making. In fact, some philosophers have pronounced the history of roads the history of civilization. Nothing distinguishes a civilized country from a barbarous one so markedly as the difference in the means of communication between one locality and another. As a general rule, one knows that a people is rising in the social scale by seeing its roads improve; one knows that it is declining by seeing its roads go out of repair. Nothing marked so vividly the great plunge into barbarism which Europe took after the fall of the Roman Empire as the disappearance of the superb lines of communication which led from the Forum straight as an arrow to every corner of the Roman world. Nothing, too, tells the tale of Chinese decadence so distinctly as the ruin which has overtaken the great roads and canals which at an earlier period connected the capital with the provinces. When an American goes to Europe for the first time, nothing seems odder than the superiority of the European roads in countries which can make no pretence of equalling the United States in other marks of material progress. We are not a declining people; on the contrary, we are the most growing people in the world. We are not among the poor nations of the globe; on the contrary, we are probably the very richest. We are not indifferent to material improvement; on the contrary, the most frequent charge made against us is that we give too much attention to it; and yet we are worse off by far, in the matter of roads, than any other highly civilized community.

The original reason of the American indifference about roads was probably the rapidity with which the early settlers scattered themselves in small communities over wide areas. The fewer people there are to the square mile of inhabited territory, of course the costlier roads become; and when population is very much dispersed, as in frontier settlements, people cease to think of good roads as a luxury within their reach, and devote themselves simply to the task of keeping them passable. This tendency to neglect the art of road-making would probably have disappeared early in this century if the railroads had not come in as the great lines of communication, thrown the post roads and military roads out of use, and relegated all roads but railroads to the condition of cross roads or byways. The railroads not only did this, but they dispersed the settlers over still wider areas than ever, and thus made the prospect of running a good highway past every man's door seem hopeless. The consequence has been that the early colonial or frontier state of mind—in which a road was considered good enough if it was simply practicable to wheeled vehicles (that is, if there were no holes or rocks in it sufficiently formidable to upset a carriage), and anything better than this an unattainable luxury—has almost settled into a national tradition.

One has only to go a few miles out of any of our large cities to find the roads in every direction being repaired in the exact manner in which they were repaired by the struggling colonists between 1630 and 1700—that is, nothing is attempted beyond filling up the holes with any material that is at hand, and affording facilities for the water to run off. The material that is at hand is, of course, the mud or compost out of the adjacent ditch. This is shovelled up with the utmost gravity and deposited all along the centre, filling up the cavities and hiding from view the projecting rocks. In districts in which gravel or strong clay is obtained in this way, the result is often satisfactory enough. But as a general rule the contents of the ditch are simply mud or decayed vegetable matter, fit only for manure. Spread over the road as a plaster, it rapidly becomes dust and is swept away by the wind, or else becomes mud and is washed back again into the ditch, or down into the hollows, in which in wet weather it forms a kind of quagmire, through which horses toil wearily. The one advance we have made in this curious process over the early colonists is the invention of the large iron scoop or shovel, worked by oxen or horses, as a substitute for the manual labor of the olden days. A foreigner, seeing it at work for the first time, is always disposed to believe that the road is being prepared for a crop of some kind, and as a matter of fact we have ourselves seen many a mile of country road in which, after the spring repairs, potatoes or corn would have grown very luxuriantly.

Of course there are signs of progress out of this primitive condition in the more densely settled districts on the eastern coast and in the neighborhood of the large cities. The Park roads, with which people have been made familiar during the past thirty years, have shown those who have never been abroad what a good road is, and have thus raised the standard of road-making, as the Vienna bakery raised the standard of bread-making all over the country after the Philadelphia Exposition in 1876. But most rural districts suffer greatly from not having a standard at all. Some of those who tax themselves most freely suffer most, because the plentiful supply of money not only does not improve the roads, but breeds a political ring, who treat it as "boodle." The reason they suffer is that, as they have no standard of goodness in roads, and do not make specific requirements as to what shall be done to keep the roads in order, it is never possible to bring trustees, or selectmen, or roadmasters to a proper account. They always escape if they can show they have put on the annual spring plaster; and when it is washed away, as it is sure to be a little later, they throw the blame on the freshets; and the simple citizen, not knowing what to say in answer to them, says nothing. We have seen the plaster applied to projecting rocks in a steep declivity in the middle of a great highway within twenty miles of New York, year after year, without a word of remonstrance from anybody, and without any demand for the use of the sledge-hammer for the safety of horses and carriages. The waste of all this, through the wear and tear of animals, vehicles, and harness, is of course immense. As it is not easy to calculate it, it makes but little impression on the popular mind, but it probably far surpasses the cost of thorough repair or macadamization. Until a standard has been set up, increased votes of money for road-making will in populous districts simply result in the multiplication of the people who live by "politics."

There is little doubt, too, that not only was the light wagon, for which America is now famous, produced by the badness of our roads, but it now helps to keep the roads bad by diminishing in the public eye the inconvenience of them. The wagon in which Americans delight, and which no other nation has yet been able to imitate, really gets over bad roads almost as easily as a saddle or pack-horse: we have seen it jump a fence behind a runaway with a certain grace and dexterity. But bad roads tell on it rapidly also, though not perhaps as rapidly as on heavier vehicles. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that a light wagon would last one-third longer on an English or Swiss road than on ours, and would be a far greater luxury. Nobody shows more appreciation of the smooth, hard park roads than the trotting men, although they prefer the dirt road to "speed" on; and they may be said to be the only class of the community to whose needs or wishes attention in the matter of road-making has been paid. The owners of heavy vehicles have been left to get along as best they can, although they use roads for business and not for pleasure. In no department of our material progress, in fact, is there so much need of reform as in our road-making, and above all in our road-repairing, whether we look at the matter from the health or the pleasure point of view.

THE NEW LIGHT ON THE KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS.

GRASMERE, NEAR LEXINGTON, Ky., May 24, 1887.

I HAVE read with great interest Miss Randolph's recent communication in the Nation upon the Kentucky Resolutions of 1798, and place a very high value upon its important contribution to the history of the much-vexed question of their authorship. At the same time I cannot entirely concur in the conclusion expressed in the last paragraph of her letter, nor, indeed, in all of the subordinate conclusions of her skilfully constructed argument.

In the first place, while Mr. Jefferson gives in his letter of December 11, 1821, very glaring examples of the lapses of his memory as to details—lapses such as show a failure of memory as to the minor circumstances connected with events themselves clearly remembered—yet it is a matter of history that Mr. Jefferson's memory was to the very last singularly well preserved as to the events in which he had been an actor. It is a universal experience, moreover, that the memory retains events with far greater distinctness than the circumstances attending them, the persons participating in them, or the words spoken at the time of their occurrence. It would seem, then, that a very substantial chain of circumstantial evidence would be required successfully to combat the direct testimony of Mr. Jefferson as to the conference of 1798, especially as that conference, if it ever took place, was the birth-moment of a plan which led to momentous results.

It being now settled that "your father," in the letter of December 11, 1821, was John Breckinridge, the evidence of the letter from Jefferson to W. C. Nicholas fully corroborates the testimony of Mr. Jefferson that John Breckinridge and W. C. Nicholas were his principal coadjutors, and that Mr. Madison was at least "consulted." And to my mind the letters of October 5, 1798, and October 10, 1798, both indicate very plainly considerable antecedent discussion. On October 10 Mr. Breckinridge was on the eve of his return to Kentucky. Mr. Jefferson had abandoned the idea of the Resolutions being first offered in North Carolina; Mr. Breckinridge had somehow gained his entire confidence; he had conveyed to Col. Nicholas the opinion that "everything is said that can be said in the paper" then in Mr. Breckinridge's possession. Not only so, but there is a suggestion in the letter of October 10 that the visit intended to be paid by Mr. Breckinridge to Mr. Jefferson, the "delicacy and motives" for his omission of which Mr. Jefferson so highly appreciated, was not the first or only visit of this trip, but the farewell visit, and that the "delicacy and motives" of its omission were nothing less than the desire to avoid attracting attention by too frequent calls at Monticello after the "consultation" had taken place, in order that no one should suspect that Jefferson had helped concoct the Kentucky Resolutions.

Let me here introduce a letter which throws a strong side-light on the way the actors in this little drama were moving. This letter is from Caleb Wallace, a man, at the time of its date, of prominence in Kentucky politics, a member of the Legislature from Woodford County, and an intimate friend of John Breckinridge and George Nicholas. It was written to Mr. Breckinridge at Frankfort, whither he had already gone to attend the Legislature:

"LEXINGTON, November 5, 1798.

"DEAR SIR: I congratulate you on your return to your family and county, and am happy to hear that you are in good health. I long to see you, but do not expect to have that pleasure till about the middle of the month, about which time I must go to Frankfort. The letter which you sent from Botetourt lay in one of my neighbors' houses two or three weeks, so that I did not receive it until a few days ago, so that I have not had time to pay attention to the request made in your letter; indeed, I do not think myself capable of draughting anything of so great importance. I think that the main points to which the Legislature ought to attend are the Alien and the Sedition Laws and the laws respecting raising regulars and volunteers, all of which are certainly unconstitutional in the most dangerous instances; the first affecting the trial by jury, the second the freedom of the press, the two great palladiums of liberty. But I think the last is the most highly dangerous, because, if in the present instance the Executive does not abuse the powers with which Congress has invested him, it will become a popular precedent for giving the same powers on some future occasion. I feel great anxiety that the conduct of our Legislature should be firm, spirited, and constitutional, and, therefore, would go to Frankfort in a few days, but I have been lately much harassed by some of my old bodily infirmities, and I have now been here two or three days, by which I find myself injured.—I am, dear sir, your friend and servant, CALEB WALLACE.

"N. B. Our friend Nicholas is now publishing a letter on the points I have mentioned, which I think more masterly than any other that has appeared on them. If you doubt the temper of the Legislature, would it not be best to keep the business in agitation until the members have an opportunity to read the letter?"

Mr. Breckinridge's letter from Botetourt, which had made the journey to Kentucky, lain for two or three weeks at a neighbor's, and been left unanswered several days on November 5, must have been written early in October. If that letter ever is resurrected, it will probably have a tale to tell; but in its absence we may at least see plainly that Mr. Breckinridge was not only consulting with the Vice-President and Col. Nicholas in Virginia, but also writing to urge a Kentucky legislator "to draw something" setting out his views of the protest proper to be made.

And, after all, what is the kernel of the matter? There are two sets of resolutions extant—one set found among Mr. Jefferson's papers, and another passed by the Kentucky Legislature. The two problems, then, are: Who drew the Jefferson set? was it the original draft? Who altered it into the Kentucky form? If the "Jefferson draft," so called, was the first draft, then its penman substantially drew the Kentucky Resolutions. But, me judice, the alterations in the form actually adopted were of such a bold and radical nature as to make their author the responsible author, and to show that he so regarded himself.

John Breckinridge exerted himself in July and August, 1798, to have the citizens of Fayette and the adjoining counties pronounce in mass meeting against the Alien and Sedition and Army Bills, both before and after they became laws. In the Kentucky Gazette of Lexington, an anonymous writer, signing himself Philo-Agis, urged that the Legislature be "immediately convened by the Governor," and that it should "pass resolutions praying for a repeal of every obnoxious and unconstitutional act of Congress." This letter, published on August 22, is, I believe, the first suggestion that the Legislature should take up the matter which was being pressed by mass meetings and petitions to Congress. It was about the time of this publication that Mr. Breckinridge set out for Virginia. So far from the visit of Mr. Breckinridge to Monticello, mentioned in Mr. Jefferson's letter to Cabell Breckinridge in 1815, being, as Miss Randolph assumes, his only visit, it was only the first of a long series. During Mr. Jefferson's absence at the Court of St. Denis, Mr. Breckinridge had moved to Charlottesville and begun the practice of the law there. He had already, upon Mr. Jefferson's return, become intimate with Monroe and the Nicholases—an intimacy which Mr. Jefferson, when he had, as he himself says, in their first interview, "opportunity sufficient to discern the large scope of his mind, the stores of information laid up in it, and the moral direction given to both," with his usual graciousness, made haste to share. It seems almost impossible to credit that, Mr. Jefferson being at home, Mr. Breckinridge could have failed to see him during his visit to his old home at Charlottesville, in the weeks just before the Jefferson-Nicholas letter of October 5.

And if a determination to have the autumn campaign begin in North Carolina had been abandoned, where shall we look for a more natural cause of this change than the influence of Mr. Breckinridge, fresh from Kentucky, not only ripe for action, but ripe for action through the Legislature? Whether Nicholas first suggested the action that was finally decided on to Jefferson, or whether Breckinridge brought the idea from Kentucky, Breckinridge had a paper prior to the receipt of the letter of October 5 containing all that the other two thought could be said. Who drew this paper? This, no doubt, is the something that Jefferson was asked to draft and drew, according to the letter of December 11,

1821. If it was the same as that found in his papers, who altered it? It would seem, from the attitude of the letter from Caleb Wallace and Mr. Breckinridge's future conduct, that it was he; that he took what liberty with it he pleased, and always felt that he was entirely responsible for the final form of his resolutions. The Kentucky Legislature pointed to his "resolves" as a chief reason for making him Senator; Mr. Jefferson made them the basis of his after-promotion; Matthew Lyon, the arch-sufferer under the Sedition Law, claims greatness for him as the writer of the Resolutions; John Nicholas, the eloquent assailer of the odious laws, says to him in a letter in the following year, when speaking of the Resolutions of '99, they "are, I suspect, as well as the first handsome production on the same occasion, without intending to flatter, the effort of one who never failed to have a considerable influence over me."

The preponderance of the proof seems strongly in favor of a conference—of a conference, too, from which some kind of a paper came forth, drawn, Mr. Jefferson says, by himself; drawn, the Breckinridge family claim, by John Breckinridge; drawn, as Miss Randolph would seem to infer, by W. C. Nicholas without any conference at all, but so drawn as to meet the general approval of Jefferson, Madison, Nicholas, and Breckinridge.

The following letter, taken from an unsigned copy in Mr. Breckinridge's handwriting and found in his papers, has two interesting points in it which may justify its reproduction. It shows how the suggestions of the letter of September 5, '99, to W. C. Nicholas were acted on, and with how great independence they were treated by Mr. Breckinridge; and, also, how early the people even in Kentucky awoke to the dangerous sound of that fearful word "nullification":

"FRANKFORT, Ky., December 9, 1799.

"DEAR SIR: I took the liberty by the last post of enclosing to you the proceedings of our Legislature (now in session) in support of their Resolutions of the last session, respecting the Alien and Sedition Laws. It was at the opening of the session concluded to make no reply, but lest an improper construction should be put on our silence, we drew up the paper which I enclosed you. In the lower house (of which I am a member) there was not a dissenting voice. In the Senate there was considerable division, particularly on that sentence which declares 'a nullification of those acts by the States to be the rightful remedy.' It so happens that what little Federal influence exists among us is at present concentered in the Senate. The elections of Senators in every district, under our new Constitution, which must be made viva voce by the people, instead of by electors, will extinguish even this little influence. The great mass of the people are uncontaminated and firm, and as all appointments now flow from the people, those who hold sentiments contrary to theirs will be discarded."

Systematic search, such as Miss Randolph, Col. Durrett, and others have recently made in this matter, is far more satisfactory in its results than speculation; and I hope that while I institute a careful inquiry after the letter of John Breckinridge to Caleb Wallace, Miss Randolph or some one else will try to trace out W. C. Nicholas's letter to Jefferson of October 4, as well as Col. Nicholas's letter, if any was ever written, taking Mr. Madison into his confidence.

ETHELBERT D. WARFIELD.

THE WARWICKSHIRE LABORER.

WARWICKSHIRE, May 16, 1887.

IT is difficult to say whether the agricultural depression of the last ten years has pressed most heavily on landowner, farmer, or agricultural laborer in Warwickshire. And in speaking of the condition of the laborer, the condition of his employers must naturally be considered.

In our parish, some of the farms are pretty stiff clay; others are rich loam on gravel. The grass lands are well adapted to dairying, to sheep, and to the raising of young stock. But big "beasts" will not fatten upon them without cake, as they do on the heavy, rank grass of the deep clay lands in the plain of Warwickshire—the "Folden," as George Eliot calls it. Such land as ours requires thoroughly good farming, plenty of labor, and a generous expenditure of capital in stock and manures to make it pay.

Among the farmers in our village, renting farms of two hundred to three hundred acres from Lord ———, who owns the parish, some few are living on the same farms their fathers had before them. One or two own freehold property in other parishes. Three are tradesmen in the neighboring town. The rest are new-comers; for, during the disastrous decade through which we have just passed, many of the farms have changed hands more than once. When young beasts that sold seven years ago for £17 now fetch £10; when, owing to the wet, wheat crops fail both in quantity and quality to such an extent that they do not cover the expense of planting; when whole flocks of sheep are swept off by that horrible disease, "the fluke," which in this parish attacked even calves and foals, while in Northamptonshire the hares lay dead from it by the hundred—farmers, unless they have capital to fall back upon, cannot make a living.

The landlords, rather than have the land thrown on their hands, are willing to let the farms at greatly reduced rents to men with small capital. These new-comers can employ but little labor. A father and his two sons, with a boy, will attempt to work a clay farm, mostly arable, which in old days, when farming paid well, employed six men and three boys. The land, in consequence, is not properly farmed. The limited amount of stock is not sufficient to provide dressing for the ground. There is little ready money to buy manure from the town; none to expend on costly artificial manures. Short crops and dirty land are the results; and when the farmer has squeezed all he can out of the soil, he too often gives his year's notice, and is off to seek fresh fields and pastures new, when the same process is repeated.

Landlords are severely blamed for letting their farms to such tenants. It is undoubtedly most unfortunate for all concerned. But, in the present state of things, one does not wonder that any alternative seems preferable to farming the land themselves. Unless they possess very large private fortunes, the landlords, with no rents coming in, have not capital to meet the enormous outlay entailed by farming two or three thousand acres of midland clay lands, and they think themselves fortunate if they can get tenants at all, at however low a rent. Those who are free to sell their estates find great difficulty in getting purchasers, as few people wish to invest in so useless and expensive a commodity.

On all sides we see fine old houses shut up or let to rich manufacturers, who do not understand the laborers, and are looked upon by them as interlopers. "He ain't no gentleman," is the remark we hear, in spite of gifts of blankets and soup, and big subscriptions to the village charities. The home-parks of great estates are let for grazing to the butchers of the towns, who are about the only prosperous members of the community, for the retail price of meat has not fallen at all in proportion to the fall of price in stock. Every day timber wagons pass, carrying the grand elms of our county—"the Warwickshire weed"—cut down by the half-ruined landowners, who are selling their horses, giving up their carriages, reducing their establishments, and are waited on by neat parlor maids, instead of the butlers and footmen of a few years ago. To their honor be it said that their local charities have not been reduced in any one case that has come under our notice; but, of course, less labor is employed on the estates when there is no money to pay for improvements.

This state of things with landlords and tenant farmers presses heavily on the laborer. Instead, however, of generalizing, it may be worth while to examine the condition of the day laborers in our village at this moment, and see how they are housed, how they are clothed and fed, and on what they live.

Many of the cottages are 250 years old. These are the half-timbered red-brick or white-plastered houses which give such a picturesque look to the place. They are fairly comfortable dwellings, two-storied, with little diamond-paned windows which open, but do not let in much light. In some of them we find good old black-oak furniture; and with flowering plants on the ledge of the long, low window, a red-brick floor, with a bit of carpet, perhaps, by the table, and a blazing coal fire in the good close range which has been fitted into the vast ancient fireplace, with its cosey chimney corner, some of our cottage kitchens make a pretty and cheerful picture. The rest of the houses in the village are of the pattern which ought to be suppressed by public opinion if not by law—three and four-roomed cottages on the ground with no upper floor. These were built by squatters who, some sixty to a hundred years ago, were allowed by the negligence of an agent of the then Lord ———, to run up these human pigsties on any outlying bit of ground. They have all been bought up at great expense by Lord ——— and made as habitable as their plan permits, with good windows and doors and the excellent close ranges which are now almost universal in the cottages; and as he can afford it, he pulls them down and builds decent dwellings in their place. For these cottages, with an excellent garden, as we have said elsewhere, the rent is from £2 to £4 a year.

A stranger coming into the village on Sunday is struck with the well-to-do look of the people. The men are all well dressed. In summer nearly every one of the younger men has his cutaway black coat for church, and in winter a thick warm greatcoat, while the dandies of the village go in for ulsters. The working-day clothes are a short white "slop" over a tweed or corduroy jacket, with corduroy or tweed trousers, and leather gaiters. Among the elder men the serviceable cord knee-breeches and gaiters, the double-breasted waistcoat with long sleeves, and the short embroidered white smock are still worn—the last remnant of costume in Warwickshire. The elder women still favor the short bedgown—a loose jacket over which the plain full-plaited skirt of linsey or cotton is fastened—a cotton sunbonnet, and a small three-cornered shawl. But the younger ones have adopted the latest fashions—ulsters, tight jackets, hats, feathers, flowers, flounces, frills, and "dress improvers" to any extent. Some of our girls are charmingly turned out. But one sees that every penny of wages that our maidens earn at service must go on to their backs instead of into their pockets.

As to food, a branch of a large coöperative store at Emscote is established in the village, managed by one of the villagers. Here, for ready money, all the necessaries of life except meat can be had. Tea, bread, butter, treacle, or jam, with a bit of bacon sometimes, is the laborer's breakfast. No house goes without its good bit of fresh meat on Saturday for the Sunday dinner. This will be made to last for three or four days; and if no more can be afforded, the dinners for the rest of the week are eked out with bacon, for every one keeps a pig. The other meals—tea or supper—are made up of bacon, cheese, bread, and dripping. "John and the children is that sot on drippin'," a wife will say to one; and the taste for this (to us) peculiarly repulsive form of food extends among servants and farmers. "Kettle-broth" is also a favorite Warwickshire dish. This is simply bread seasoned with salt and pepper, over which boiling water, sometimes thickened with a little flour, is poured. The children devour it for their suppers with the greatest relish. Most of the men drink beer with their dinners, but there is no drunkenness in the parish.

The wages of an able-bodied farm laborer are here about twelve shillings a week in winter and fourteen in summer. In some of the more remote parts of Warwickshire they are at this moment only eleven shillings. Women can earn from one shilling to one-and-sixpence a day at field work, i. e., turnip and swede-cutting, stone-picking, weeding, and hay-making. Carters and cowmen get thirteen to fourteen shillings a week, with a house, or fifteen shillings without one. Boys get four to five shillings a week going with the teams, etc. During the harvest month the men get £6 for the four weeks and "find themselves," or £5 to £5 10s. when the farmer gives them beer. The former plan is now largely adopted.

The trouble in the last few years has been that, as we have said, the farmers, owing to the bad times, have reduced the number of their laborers, so that now there are more men in the parish than there is work for. Men get a few days' job here and there. They were nearly all at work last harvest, but even in harvest several were unable to get work, while on one farm eleven Irish laborers were employed. The reasons given by the men for this apparent injustice were, first, that the Irishman will always undersell the Englishman; and this is true enough. If one of our men offered to work at 3s. a day, the Irishman would promptly come down to 2s. 6d., and so on. Secondly, they put it on "the spite of the farmers to the laborers." That there is but little love lost between some of the farmers and a good many of the laborers is undeniable. The old relations of mutual esteem and help were well-nigh destroyed during the troubles of the "Laborers' Union" twelve to fifteen years ago, and it is only in a few cases that the former kindly feeling still exists. Some of the farmers look on the men as idle, lazy, insolent fellows, who are only too glad to stop work at a critical moment in hopes of a rise of wages. The men, on the other hand, say the farmers are capricious, hard, grinding them down to the lowest possible price. As usual, there is some truth and a good deal of exaggeration on both sides.

With regard to the employment of Irish labor, the farmers undoubtedly prefer men who, though they are inferior workmen, can be driven here and there as no Warwickshire laborer could be, and can be turned off at a moment's notice. They have but little sense of duty to their neighbors, and cannot see why they should employ a man who is living in actual want at their gate when they can get the work done more cheaply by a travelling Irishman, who, as they say, "doesn't dare sauce them." The laborer, on the other hand, is not what he was, and we found upon careful inquiry that the men who were out of work last summer were usually—but not in all cases—bad workmen, or sickly, sulky, quarrelsome fellows. It is a lamentable but certain fact that the present generation are less good workers than their fathers, and distinctly worse than their grandfathers. They take less pains about their work. They will come to work one day and absent themselves without reason or warning the next. In this parish there are but two middle-aged men who can thatch. None of the younger ones know how to do it, and as ricks and cottages must still be thatched, one wonders what will happen when these two useful and much-sought-after persons are laid among their fathers in the green churchyard on the hill. In the same way there are but two or three men who can "splash and lay" a quickset hedge, and they are not the artists in "hedging and ditching" their fathers were. The railroads, domestic service, and the colonies drain off the greater number of our most intelligent and energetic young men, and among those who remain we begin to see a growing distaste for field-labor, which opens up unpleasant problems for the agricultural future of the midlands.

In the winter of 1885-86, the distress in our village was very great. Young, strong men, some of them with a wife and babies to support, were for two, four, and sometimes six months without more than one day's work in a fortnight. With the splendid endurance of our laborers, no one begged. Last summer the excellent and energetic rector and two of his parishioners determined, in view of the coming winter, to help some of the young single men to emigrate to Australia, where an exceedingly advantageous opening had been found. What was their surprise, not to say disgust, when only three men out of the whole village came forward; and these three, after giving endless trouble, finished by saying, "Well, it wur a long way. They was afraid of the water. There was always a day's work to be got somewheres. They thought on the whole they'd rather stay at home. Why did we want for they to go? Did we want to get rid of they out of the place?"

Here is the average midland laborer in a nutshell: blindly devoted to the soil, to his native place, absolutely unadventurous, incapable of taking the initiative, not over-industrious, and afraid of unknown hardships, suspicious of any fresh proposal, without a spark of patriotism or public feeling. It is not that he is stupid—far from that. He reads his paper every day and understands it; he is sharp enough in managing his own concerns, and will work capitally under good leadership if he can be persuaded that he has something to gain and nothing to lose. But he cannot endure taking an unaccustomed step. He is more than content to stay at home and run the risk of starving if only he may live in the same cottage, in the same village, doing the same work, earning the same wages, and exercising the Englishman's prerogative of grumbling all round.

THE EXCAVATIONS AT CROTON.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In a letter to the Nation, dated April 27, Prof. Rodolfo Lanciani has brought grievous charges against the conduct of the researches lately carried on, under the auspices of the Archæological Institute of America, at the temple of Hera Lakinia, Croton. He nominally writes in reply to a note published in the same paper conjointly by Dr. Alfred Emerson and myself. He has chosen, however, to ignore altogether the part taken by my companion in the matter, thus devolving upon me alone the duty of justifying the steps taken in a work—certainly successful in scientific respects—the credit of which we share in equal measure.

The great Doric temple of Hera, near Croton, although the most famous monument of the Greeks in Italy, has, up to the present time, almost entirely escaped the attention of students of antique architecture. No representations whatever of its remains have hitherto been published. After the site of this building had been accurately surveyed by us—a work which occupied nearly a month—it was found to be desirable to undertake some digging, in order to determine the extent of the plan and the character of certain parts of the superstructure. Permission to do this was obtained from the owner of the ground, indeed, of the entire Lakinian promontory—Baron Luigi Berlingieri, Sindaco of Cotrone, a gentleman to whose friendly interest and furtherance the work is greatly indebted. Before beginning the digging, we suggested to him that notification of the intended excavations should be sent to the authorities at Rome. Against this step he not only protested, he actually made it impossible by declaring that, should we recognize the right of other officials than those of Croton to grant permission for excavating the site, he would withdraw that given by himself. It subsequently became evident to us that this position was determined by a desire to uphold the laws obtaining in Calabria. The jurists of Cotrone, one of whom we consulted upon the point, hold that the decree published in Rome concerning archæological explorations—the so called legge Facca—is applicable only to the Roman provinces; Calabria, in this respect, still enjoying the privileges granted by the edicts of 1823.* The owner of the ground sharing this view, and being himself the highest official in the district, it would have been futile for us to insist upon a contrary course. Moreover, the excavations at the temple were, in all that regarded the legal aspects of the case, undertaken not by us Americans, who claimed no part of the discoveries as a right, but by Baron Berlingieri, Mayor of Cotrone, who, we might reasonably assume, would commit no illegal act. As if in premonition of the question which has now arisen, that gentleman wrote, in his official capacity, to the prefect of the province, stating that he himself assumed all responsibility for the excavations. This document will be found on file at Catanzaro.

Can these facts be reconciled with the assertion, made by Prof. Lanciani, that "no permission was obtained from the local authorities"? Yet it is upon the implication of wrong in this respect that all his charges of "rebellion" and of "want of the most elementary principles of international and personal courtesy on the part of Mr. Clarke" are grounded.

In the sequestration of the objects discovered, the greater number were not taken from our hands, but from a dwelling of Baron Berlingieri, adjoining the site of the temple. A false impression is conveyed by the reference to the burial of these antiques as a step taken "to protect and insure the preservation of ancient marbles," since many of the objects in question (such as fragile glass, and terracotta ornaments with delicate traces of painting) must have been broken and defaced by the stones and earth with which they were covered.

The digging was not carried on for a single moment after the suspension of the work had been decreed, and the first and only notification conveyed to us by a high official of Cotrone, who came to the Cape unaccompanied. Yet Prof. Lanciani states: "He (Clarke) was warned many times to stop his illegal proceedings; he did not pay the slightest attention to the warning. Finally, the Government was compelled to resort to the last argument in its power—the direct interference of the police." The character and intention of these assertions will become evident when I state that Prof. Lanciani, before the publication of his communication to you, had been clearly informed of the truth in regard to this point, through a letter from Dr. A. L. Frothingham, jr., one of the promoters of the undertaking.

*It is a fact—of no bearing upon the present question, indeed, but of interest as a sign of public opinion and the state of the law in Italy—that in Rome itself the legge Facca has been successfully contested in court. Of this I am informed by a letter from an eminent archæologist, dated Florence, May 2.

Prof. Lanciani has in your columns proclaimed himself to be "a person fully and minutely acquainted with Mr. Clarke's doings from beginning to end," and declares that "there is not a particle of truth in his [Clarke's] statements." Libellous personalities, such as these and other passages of the letter, are unworthy of notice. Concerning the points to which I have referred—and they are the only ones upon which Prof. Lanciani has based his attack—I must leave your readers to decide as to the relative correctness of our information and the veracity of our statements. WHY HAVE WE NO SKYLARKS?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Is there any reason why we cannot acclimate the skylark? I believe it is only a question of method. Small numbers of them have been imported and turned loose, for example, on Long Island near Brooklyn; but though they seemed to do well at the time, they have not returned in the following spring. In other words, the attempts have been failures, and this has been because we commenced at the wrong end!

I will explain: The skylark is a migratory bird that lives on insects, of which our Northern winters furnish him no supply. To obtain this food he must go South, but he is a stranger in a strange land. I believe, from such study as I have been able to give it, that the migration of birds is not a mere exhibition of restlessness, but a result of the struggle for existence. A region becomes overstocked by them, and they wander in search of food and breeding-places. Instinct (inherited memory) carries them back to the winter home, whence in the following spring they return to the breeding-places of the year before.

Now, whether this reasoning is true or false, the fact is that the previous attempts at introduction have failed. There are no skylarks in our fields to tell of their success. As they have been found to live here during our summers, why not reverse the experiment, and give them a safe winter home from which they may overspread our land? Those that wander will return to the winter home when supplies fail elsewhere.

The proper course for us, then, is this: In the fall turn loose skylarks in two or three places in Florida, in southern Alabama, in southern Louisiana, in Texas near the mouth of the Rio Grande, and, to add to the chances, also in Cuba, as they would probably soon learn the way across the sea to Florida. From Florida they would extend up our eastern coast and in time reach our Northern States; from Alabama and Louisiana they would spread themselves over the Mississippi Valley.

I have been told that there are very many hawks in Florida, and that consequently the larks might be exterminated by them. I reply, give the lark a chance. We can only try, and who can estimate the pleasure that we should receive in return if the attempt were to be successful?

The same plan might be tried with the nightingale, that most wonderful of song-birds; the black thrush, mavis, throstle, a noted singer that one sees in Europe in the trees of cities; the migratory quail of Europe, of which many hundreds are said to have been introduced into our Northern States without success.

Cannot a subscription be started for the purpose of making a beginning in this matter?

J. S. FROUT.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 16, 1887.

[The nearest relative of the skylark, Alauda arvensis, which we have in this country is the horned or shore lark, Eremophila alpestris. It is probable that the conditions which suit this bird best would also be most favorable to the naturalization of the skylark. The shore lark inhabits North America at large, breeding in all the treeless regions of the West, thence diagonally across the northwestern States to western New York, Canada, and Labrador. It winters in southerly portions of the United States at large. Probably the reasons why the attempts to naturalize the skylark have failed are two. First, the birds have not been imported in sufficient numbers; second, they have not been turned out in the right places. The experiment would be most likely to succeed if, say, 500 or 1,000 birds were liberated in the spring in some central unwooded locality, such as the eastern edge of the Great Plains in about the latitude of St. Louis. Birds liberated anywhere in the fall, and getting scattered the ensuing winter, would be less likely to find mates the following spring.—ED. NATION.]

THE BEVERLY INCIDENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The "Beverly Incident" is certainly not of sufficient consequence to allow of a controversy by correspondence in your columns. Permit me to say, however, that the statement of facts submitted by "Observer" in correction of "mistakes" in your own editorial is a piece of ex-parte testimony. Nearly all of his "facts" are in dispute, or are so conditioned by other facts, not stated, as to wear a color of falsehood. Upon the case as he puts it no contest would be made by good citizens; but the fact is that Essex County, in which public opinion on local affairs is intelligent and just to an unusual degree, was practically unanimously opposed to this measure, in which wealth has made its first invasion on that soil, and its opposition was accompanied by such an aroused public sentiment and expressed with such threatening decision that the Republicans became alarmed for their hold. No more unpopular bill has been in the Legislature for years; it was being passed against the popular will by the adroit and farsighted use of money; and Gov. Ames's veto was a concession to the voters as against the legislators. Your own editorial was an admirable example of the power of the Nation to seize on the salient points of a case from the outside and at a distance, and to do substantial justice to the interests involved—a power which is a chief excellence of the paper. It is to be hoped that the specious "corrections" of a partisan will not be allowed by your readers to nullify your own sound and impartial original judgment.

Respectfully, GEO. E. WOODBERRY.

THE FIRST ISRAELITE IN MARYLAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Provincial Court Record of Maryland shows that in 1658 Jacob Lumbroso (Lumbroso), "ye Jew Doctor," was committed for blasphemy. Record of his trial has not yet been found, but he must have been acquitted or pardoned, for we learn from the published Archives that in 1663 he was granted letters of "denizacion," was drawn on a jury in 1664, and received a commission to trade with the Indians in 1665. He was said to be "late of Lisbone in the kingdome of Portugall." There still exists a large family in Tunis of the name Lumbroso, and a branch in Leghorn, a member of which is a well-known psycho-physicist. In 1864 or 1865 an American Lumbroso visited Leghorn and inquired after his relatives. Information concerning the American branch of the family might assist in throwing some light on the history of Dr. Jacob Lumbrozo, and would be gratefully received by

CYRUS ADLER.

JOHNS HOPKINS UNIVERSITY, BALTIMORE, May 27, 1887.

Notes.

"THIS unique combination," say Cassell & Co., speaking of a literary partnership for the purpose of writing a series of novels, "consists of Inspector Thomas Byrnes, Chief of the Detective Bureau of New York, and Julian Hawthorne, one of the most popular novelists of the day." The first product of this collaboration is to be called 'A Tragic Mystery.'

A. S. Barnes & Co. have in press 'Analytical Mechanics,' by Prof. W. G. Peck.

Laughton, Macdonald & Co., Boston, have in press, and will shortly issue, 'Ten of Us,' by S. B. Alexander, a volume of ten stories and sketches supposed to have been written by a party of young people.

D. C. Heath & Co., Boston, have been made the American agents for the London Journal of Education, a monthly record and review.

For the benefit of intending subscribers to the Seldon Society, whose foundation we lately announced, it may be well to add that a guinea, landed in England by means of a postal order, means about $5.18.

Four more volumes in the pocket edition of Thackeray (London: Smith, Elder & Co.; Philadelphia: Lippincott) add to what have already appeared 'Henry Esmond,' 'The Yellowplush Papers,' 'The Hoggarty Diamond, etc.,' 'Major Gahagan, etc.'—a great number of small pieces being summed up in these "etc." The scarlet backs of this growing array ought to insure it a place with the Jubilee literature of 1887.

As if by way of compensation for the fine print of the Thackeray, we receive at the same time from J. B. Lippincott Co. the three latest volumes of the Library Edition of Scott's works, vol. 9, 'Ivanhoe,' vol. 10, 'The Monastery,' vol. 11, 'The Abbot,' a series admirable for its typography, and noticeably reasonable in price.

Miss Yonge, by her devotion to historical studies, her interesting style, and her ardent loyalty, was, as it were, designated by the nature of things to write the "Jubilee Book" of Queen Victoria. The tone and sentiment of her 'Victorian Half Century' (Macmillan) are what the well-known characteristics of the author would lead us to expect. Mr. Gladstone's accession to power in 1880 is mentioned with a sigh of regret; but the most important controversies of his administration, and even his subsequent loss of power, are barely mentioned, as being "in so undeveloped a state that they can hardly be entered on in this brief summary." The book is small, and the chronicle of events necessarily so brief as to be deficient in graphic quality.

Maj. James B. Pond's 'A Summer in England with Henry Ward Beecher (1876)' (Fords, Howard & Hulbert) and the 'Speeches of Henry Ward Beecher on the American Rebellion delivered in Great Britain in 1863' (Frank F. Lovell & Co.) are valuable records of the great orator's two very memorable visits to the Mother Country—the first a national service, the last a personal gratification, such as fall to the experience of few men. A fine portrait of Mr. Beecher accompanies the 'Summer in England.'

A 'Beecher Memorial' is being prepared by Mr. Edward W. Bok of Brooklyn for Mrs. Beecher and her family. Articles by President

Cleveland, Dr. O. W. Holmes, Mr. Gladstone, and the Duke of Argyll, and many other eminent Americans and foreigners, have been contributed. Only 100 copies will be for the public.

Mr. Frank C. Haddock has written the life of his father, the Rev. George C. Haddock, whose opposition to the saloons led to his assassination in Sioux City, Ia., on August 3, 1886 (Funk & Wagnalls). The volume is somewhat ponderous for a tract, but has its instructiveness for any one who is studying the temperance conflict in the Mississippi Valley.

Praise and welcome must be given together to the supplement to the Schaff-Herzog 'Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge' called an 'Encyclopædia of Living Divines and Christian Workers of All Denominations in Europe and America,' edited by Dr. Philip Schaff and the Rev. Samuel Macauley Jackson, and published by Funk & Wagnalls. Great catholicity is shown in the selection of names, and the best taste in the preparation of the articles. The data presented have been obtained in most cases at first hand, and the collection forms a very valuable addition to our reference-books for "men of the time." It is even more comprehensive than its title implies, though omissions might be named. A new and revised edition of the Schaff-Herzog Encyclopædia is published simultaneously with this supplement.

Not long ago we paid our respects to Don Juan Valera's 'Pepita Jiménez' in its English dress. The Messrs. Appleton have now reproduced the original Spanish in an edition for which the greatest accuracy is claimed, the employment of the modern orthography of the Spanish Academy, the fullest matter (including the prologue specially written for the English version), and the unique distinction of illustrations—these last somewhat naïve, to be sure. The print is good and the binding attractive. Other volumes in Spanish will follow.

A hasty glance at 'Le Crime de la 5e Avenue,' by Marie Darcey (Paris: Paul Ollendorff; New York: F. W. Christern), serves to show that it is a translation of Anna Katherine Green's 'Leavenworth Case,' and the French plagiarist has not even taken the trouble to alter the names of the American author's characters. The same publishers also issue 'La Reine de Cuivre, par Blanche Roosevelt.' A third story by an American, 'Le Crucifix de Marzio,' by Mr. Marion Crawford, has just been brought to an end in the Nouvelle Revue; and we understand that several American authors are writing short stories which will appear first in French in Les Lettres et les Arts.

Probably the first illustrated translation of an American poem to appear in France since Manet made his huge and strange edition of Poe's 'Raven,' is 'La Dernière Feuille, poème, par O.-V. Holmes, traduit du texte américain par B.-H. Gausseron, illustrations par G. Wharton Edwards and F. Hopkinson-Smith' (Paris: Quantin; New York: F. W. Christern). The edition was limited to 800 copies at 25 francs—after which the plates were destroyed. Le Livre for May, praising the book very highly, and incidentally praising the progress of American art, declares that the French printers met with great difficulties, which they happily conquered.

Both the Antiquary and Walford's Antiquarian for May are interesting numbers, as is shown by the titles of some of the papers—"The Keys of the Old Bastile of Paris," "Coucy-le-Château," "Old Roman Catholic Legends," in the Antiquary; "The Study of Coins," "An Unbowdlerised Boccaccio," "The Kaballah," "The House of Aldus," "Bookselling in Little Britain," in the Antiquarian. The latter contains also part ii of "Cromwell and the Saddle-letter of Charles I.," by E. B. Chancellor, who declares against the genuineness of the letter. An important article in the Antiquary, by Prof. W. M. Conway, is part i. of the description of 'Exercitium super pater noster,' "one of the most important books in relation to the history of printing and wood-engraving." Of this work only two copies are known to exist, one in Mons and one in Paris; and neither of these is perfect. Singularly enough, the article contains a detailed description of the book, but does not tell us where or when it was printed. Another interesting paper is upon "Bess of Hardwick," the vixenish Countess of Shrewsbury who was for some time the custodian of Mary Queen of Scots.

With the June number the Art Amateur begins a new volume (the 17th), with a new cover and design therefor, and is further distinguished by several extra supplements containing tinted facsimiles of figure and drapery studies by Sir Frederick Leighton. We would call the attention of all who are practically interested in composite photography to Mr. George G. Rockwood's article on this subject. He describes his method of adjusting the faces before the camera, and points out the excessive weight which blond faces have in any given series if allowed an equal exposure with darker. Mr. Rockwood gives a very pleasing composite portrait of nine young ladies in a literary club.

Santa Maria del Fiore occupies the whole of L'Illustrazione Italiana, Milan, for May 8. The Florentine Duomo, from various points of view, the new façade and its architects, with some of the works of Donatello, are all well exhibited in large and small engravings. The text contains the history of the great undertaking which the city by the Arno has just been celebrating with so much pomp.

The Paris publisher Alphonse Lemerre is now issuing in parts, nine of which have already appeared, an 'Anthologie des poètes français du XIXe siècle.' The first livraison contains poems by Arnault, André and Marie-Joseph Chénier, Chateaubriand, Chênedollé, and the elder Legouvé.

M. Pagart d'Hermansart has recently published in an octavo pamphlet of twenty-one pages 'Les Cygnes de Saint-Omer. Fiefs et hommages. La garenne du roi' (Saint-Omer: H. d'Homont). In this it is told how in all the north of France the right of keeping swans was a seignorial privilege. In 1386 Philippe le Hardi, Duke of Burgundy, Count of Flanders and of Artois, expressly reserved for himself the "garenne des cygnes" in the lordship of Saint-Omer. Later, various sovereigns granted the right of placing swans in their "garène" to certain lords. The swans disappeared almost entirely during the siege of Saint-Omer in 1638.

One of the descendants of Gen. de Durler lately gave to the Musée Carnavalet the last military order signed by Louis XVI. It is dated August 10, 1792, virtually the last day of the French monarchy. In it a company of the Swiss guard, under the command of Capt. de Durler, are ordered to cease all resistance and abandon the Tuileries, from which the royal family had just made its escape.

M. E. Bricault de Verneuil, who died recently, left in manuscript a work which has now been published under the editorship of M. Alfred Richard. It is entitled 'Molière à Poitiers en 1648 et les comédiens dans cette ville de 1646 à 1658' (Paris: Lecène et Oudin). The author has not been able to discover any document which proves the presence of Molière at Poitiers in 1648, but he cites many circumstances worthy of consideration which bear upon the question. There is also much curious information concerning the various troupes of comedians who visited the town between 1646 and 1658, and the places where they gave their representations.

The announcement in the Paris papers of May 14 of the death of M. Schanne, "fabricant de jouets rue des Archives," has something in it incongruously pathetic. He was the last survivor of the friends of Henri Mürger, and figured in the famous 'Scènes de la vie de bohême' under the name of Schaunard. In the course of last year M. Schanne gave in the Figaro his recollections of Mürger and his friends, full of revelations concerning the vanished vie de bohême and its chronicler. These he afterwards collected and published under the title 'Mémoires de Schaunard' (Boston: Schoenhof).

— Madame Jane Dieulafoy, one of the few women who have been decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor, contributes to the June Harper's the story of the archæological discoveries at Susa by her brother and herself, for her share in which she received the distinction. The objects found are deposited in the Louvre, and the collection is soon to be opened to the public; pending that event, this sketch with its illustrations gives a general idea of what ancient art has gained by the excavations. The narrative of life at the ruins is told with great spirit, and the hardships and the courage incidental to the expedition show that it was not success alone that won for this brave and enthusiastic woman so exceptional an honor. The remainder of the number is excellent. Two economical papers, one by Dr. Ely upon the history and place of corporations in social organization, the other by Prof. Hadley upon the history of State railroad control, culminating in the Inter-State Commerce Act, deserve careful attention from those who watch the drift of modern institutions. A characteristic passage in a paper on the Kentucky pioneers has arrested our attention. The writer remarks that the original pioneer's "unwillingness to trouble the neighborhood with a trial of any infringement of his personal rights, as distinguished from property rights," has left results still observable; "among those who aspire to be considered the better class, suits for slander are unknown. In the history of the State there has not been a crim. con. trial. The slayer of a seducer has never been punished. And this remark applies to the best population of Kentucky, as distinguished from a class that is degraded and inferior, so often confounded with it, but which is in no sense of pioneer origin." The tone of this passage, which we italicize, is as observable as the fact. Outside Kentucky it is thought, by plain Americans of the common sort, that an "unwillingness to trouble the neighborhood with a trial" is just what characterizes Choctaws and scamps not citizens. Others than "slayers of seducers" go unpunished in Kentucky under this substitution of "the better class" for judges and juries; and honester men than "seducers" get "slain." But it is not often that one finds a writer in Harper's glorying in a usage of barbarism.

—Scribner's has for its leading article a sketch of some of the portraits and busts of Napoleon, by Mr. John C. Ropes, similar to his former paper upon the heads of Cæsar, but not so complete. The frontispiece is a beautiful reproduction of Appiani's painting of Napoleon, made probably about 1796 or 1797, when he was the young general of the Army of Italy. It is a singularly charming picture, and the mixture of delicacy and nobility that characterizes it belongs also in some degree to three or four others of the early representations. The gradual hardening of the features and the filling out of the face are interesting to observe, though Napoleon did not grow old like Cæsar, and the whole series displays less character. The Ceracchi bust, the David crayon, and the Gérard portrait are admirably given, and some caricatures are mingled with the rest. The body of the magazine is much occupied with fiction. The principal serious article is a summary view of the development of democracy in this country as seen in the drift of its legislation, and is based by its author, Mr. F. G. Stimson, on his study of the statute laws. He notices the great and seemingly capricious differences in the public sentiment of the States taken severally, and finds "Georgia and Maine among the rashest experimenters, and Missouri and Oregon at the other extreme; while New York and Massachusetts, Nevada and New Mexico occupy a middle ground." He makes several leading inductions, as, that democracy has hitherto deemed the intoxication-habit more dangerous and sinful than incontinence or commercial dishonesty; that democracy tends towards sexual equality; that democracy tends not to force a man to pay his debts against his will, etc. His conclusions as to fact are fair and thorough, but his analysis as to causes and conditions might have been pushed much further and deeper; and on the whole there is a rigidity in his inferences which the state of our knowledge hardly justifies. He ends his article with a prophecy that private property, marriage and personal liberty from State control must stand or fall together. His definitions of Socialism, Anarchism, etc., are the best we have yet seen.

—Welcome as would be an improvement on Mr. Traill's 'Coleridge,' it is not found, by any means, in Mr. Hall Caine's sketch of the poet and philosopher, lately issued in London by Mr. Walter Scott. In every respect the new Life is marked by inferiority. Often repellently frivolous in its selection and handling of details, it does not rise, as a specimen of composition, even to the level of an ordinary newspaper leader. With no approach to style, Mr. Caine abounds in affectations, banalities, and mannerisms, besides being so obscure occasionally as to defy all attempts to unravel his meaning. Shaky enough is his scholarship, too. If a prudent man, he would not have left it to be noted by his critics, that his "pantisocrasy" is not the word to signify "equal government of all," and that his "pantisocri*tans*" is such a formation as autocritans would be, instead of autocrats. Equally significant is his "Eclective Review"; and his calling Coleridge's patrons the "Wedgewoods" suggests great carelessness, or worse. And then there is his adverb "easier," with "extract" for "abstract," "a factor to be counted with," "calculable resources" for "resources to be calculated on," "she took this knowledge in trust from others," "in the interests of health," and similar things in profusion. "Bemuddlement," "dunderheaded," "nincompoop," and "wishful" are expressions which betray his uncultured taste; and more vulgar pages than 121 and 136 are rarely met with nowadays. In short, Mr. Caine is, at best, an immature and inefficient bookwright. One need look through but very few of his paragraphs to discover that it can matter extremely little that, as he says, he has "been compelled to depart from" sundry "excellent authorities, in" his "rendering of certain incidents of the first importance, and in" his "general reading of Coleridge's character as a man." At the end of the book, and well worth its strikingly low price, is an excellent Coleridgean "Bibliography," which neither the title-page nor the prefatory "Note" in any way recognizes. It was compiled by Mr. John P. Anderson of the British Museum.

—Our Paris correspondent gave some account of Renan's 'Nouvelles Études d'Histoire Religieuse,' on its appearance some three years since, and we may therefore dismiss with a brief notice the anonymous translation which has just been issued by Scribner & Welford. It is a significant illustration of the activity of modern research that the most elaborate and original of these studies—that on Joachim of Flora and the Everlasting Gospel—has already been rendered almost antiquated by the labors of Tocco, Denifle, and Ehrle. With all his learning and all his charm of exposition, Renan at the best is a very unsafe guide to follow. Misled, presumably, by one of the charges brought by the Commission of Anagni, he tells us that Joachim proclaimed the superiority of the Greek Church over the Latin, though Joachim's writings, which he assumes to have carefully studied, constantly abuse the Greek Church, especially for permitting priestly marriage; he asserts that Michele da Cesena's doctrines "étaient mot pour mot celles de Joachim telles que les interprétaient Jean de Parme et Gérard de San-Donnino," though Michele relentlessly burnt all professors of such doctrines on whom he could lay his hands, and his condemnation for heresy by John XXII. arose from an entirely different source; he represents Guglielma of Milan as pretending to be the Holy Ghost incarnate, although she expressly denied the absurd supposition when it was suggested by her enthusiastic disciples; he declares that all the victims of the Inquisitions of Toulouse and Carcassonne were Beguines and Tertiaries, when the very authorities to which he refers show that but a small proportion of them were such; and he talks of these Beguines and Tertiaries being burnt by thousands, which is an unpardonable exaggeration, even allowing for his confounding the Beguines and Lollards of Germany with the Spiritual Franciscans and Fraticelli of France and Italy. He even goes out of his way to cite an author of the eleventh century, who says that Cathari were detected by their pallor, as a proof of the injustice done to the Joachites by the Inquisition in the fourteenth century.

—These blunders occur within the space of about a dozen pages, and it would be easy to multiply instances of similar carelessness and rashness of assertion; but they do not render M. Renan's writings a whit less readable, and one enjoys the sparkling style and epigrammatic incisiveness without troubling one's self too much about the accuracy of the facts or the correctness of the deductions. Of course, much of this charm evaporates in a translation, though on the whole this one is fairly done. A translator, however, ought to be acquainted with the subject as well as with the language of his author; had he been so in the present case we should probably have been spared such curious Gallicisms as "Jean de Parme," "Gérard Ségarelle," "Ubertin de Casal," "Michel de Césène," "ternaries" for "tertiaries," and numerous others, not to speak of the conspicuous nondescript "Joachim di Flor," which graces the running heads of nearly a hundred pages, in place of Joachim of Flora or Gioacchino di Fiore.

—The last number of Le Livre, page 213, contains an amusing paragraph about the method of writing the names of certain French authors, in which the alteration or misplacement of a letter, the presence or absence of a capital or of an accent, is said to overwhelm the owners with unhappiness. A blunder of the same kind, very possibly an intentional one, is made by Le Livre itself, in regard to an unlucky author whose personal and political enemies take a malicious pleasure in misrepresenting him in this way. M. Maxime Du Camp of the French Academy always writes his name in two words and with two capitals, which brings it under D in an alphabetical list, as it would also be if written Ducamp, in one word. But Le Livre puts it under C besides unjustly attributing to him aristocratic pretensions, by the manner in which it gives his name in this very paragraph, with the du which he does not use. "A sure means of being disagreeable to M. Maxime du Camp," it there says, "is to write his name, as it should be written, sans particule." This is a refinement of malice. In the new volume of Gustave Flaubert's 'Correspondance,' published a few weeks ago (Paris: Charpentier; Boston: Schoenhof), of which an account was given in the Nation of May 5, Mme. Commanville, who edits her uncle's letters, writes the name herself Ducamp. But in a note to the first letter which she reprints from M. Du Camp's 'Souvenirs littéraires,' she twice writes Du Camp, as if the other form were an afterthought and intentional offence, in retaliation for his refusal to give up for publication all his old friend's letters to him, and also, probably, for the still worse offence in her eyes of revealing to the public the long-continued attacks of epilepsy from which her uncle suffered all his life—an entirely personal and selfish feeling on her part, for nothing in the 'Souvenirs' can have damaged Flaubert in the opinion of any one. On the contrary, by explaining many of his personal and literary peculiarities, it must have won for the man a sympathy and forbearance which he had never before excited, and at the same time in no way could it possibly have injured the appreciation of his readers for the admirable qualities of the artist.

—Dr. Otto Stoll of the University of Zurich, the distinguished traveller and ethnologist, has lately added to his well-known works on Central America a valuable monograph on the language of the Ixil Indians ('Die Sprache der Ixil Indianer.' Leipzig: F. A. Brockhaus). These Indians inhabit three small villages situated near the northern boundary of Guatemala, in the inmost recesses of the Sierra Madre, the great central mountain-chain of that republic. Their district is the most secluded portion of its territory, and the most difficult of access. The total population of the three villages does not now reach nine thousand souls, but in early times the tribe must have been much larger. In 1535, when Gonzalo de Alvarado made his campaign against the powerful confederacy of the Mam Indians, and besieged their King in his fortress, he was suddenly assailed by a wild array of painted Ixil warriors, eight thousand strong, who descended from their fastnesses to the relief of their beleaguered friends, and flung themselves, in repeated and desperate charges, on the besieging ranks. Against firearms and mail-clad cavaliers their efforts were useless, and, after suffering heavy losses, they withdrew to their mountains. In recent times they are noted for having preserved the life of the late Dictator Barrios, when he took refuge among them after the unsuccessful rebellion which preceded his attainment of the supreme power. Of their language nothing certain has hitherto been known, except that it was a branch of the Maya stock. Dr. Stoll, in a tour through Guatemala, made a brief stay among them, and used his time to good advantage in collecting the materials for the carefully analyzed grammar and full vocabulary with which he has supplied this deficiency. The whole Maya group of languages, as the author justly remarks, has a peculiar value in connection with the researches now in progress relating to the remarkable prehistoric civilization of Guatemala and Yucatan. The Ixil proves to be closely allied to the Mam language, but with some peculiarities which make it worthy of special study. In an appendix, the author adds vocabularies of three other little-known dialects of the Maya family—the Aguateca, Jacualteca, and Chuje—furnished to him by his friend, Prof. Edwin Rockstroh, who obtained them recently, while engaged in his duties as a member of the Boundary Commission for settling the long-disputed limits between Guatemala and Mexico.

LADD'S PHYSIOLOGICAL PSYCHOLOGY.

Elements of Physiological Psychology. A Treatise on the Activities and Nature of the Mind, from the Physical and Experimental Point of View. By George T. Ladd, Professor of Philosophy in Yale University. Charles Scribner's Sons. 1887. 8vo, pp. 696.

EXPRESSING the pith and substance of countless books and special memoirs, physiological and psychological, with everything duly arranged, estimated, and criticised, Prof. Ladd's 'Elements' belongs to a class of manuals hitherto more frequently met with in the German than in the English tongue. The author's animus, in working over his vast array of facts and opinions, is evident. He wishes to be in a position to refute with authority the notion prevalent among a certain class of "advanced thinkers" that "Physiological Psychology" has driven "the older psychology" out of the field, and reduced it to the status of a mediæval superstition or an old wives' tale. As well might one say that what is sometimes called "chemical physics" has made chemistry henceforward obsolete. Physiological psychology is really nothing but a collection of experimental investigations, set apart for convenient study, but quite incapable of leading to any general conclusions without interpretation. And in the interpretation all the problems and difficulties of the "older" psychology come up afresh, and its "speculative" methods have to be used again. In giving us something vastly more exact and complete on the physiological side than those sorry writings of the Spencers, the Carpenters, the Maudsleys, and the Luyses, to which they have so long been pent up, Prof. Ladd earns the warm gratitude of all English readers. In his critical and general remarks he shows himself a worthy disciple of Lotze. His erudition, in short, and his broad-mindedness, are on a par with each other; and his volume will probably for many years to come be the standard work of reference on the subject, perhaps all the more so that it is the fruit of conscientiousness and intelligence rather than of genius.

The subjects commonly embraced under the title of physiological psychology are the general physiology of nerve tissue; the anatomy and physiology of the sense organs and nervous centres, and the duration of various processes therein, some accompanied by thought and others not; the subjective analysis and classification of sensations, and the connection between their intensity and quality and the amount and kind of objective stimulus which may call them forth; the analysis of space perception; the measurement of the accuracy of our recollection of sensible experiences, and of intervals of space and time; the ascertainment of the number of facts which consciousness can simultaneously discern; finally, that of the laws of oblivescence and retention. Of most of these topics, and of others less immediately experimental, such as the connection between feelings and movements, the cerebral process of attention, etc., Prof. Ladd gives an exceedingly complete account. The only omissions the present reviewer has noticed are relative to certain matters which are particular hobbies of his own. The pathology of the subject, including even the physiology of sleep, are omitted in toto and deliberately, for want of space. The only fault one can find with this part of the book is a certain over-docility in the author. Not pretending to be an original experimenter, it is natural that he should be receptive and respectful of the facts of the Wundts and the Helmholtzes. But a dash more of incredulity as to some of their opinions would have given his pages a spirit and character which they lack—for example, in the chapters on Space-perception, where the theories of "synthesis," which he follows, can hardly do more than mystify the student by their vagueness, under the guise of enlightening him; and again, in the matter of reaction-time, where one fairly longs to hear him brush away the Wundtian verbosity, and call it the simple time of a reflex act (a transiently organized one, it is true), which it indubitably is.

However, it is not our purpose to dwell on such defects of detail. We prefer to pass to the more original part of Prof. Ladd's book, which forms its last subdivision and is entitled "The Nature of the Mind." To readers of Lotze this may be described as a very elaborate and minute working over of ground which that philosopher has already made his own. The result is a refined, but distinct and uncompromising, restatement of the spiritualistic position: "The assumption that the mind is a real being, which can be acted on by the brain, and which can act on the body through the brain, is the only one compatible with all the facts of experience." The extraordinary candor and patience with which Prof. Ladd works out this conclusion make it far more persuasive than it ordinarily appears to its adversaries—as when urged, for instance, in the fiery pages of Prof. Bowne. One is made to feel in detail all the difficulties which stand in the way of getting along without some real spiritual principle of unity, until at last their cumulative effect is very great. It is a rather sad feature, in all modern psychological theorizing, that it is the demerits of the other side, rather than the merits of one's own, that are apt to lead one to conclusions. The anti-spiritualists, so far as they are intelligent, swallow all the camels and endure all the beams which Prof. Ladd points out, not because they love camels or beams per se, but because they cannot stand certain particular gnats and motes in the spiritualistic theory. The chief stumbling-block there is the utter barrenness, for scientific purposes, of your real spiritual being, or principle of unity, when you have got him. What is the use of a principle from whose nature not one single deduction can be made, whose activities, properties, character, and destiny, all have to be gathered from that mass of empirical particulars, for the sake of overcoming the incoherence of which, the principle was originally invoked? The old-fashioned scholastic spiritualism could pretend to deduce immortality at least from the nature of its simple and substantial soul. But Prof. Ladd claims not even this, if we understand him rightly; and abstract reality, unity, and activity remain the only possessions of that spiritual subject whose general admission by psychologists he thinks it such an important point to gain.

The present reviewer is not arguing against the admission of such a being. He is only uttering a word of excuse for those who consider themselves entitled to turn their backs upon it, and to construct psychology exclusively out of the mind's multifarious organic conditions and sensational contents. They may be intellectual barbarians; but, after all, the barbarians are the indispensable agents of renovation in the world. They overthrow the ruins, break the soil, and set all things in motion. In short, they let the crude air of heaven in, and open men's minds to incalculable amounts of new material. The speculative philosophers are, intellectually considered, the gentlemen, and are absolutely needed to give some kind of intelligible shape to the raw facts and notions which the barbarians hit upon. But idleness and superciliousness are the hereditary vices of aristocracies; and the philosophers, when not stirred up by barbarian violence, always tend to go to sleep in the closed perfection of their systems. If left to themselves, never a fact do they discover. A very few men can both quarry materials with the barbarians and shape them with the philosophers. Lotze in our generation is one of these, and, longo intervallo, Wundt. Mr. Ladd is their worthy follower.

One important fault we must find with the latter's philosophizing, although the point can hardly be dealt with at the end of an article. In fighting for the spiritual principle, our author seems to us to draw his line of defence in the wrong place altogether. He appears to think that sensational consciousness can be handed over freely to the materialists as their prey. It can be "correlated"—its intensities, orders, etc. explained psycho-physically. It is, as it were, foreign and passive material to the soul; which latter entity is required, not to explain the having of the sensations, but the relating of them together in the characteristic categories of our thinking—self-consciousness, spatial position, memory, causality, substance and attribute, and the like. Reiteratedly Mr. Ladd insists on the point that these mental phenomena cannot be conceived to have physical equivalents or analogues, while he seems to admit that sensations may. Of course this exaltation of thinking at the expense of feeling is in the line of orthodox Platonic and Aristotelic tradition. But is it not absolutely baseless? Surely the physically inexplicable thing is, that we should have any consciousness at all, not that we should have any one special sort of it rather than another. Knowledge is the miracle; and knowledge is possessed by the sensation which takes cognizance of some bald quality of existence, as much as by the thought which knows everything about that quality and its relations to the rest of the world. No physiologist can explain either of these knowledges out of properties of the brain. The most the materialist can do is to borrow them and clap them on, as a ready-made addition, to the brain's other powers. There is only one absolutely unattackable statement, one statement which involves no element of hypothesis whatever; and that is that, as the brain state changes, consciousness floats off, and that each pulse of it is one thought as long as it lasts unaltered, no matter whether the object cognized by it be simple or compound. We call it thought proper in the latter case; in the former case, sensation. But the nature of the consciousness is always a function of the total brain-state at the time. All talk about "ideas" composing the thought, all talk about the share of this or that brain-tract in producing this or that idea, is hypothetical, and goes beyond the empirical facts. The latter, thus simply stated, do not oblige us to invoke any spiritual principle beyond the passing thought as an agent of unification, for the passing thought never was anything but a unit. Much of Prof. Ladd's reasoning thus seems to us to rest on insecure premises. It is only when we seek to go beyond the empirically given correspondence of thought and brain state, and to express it in more elementary terms, that we get entangled. "Total brain-state" is not the name of a physical fact at all; and this may end in leading us to considerations which force the notion of a spiritual ego, in spite of its barrenness, on our belief.

BOOKS ABOUT THE STAGE.

The Life and Life-Work of Samuel Phelps. By his nephew, W. May Phelps, and John Forbes-Robertson. London; Sampson Low & Co.; New York: Scribner & Welford.

Mrs. Siddons. By Nina A. Kennard. (Famous Women Series.) Boston: Roberts Bros.

Souvenirs et Études de Théâtre. Par P. Régnier, de la Comédie-Française. Paris: P. Ollendorff; New York: F. W. Christern.

Nos Théâtres de 1800 à 1880. Par Alphonse Leveaux. Paris: Tresse & Stock; New York; F. W. Christern.

Les Origines de l'Opéra Français. Par Charles Nuitter et Ernest Thoinan. Paris: Plon; New York: F. W. Christern.

THE portrait of Samuel Phelps contained in the new and exact biography by his nephew and Mr. Forbes-Robertson is very different from that in the recent and more rollicking memoir by Mr. John Coleman, and it is perhaps a little too stiffly drawn to be quite true to nature. It may be doubted whether Samuel Phelps demanded two biographies when we have not one of either Charles Kemble or Thomas Abthorpe Cooper. Yet we have no wish to disparage Phelps, who was, as Mr. William Archer has aptly pointed out, the last of the line of British tragedians trained in the traditions of the British drama. He was an actor of almost the very first rank, a fine tragedian, and even finer comedian. As a manager he did noble work for eighteen years at Sadler's Wells Theatre. Yet he was kept under and forced to play second to Macready in his early manhood, and he was afterward overwhelmed by the splendor of Charles Kean's management. The book before us shows the strife between Phelps and Macready, and the strong dislike they both had for Charles Kean. We see again, as we could see in his 'Reminiscences,' that Macready was desperately jealous and inconceivably afraid of a supplanter; but we see also that he was, in the main, large-hearted and generous. As soon as he and Phelps ceased to be rivals, they became firm friends—united in good works and in contempt of Charles Kean. Like Macready, Phelps had a fondness for the poetic drama; he revived Leigh Hunt's "Legend of Florence," Mr. Browning's "Blot in the 'Scutcheon," and Mr. Boker's "Calaynos"; and he had made ready once to do an "Œdipus" of Lord Lytton's, with music by Mercadante. His career was as honorable to the history of the stage as his character was estimable. The present biography is a solid and substantial volume, making no literary pretence, abundant in dates, rich in reprinted criticisms, and perhaps a little too sparing in anecdote. It is rather the annals of Phelps's adventures as an actor and as a manager than a critical biography. But it is careful and conscientious. It has an index which seems to be sufficient. There are three portraits. In the fifth chapter are many hitherto unpublished letters of Dickens and Macready.

There were three biographies of Mrs. Siddons already existing in print before this new one by Mrs. Kennard, and yet this latest addition to the "Famous Women Series" is welcome, because it is at once briefer and better than any of the other lives of the greatest of English actresses. The authorized biography by Thomas Campbell—if, indeed, Campbell wrote it, which is more than doubtful—was inadequate and inflated. The life by James Boaden was one of a series of biographies into which he was trying arbitrarily to force the whole history of the English stage of the last quarter of the last century and the first quarter of this; and, moreover, it must be confessed that Boaden was not an inspiring writer. The chapters devoted to Mrs. Siddons in Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's 'Lives of the Kembles' are, like all his other writing, inconceivably careless and accidentally interesting. Mrs. Kennard tells the story of Mrs. Siddons's life with the aid of all that her predecessors have written, and of all the numberless references to the great actress in the memoirs and correspondence of the men and women of her day now very generally made public. She has availed herself diligently of all these sources of information, although we do not see that she has read the pages relating to Mrs. Siddons in the recent five-volume series of 'Actors and Actresses of Great Britain and the United States,' which would at least have called to her attention the remarkable notes of the acting of Mrs. Siddons as Lady Macbeth, published by the late Prof. Fleeming Jenkin in the Nineteenth Century. But, on the whole, Mrs. Kennard has done her work very well. There are but two faults that we have to find with it. One is an excess of quotation from Mrs. Siddons's own not very good letters. The other is a little more serious: it is that Mrs. Kennard, having to write the lives of Rachel and Mrs. Siddons, probably the two greatest actresses who ever lived, did not study more carefully the principles of the art of acting. If she had mastered Diderot's 'Paradoxe sur le Comédien,' if she had read Mr. Henry Irving's preface to Mr. Pollock's translation of Diderot, or if she had digested Lewes's reflections "On Actors and the Art of Acting," she could never have written as she does (p. 157):

"We imagine there is no law to be laid down on the subject of the amount of feeling an actor really puts into the part he is enacting. It must vary. Conventionality must, with the greatest of them, now and then take the place of emotion; or, as Talma expresses it, the 'métier must now and then take the place of le vrai.'"

This is rank heresy, and the quotation from Talma is made to bear a forced and false interpretation. Equally wrong are the views expressed on p. 164:

"An artist gets certain words to utter; he gets the skeleton sketch, as it were, of the character he has to portray; but the emphasis and passion he puts into them, which go direct from his heart to the heart of his audience, must be his and his alone, and must be as little as possible the effect of study or deliberation."

A perusal of M. Coquelin's article in the May Harper's or of his lecture on "L'Art et le Comédien" will show Mrs. Kennard what an erroneous view of histrionic art she has taken in the passages quoted. Or she may study with advantage the 'Souvenirs et Études de Théâtre,' a posthumous collection of critical and biographical papers by M. Coquelin's master, the late M. Régnier of the Comédie-Française. The essays having to do with the art of acting are those on Mlle. de Champmeslé, Adrienne Lecouvreur, and Talma. Régnier, who had made his first appearance on the stage in 1811, in an impromptu celebration of the birth of the King of Rome, was taken by his grandmother to the Théâtre-Français April 2, 1814, the first night the house was opened after the return of the Bourbons, and then he saw Talma act in "Iphigénie." Later he became intimate with the greatest of French actors, and there is, perhaps, nowhere any better account of Talma's character, of his private habits, of his ways of thinking as an artist, of his personal peculiarities than can be found in these few pages of Régnier's. Especially interesting is his analysis of the relations between Talma and Napoleon. In considering the career of Adrienne Lecouvreur, Régnier digresses into a curious inquiry as to the effect which the increased facilities of lighting the stage may have had on the art of acting. Mr. Henry Irving is wont to tell an anecdote of the wrath of Edmund Kean when his Iago tried to thrust him out of the "focus"—the single position on the stage at which the dim lamps of those days made the actors' features best visible to the spectators. Régnier recalled the stage of the Théâtre Français in 1822, lighted by forty lamps. In 1833 gas took the place of oil; in 1847 the quantity of burners was again greatly increased; since then many devices have been adopted still further to flood the stage with light. "Well," Régnier records, "this steady increase of illumination is for me, I seriously declare, of no appreciable value. It seems to me that I saw Talma and Mlle. Mars as well sixty years ago as I see the actors of to-day." M. Régnier's book is adorned with a portrait etched by M. Blanchard and by five head-band medallion portraits by M. G. Clairin.

M. Leveaux's little book on 'Nos Théâtres de 1800 à 1880' is rather a classified summary of French dramatic productions during this century than the consideration of the theatres of Paris which the title seemed to promise. M. Leveaux has provided here an easy and unpretending account of the changes and developments of the various branches of dramatic art in France. Although now well stricken in years, he is no praiser of past times, but sees much which is better to-day than it was yesterday; and an optimistic old man is likely to take a healthy view of things. So this little book of M. Leveaux's may be commended to the perusal of the pessimists who prate about the decline of the drama. One example of progress that M. Leveaux cites is the great improvement of late years in the quality of the orchestras of the chief Parisian musical theatres. M. Leveaux may be remembered as the author of a pleasant account of the Imperial Theatre at Compiègne, and he was also a partner of M. Labiche's in writing that most delightful drollery, 'La Grammaire,' although he had to sign this with a pseudonym, as the conjunction on a programme of Leveaux and Labiche was not to be ventured on.

M. Charles Nuitter is the librarian of the Opéra in Paris, to whose loving care an admirable and rapidly increasing collection owes its organization and its present commodious quarters in the former Imperial Pavilion. Besides being a librettist of distinction, he is a diligent student of theatrical history. In collaboration with M. Ernest Thoinan, also a conscientious investigator, he has now done for Lulli, Perrin, and the early history of the Opéra what Eudore Soulié did for Molière and the early history of the Comédie-Française. By permission of the Chamber of Notaries, the authors searched through the legal documents of Lulli, Perrin, Cambert, etc., as still preserved in the studies of the successors of the notaries who drew them up. The discoveries thus made were confirmed by references to the official archives at the National Library, at the Prefecture of Police and the Conciergerie, at the Comédie-Française, and elsewhere. In short, instead of copying the blunders of those who had hitherto written ignorantly on the subject, they went to work in a scientific spirit and investigated for themselves, with the natural result of upsetting nearly all the received theories in regard to the founding of the Opéra. Space fails even to indicate the extent of their curious discoveries, chief among which, as we lately pointed out, is a semi-rehabilitation of that wily Italian, Lulli. A word of special praise is due to the introductory chapter on the French court-ballets—closely akin to the English masques in which Ben Jonson and Inigo Jones worked together; from these court-ballets modern French opera may be said to have been evolved.

CENTRAL ASIA.

England and Russia Face to Face in Asia. Travels with the Afghan Boundary Commission. By Lieut. A. C. Yate, Bombay Staff Corps. London: Blackwood & Sons. 1887.

IT was in the spring of 1885 that the long-expected and much-talked-of struggle between Russia and England for supremacy in Asia seemed actually to have commenced. It had been arranged between the two Governments that a joint Commission should meet and mark out the frontier which was henceforth to divide the Asiatic possessions of the Czar from the territories of the Amir of Afghanistan. The British half of this Commission was already on the spot; the Russian half was expected shortly to arrive—when suddenly the world was startled by the intelligence that a Russian force under Gen. Komaroff had attacked and defeated with heavy loss an Afghan force. At once rose a babel of recriminatory voices. The Russians protested that the Afghans had no business to be where they were; the village of Panjdeh, which they had occupied, had always been included in the Khanate of Khiva, and its occupation at the present moment was an impudent attempt on the part of the Afghans to prejudge the line of frontier in their favor. Now, as the Afghans had occupied the disputed position at the instigation of the English Boundary Commission, the latter was of course equally loud and positive that they had an unquestionable right to do so; and the position was such that neither England nor Russia could make a concession to the other without seeming to yield to fear. Happily, at the eleventh hour, a collision was averted by the physical impossibility of getting either a Russian or a British army on to the contested ground. This gave time for reflection; reflection, in its turn, led to inquiry; and inquiry convinced most reasonable persons that the Russian General was right in his contention, and the Afghans had no business in Panjdeh. Sir Peter Lumsden, the chief of the English Boundary Commission, was recalled to London, and the marking out of the frontier was then proceeded with.

Lieut. Yate, the author of this book, was attached to the English Boundary Commission, accompanied it on its march from India through an unexplored portion of Afghanistan, and remained with it through the greater part of its adventures in Central Asia. Had he chosen to take the trouble, he might have written a book giving important information of the wild peoples in this little-known portion of the world, and the position of Russia among them; but he has not chosen. He has preferred to bind up in a single cover the letters sent by him from day to day for publication in an Indian paper, and the result is a book of amazing prolixity and dulness. Information there doubtless is to be found here and there, but it is hidden away under such a quantity of insignificant detail as practically to be undiscoverable. As a contribution to the study of the Central Asiatic question, the book is worthless; but, in another way, Lieut. Yate's letters are highly instructive and even amusing. He apologizes, in his preface, for offering these letters to the public in lieu of a continuous composition, on the ground that "the vivid impressions of the moment give often a truer conception of events than a carefully considered narrative written a year later." The statement is highly questionable, but there can be no doubt that "the vivid impressions of the moment give a truer conception" of the feelings of an actor in any occurrence than "a carefully considered narrative written a year later." As a description of the feelings with which the English Boundary Commission entered upon their work, Lieut. Yate's narrative is comically instructive, and few who read it will doubt that, if feelings at all similar prevailed among the Russians, the slaughter of the Afghans which took place at the battle of Pul i-Khishti was practically inevitable.

The cardinal doctrine in the political faith of a British Jingo is that the British nation is in possession of a right divine to appropriate for its own use any part of the earth's surface which the protection, real or fancied, of "British interests" may require. This right extends to Paris, New York, Berlin, St. Petersburg, and the like places, although, for obvious reasons it is, as regards these centres of civilization, practically in abeyance. Not so, however, with Upper Burmah, Afghanistan, Persia, Herat, etc. These Great Britain may take over at any moment with a conscience void of offence; but that the right is single and peculiar to herself is seen in the moral indignation aroused in the virtuous British Jingo by the spectacle of Russian aggressiveness. The English Boundary Commission, composed as it was exclusively of Indian officials, were, it is almost needless to say, Jingoes to a man, and, to judge from Lieut. Yate's letters, they entered upon their labors in the spirit of Crusaders about to carry on a holy war. They were resolved not to be overreached by the fraudulent wiles of the Russian. They were filled with a devout enthusiasm for the "legal rights" of the Amir and the liberties of the Turcoman. They knew beforehand that the Russian authorities could put forth no claims which were not unjust, could assert nothing which was not untrue, could attempt no action which was not dictated by a spirit of fraud and aggression. They had, in a word, taken the field determined to believe nothing good, and greedily to swallow all of evil that could be alleged of those with whom they were expected to coöperate peacefully. And if, as is not unlikely, similar prepossessions prevailed in the Russian camp, the collision that ensued can surprise no one. The poor Afghans had unhappily to "pay the piper." They bitterly complained, as Lieut. Yate acknowledges, that they had been "egged on" to fight, and then left to their fate by their instigators. Gen. Kormaroff was really fighting the English Commission when he attacked the Afghans at Pul i-Khishti.

For the rest, Lieut. Yate bears ample, though reluctant, testimony to the good work which Russia is doing in these savage and unfrequented countries. His letters, like all previous accounts, show that everywhere there are indications which prove that the flourishing cities and the abundant populations once supposed to be located there were no mere fables or exaggerations of the old Oriental historians. The vestiges of those better times still survive. The capabilities of the soil are great beyond measure: It needs only to be broken up by the plough. But cities and people have alike vanished before Oriental misrule and the depredations of the raiding Turcomans. The Russian advance suppresses both the one and the other. Thus Lieut. Yate writes:

"In viewing the Russian subjugation of Central Asia, one is apt at times to overlook the immense boon that they have conferred on the population of Northern Persia and Afghanistan by putting a bit in the mouth of those inveterate ruthless marauders, the Turkomans. . . . As an instance of the utter destitution and depopulation resulting from the unbridled rapacity of the Turkomans, Sir Peter Lumsden's party state that between Tarakhs and Kuhsan they scarcely met half-a-dozen human beings. . . . The truth is, that the Persian and Afghan Governments have neither possessed the power nor displayed the spirit and energy requisite for coping with these lawless tribes, which, too lazy to till the soil, and finding pastoral pursuits but little profitable, adopted the simpler and more attractive means of livelihood afforded by looting and selling into captivity their neighbors. . . . To this unequal struggle—affording to the Turkomans all the pleasures of the chase, combined with the risks and excitements of war, and attended by considerable pecuniary gain, and spreading ruin and devastation over the greater part of Khorasan—the Russian advance imposed an effectual check, and the occupation of Merv . . . has finally put an end to it."

And in another place:

"It is not surprising that the subjugation of the Turkomans should have gained for Russia fame throughout Asia. The mere liberation of thousands of Persian and Afghan captives is no small claim to gratitude. Even to the Turkomans, once subdued, she seems to have obeyed with conciliatory moderation. . . . The Russians have remitted, I hear, to all their Turkoman subjects all taxes for seven years from date of annexation, and, after that, a tithe of the produce of the soil and one per cent. of the flocks and herds, will be taken. One cannot find fault with them for seeking to conciliate their own subjects. It is the right policy. . . . I have heard more than one Turk, taken prisoner during the war of 1876-77, laud Russian kindness. This is part of a prescient policy. Even the Afghans wounded at Panjdeh have, I hear, received every care and attention in the Russian hospitals."

The pity of it is that the British people, instead of coöperating with Russia in this beneficent work, should follow it with unceasing distrust and suspicion; should assail her with invective and abuse at every advance in it. Lieut. Yate's letters are, of course, full of the wonted lunacies of the British Russophobists. Among the crazes of these people is a specially rabid one for projecting interminable lines of railway across desert places in order to attack Russia in front, flank, and rear simultaneously. Lieut. Yate maps out about half-a-dozen of these lunatic railways, the joint cost of which, if constructed and adequately defended, would come to about one hundred million pounds. And yet his own reasoning goes to show that if the English in India desire to be absolutely safe from Russian attack, all they have to do is to await it in India.

"Supposing," he writes, "that Herat falls, and a Russian army, 100,000 strong, advances on Kandahar, the most arduous part of its task is but just beginning. It remains to be proved if they can collect transport for the movement of a force of 100,000 men, and if they can feed such a large force. In the Afghan campaigns from 1878-80, the largest British force in the field was about 60,000 men; and with all the resources of India, with its two hundred and fifty millions of inhabitants at Government disposal, it was no easy matter to provide an army even of that size with transport. How, then, is Russia, with nothing but semi-sterile steppes, with some half-dozen millions of settlers to draw upon, to transport 100,000 men from Herat to the Helmund!"

This, beyond all question, is sound reasoning. But if the difficulties of moving a large force from Herat to the Helmund—a distance of 250 miles—be so stupendous, how insuperable would they become if the advance had to be extended 600 miles beyond it—i. e., to the Indus instead of the Helmund. What the British Russophobist cannot be got to understand is, that the difficulties of an invasion of India are diminished in precisely the same proportion that British authority is extended over Afghanistan. His policy—the policy that finds favor in Calcutta and Downing Street equally—is persistently to eat into the dominions of the Amir, and undermine his authority as an independent sovereign. The result of this policy is, that, in the event of a war, the British troops will have to fight with defiles and deserts in their rear, instead of having compelled Russia to fight under those disadvantageous conditions.

Waste-Land Wanderings. By Charles C. Abbott, M.D. Harpers. 1887. 8vo, pp. xii, 312.

In this very pleasant book, the author of 'Upland and Meadow' has given us another chronicle of his observations along the creeks, through the pastures, and by the old "worm fences" of his New Jersey home. The recital is perhaps a little less lively than the one which preceded it, but does not suffer on that account; and, for those who love such flavor of hedge and meadow as may be conveyed through the medium of printed pages, the volume will be equally welcome. Among the numerous matters discussed are the mating of birds, the winter avifauna of the region, Indian modes of fishing, the sense of direction and the burrowing of animals, and numerous quaint and more or less inaccurate natural-history records by early settlers or bookmakers.

Dr. Abbott, like most of us, is somewhat disposed to resent criticism, but there is evidence in the more guarded statements of the present volume that he has profited by criticism on his earlier writings of this kind. If such books are to be regarded as mere literature, which, it is to be presumed, he would deny as positively as any of his critics, it would not be worth while to discuss whether his work does or does not contain errors of statement which, taken literally, vitiate its reliability as a record. But if it is to be regarded as the observations of a naturalist enshrined in a literary setting, and hereafter to be referred to by naturalists of the twentieth century as a picture of New Jersey faunal life in A. D. 1886, it is perfectly in order to point out that it is sometimes more precise than accurate, and occasionally seriously mistaken. As a naturalist bent on probing the mysteries of nature, Dr. Abbott would doubtless be the last person to object to criticism intended solely to eliminate obscurity and error. We shall therefore proceed to call attention to several points where haste in writing or faulty identification of species has allowed error to creep in.

In his account (p. 180) of the supposed æstivation of Hesperomys (a proposition entirely possible, but as yet unverified by any purely scientific observer, and therefore interesting to establish) it is stated that a family of white-footed mice was found in the torpid state in the summer of 1884. They were seven hours in being waked up by being placed in a cool spot; were replaced in the nest, which they then abandoned, but returned to next day. "Three days later these mice were found in precisely the same condition. Time, noon; thermometer 106° F." They were "taken directly to a cellar forty-two degrees cooler than the open field." "The young died in one hour; the old mouse in less than three hours," of the shock (p. 181). On the next page, however, we read that the author "carefully removed these mice from the field and placed them near a stove, so that the midday temperature could be maintained. The result was the continuance of the dormant condition for eighty-four hours." But, as indicated by the above quotations, the mice had died some nine hours before! Evidently the last-mentioned experiment proves too much.

We read (p. 50) of the blue-bird: "Prominent among our resident birds. . . . Since 1874 I have recorded them 3,400 times." This is possible, but it certainly shows great industry and misplaced activity, in the case of a bird known to be a resident, that its presence should be formally recorded every day, barring Sundays, for ten years, as is required by the numeral given. "A lonely chat" (p. 18) is referred to, under date of July 29, as "perhaps the last of the season," but the chat is a summer resident, as no one knows better than Dr. Abbott.

In his endeavor to uphold his surprising hypothesis that many if not most birds mate permanently, the author (p. 56) is "fully convinced" that the same individual pairs of "song thrushes, brown thrushes, catbirds, chats, house wrens, vireos of three species," etc., reappeared from year to year. As the birds above mentioned have both sexes similarly feathered and only to be distinguished by dissection or extremely critical measurements, most ornithologists will doubt the accuracy of the identification until more weighty evidence is adduced. The records of the observers of bird migration, though still in manuscript, show beyond question that the male Baltimore oriole arrives from five to eight days before the female at a given northern point, the two sexes proceeding separately in successive "waves." When Dr. Abbott (p. 57) observes the male joined by the female "a few hours later," it only shows that the male had been there, or near by, unobserved, at least five days.

"Traill's flycatcher," a bird which is not known in summer in New Jersey, is doubtless an erroneous identification. The note described shows that the bird was the Least Flycatcher. The woodwren (p. 118) is spoken of as having darker feathers than the housewren. It is not clear what species is intended, but the fact cannot be controverted that between the real wood and housewrens, so called, there is not any difference of shade whatever, except such as may be due to accidental soiling of the feathers. On page 200, a frog is represented as having swallowed four young "wood-tattlers." Now the wood-tattler (Totanus solitarius) is a bird which breeds in the high north. Its very eggs are unknown from the United States, and the meal of the aforesaid frog was doubtless made on the young of a very different bird. "Green lizard" (p. 255) should be gray lizard; the green species only lives much further south. In the list of winter birds "both kinglets" are included (p. 285). The golden-crested kinglet winters in New Jersey, but the ruby-crowned one has not yet been authenticated by winter specimens from that region. The identity of the "grass-finch" (p. 291) is doubtful; if it is the true grass-finch (Poœcætes gramineus), it stands in the same category as the preceding. Ornithologists would be grateful to Dr. Abbott for material substantiating his observations, which it is quite possible may not be in error. The occurrence of swarming of red ants in New Jersey in October (p. 88) is so remarkable an incident that more details might have been given. It appears to be as yet unknown to our best formicologists.

The above citations, made in no unfriendly spirit, will, we hope, lead to greater circumspection in the preparation of the future volumes which we may anticipate from this agreeable writer.

Anne Gilchrist: Her Life and Writings. Edited by Herbert Harlakenden Gilchrist. With a prefatory notice by William Michael Rossetti. Scribner & Welford. 1887.

THE artistic taste which is shown in the making and embellishment of this volume confers a certain distinction upon it, and arouses expectations of some unusual charm in the text. It is true that the subject of it, Mrs. Gilchrist, the wife of the unfortunate and talented art critic who wrote the Life of William Blake, contributed nothing to literature; but she left a pleasant memory to her circle, and to attest this seems to be the principal object of her biography. She was herself an attractive person, possessed of a frank and eminently womanly nature; but as this found only a limited expression, one learns to know her rather by Mr. Rossetti's description in his very brief prefatory notice than by her own words or acts. Womanliness is a charm which works so much more powerfully in person, however, than in any description, that one finds himself mostly occupied with what is usually the secondary interest of a biography—the people whom the lady knew. We are taken into the group of artists of whom Dante Rossetti has become the most famous. Some simple, manly letters of his, essentially private, reveal his nature in a kindly light, and there are a few glimpses of other members of the set as well as of the Carlyles and Tennyson. Excepting with the Rossettis, Mrs. Gilchrist's acquaintance with these distinguished men was hardly more than casual, though extremely cordial while it lasted. Her husband's early death left her with four young children to bring up, and she retained the interest and regard of his old friends with exceptional success, so that her home never lost its intellectual character; but her life was necessarily a confined one, and her correspondence deals with personal matters. It is agreeable to observe that all of the irritable race of authors and artists who come on the stage behave themselves with exemplary kindness and good feeling; it is not often that worldly observation steals on such a covey of them at so happy a moment.

The great fact of the book, both in Mr. Rossetti's preface, in the Life, and in the subjoined essays by Mrs. Gilchrist, is her advocacy of the merits of Walt Whitman. She was captivated by the volume of selections by which Mr. Rossetti introduced him to the English, and she then read his works entire; at a later time she made a long stay in this country and formed an intimate friendship with the poet, which continued unbroken until her death. She regarded herself as especially fitted to promulgate Walt Whitman because she was a woman, and her writings upon him show a quick sentiment and a comprehension of the great lines along which his feelings and ideas move; but they cannot be looked upon as criticism. It is to be remembered by those who may judge too hastily of the wisdom of Mrs. Gilchrist's course in this matter, that she had completed her husband's Life of Blake, with Dante Rossetti's invaluable aid, years before, and had consequently long been familiar with erratic notions upon delicate subjects; and doubtless, too, the peculiar moral prepossessions of the æsthetic group to which she was so nearly allied in culture, counted in her judgment upon the tabooed portion of Walt Whitman's works. But it is at least open to debate whether the poet's repute is really served by having a woman champion him, since that very fact only tends to bring out more sharply those parts of his verses which are most likely to offend and are of least value, even were their place to be granted. Mrs. Gilchrist, however, chose to do this, and her friends sustained her, and her son honorably upholds her by setting forth her friendship with Walt Whitman and her public approval of him as one of her most important doings in life. Certainly there seems to be as little harm as good in the affair; but with regard to the chances of posterity being very grateful to Mrs. Gilchrist for this, Americans must still politely but firmly differ from their English friends.

The book is destined to form a readable chapter in the history of the Rossetti group, which is sure to be an important episode of our century in literature and art; and one is glad to know that so excellent an Englishwoman will figure in it.

Mr. Rossetti sums up her life as one "of earnest, warm, and unfettered simplicity, holding an even and sensitive balance between the claims of family affection and those of intellectual activity." As an Englishwoman who linked ordinary duty with a culture strictly limited within very peculiar lines of art and thought, her character has a curious interest. The reminiscences of the distinguished are a good sauce to the volume; its eccentricities are bone of its bone.

Cycling. By Viscount Bury and G. Lacy Hillier. With numerous illustrations by Viscount Bury and Joseph Pennell. London: Longmans: Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1887.

WHAT matter can be named of more ancient or more general interest than cycling? Since Adam's day has not each mother's son and daughter of us been a cyclist, bound as we all are to our rims of latitude, peripheries which whirl us on through space from west to east at a rate which entitles us all to championship honors? Really, what greater distinction has the nineteenth century than that it has found a way to make sport of this everlasting rolling to which we are all doomed? What ought to interest the world more than a good treatise upon cycling? and how singular that until this elegant volume appeared, man, in spite of his long experience as a wheelman, had produced no such book.

The "Badminton Library of Sports and Pastimes," as our readers know, is an English series designed to treat thoroughly the ways in which the Britisher gets his air and exercise. It is edited by the Duke of Beaufort and dedicated to the Prince of Wales. The volume upon 'Cycling,' written jointly by a Viscount, President of the National Cyclists' Union, and by one of the most noted of English wheelmen, will, no doubt, receive at home a reception adequate to an enterprise so augustly fathered and chaperoned. It deserves also a good reception elsewhere. The information given is accurate and wide in its range. The historical phase of the subject receives attention. How to ride, to race, to tour; how to dress, to prepare racing paths, to form clubs; how the machines are made; how women as well as men may enjoyably and profitably mount the wheel—all these topics are discussed intelligently and fully in the 450 pages. There is often a breezy grace in the literary workmanship, born no doubt of the sport itself; one feels that the hand that shapes the sentences has just pressed the brake in some daring coast, or guided the machine in a vigorous spin. The illustrations are often admirable. The Century has made the world familiar with Mr. Pennell's pictures of cycling, and his work in this volume does not fall behind his previous achievements.

As offered to the American public, the capital defect of the book is that it is so exclusively English. American cycling is seldom mentioned, and still more seldom the sport elsewhere. Additional chapters are certainly needed to adapt it to the wants of our wheelmen, and it is strange that a book in which we are so ignored should seek an American market. Cycling has, on this side the ocean, too, an interesting history; we have had our bold riders, whose deeds deserve celebration. Since conditions here are so different from those in the Old World, a consideration of how the machine and the sport should be modified to suit those conditions is very requisite. Aside from this capital defect, there are minor blemishes. The Humber machines are without doubt good, but several other types are, in American eyes, equally good, and do not deserve to be neglected while the Humbers are extolled. The slot in the shoe, a contrivance in this book highly commended, is among us almost entirely out of use, as is also the rat-trap pedal, except for racing purposes. It is strange to find the cinder path so highly commended, American experience showing beyond all question that clay is faster, safer, and in all respects preferable. Almost all world records, except the fifty miles by Falconer, have been made on American clay tracks. The book naturally regards cycling, for the most part, as a means of sport and exercise; while it by no means leaves unmentioned its possibilities as regards the practical purposes of life, it would have been well to dwell upon these still more.

After mentioning these shortcomings, we are glad to say we have found 'Cycling' extremely fascinating, and believe it ought to do much, even on this side of the Atlantic, to foster the love of the exercise. Let it not be thought that the wheel is a thing of interest simply to bounding youth. 'Cycling' gives us the portrait of Lord Bury, mounted upon a Humber roadster—a white-whiskered veteran well on in years, whose athletic grace, however, is no doubt won from the pastime, of which, as head of the N. C. U., he is in England the most prominent exponent. We happen to know that Samuel Rawson Gardiner, in some ways the first historian of England, forsaking his researches in the British Museum and Public Archives, crosses, with his accomplished wife as a companion, to France, and, for a vacation, does a few departments on a tandem; and this, though close upon sixty. We know, moreover, of an American professor on the shady side of fifty, with eyes bleared over strange alphabets, and legs crooked by long cramping under a class-room desk, who almost snook himself back into youth again as he pedalled a tricycle last summer through the English Midlands, drinking in the beauty of the summer landscape, while his shrunk calves, responding to the exercise, distended his knickerbockers to the admiration of all beholders. Henceforth he is a wheelman for this life; and if, for his sins, it falls to him hereafter to receive the doom of Ixion, he is quite reconciled to being a cyclist in more worlds than one.

American Ancestry, giving the Name and Descent, in the Male Line, of Americans whose Ancestors Settled in the United States previous to the Declaration of Independence, A. D. 1776. By Thomas P. Hughes. Vol. I. City of Albany. Albany: Joel Munsell's Sons. 1887. 8vo, pp. 100.

This book, as the initial volume of the proposed enterprise, is surely one of the curiosities of literature. That enterprise apparently is to take every portion of the United States, and to record the pedigree of all Americans coming under the definition of the title-page. Of course, there is no objection to such a work, because that definition really means only the separation of old settlers from new-comers, and points out the interesting fact that in certain parts of the country the records of vital statistics are more full than they are in Europe. That is to say, an Englishman of ordinary condition, an artisan, farmer, or tradesman, can hardly hope to trace his ancestry for eight generations; but, in most of our old colonies, the "American," as above defined, can easily do it. The same difficulty also extends to other parts of Europe, and if the distinction be worth anything, there is no harm in claiming it. Of course, our town histories and family genealogies have been doing the same work. Mr. Hughes varies it by taking a city, that agglomeration of extracts from rural districts, and dealing with the persons living there at the time. In fact, he makes a kind of glorified directory of that city, very much on the plan of 'Our First Families' and similar literature, excluding, however, all personal praise of the present generation. It is needless to add that only subscribers to the book can be recorded in it, because the general circulation must be very limited. While many persons would pay to read scandal against even the grandfather of some aspiring and successful neighbor, few will pay to learn that his progenitors were really very decent and respectable subjects of King George.

The editor seems to be honest and capable, and it may well be that he has struck upon a new and profitable vein of compilation. Of course, no literary talent is exercised, and criticism is limited to the apparent correctness of the pedigrees. In fact, "for persons who like this kind of a book it is just the kind of a book they will like."

The Story of Ancient Egypt. By George Rawlinson, M. A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford, etc. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1887.

Of all the volumes of "The Story of the Nations Series" that have fallen under our notice, we deem this by far the best written, and, in general, best prepared for the purpose in view. It was, in fact, no great task for the veteran writer on Egypt and kindred subjects of ancient history to collect and arrange an amount of particularly interesting Egyptian lore sufficient to fill a small volume. But he has admirably acquitted himself of the task, especially as regards diction. Some of his descriptions—like that of the country at the beginning—will charm young and old, and all will be found worthy of attentive perusal. As a true history, the book is, perhaps, written with too much enthusiasm for the subject and too great faith in the contents of monumental records—a general failing of Egyptologists and Assyriologists. Yet, kept in check by his reverence for the Bible, Prof. Rawlinson sins in this respect much less than others. Whenever, indeed, Bible and monuments are apparently in conflict, he shyly withdraws from the weighing of the debatable testimony. It is regard for the short chronology of the Hebrews, for instance, which makes him speak so very guardedly of the hoary antiquity of Egyptian civilization: "A consecutive series of monuments carries the date of the first civilization at least as far back as B. C. 2700—probably further." Occasionally a Biblical narrative is broadly introduced, such as the story of Sarah in the harem of Pharaoh, which is related with a serious consideration of motives—"as Josephus thinks" and "as others have surmised"—which is calculated to make critics smile. In writing this book, the septuagenarian author had chiefly young readers before his eyes, but there are lines in which the abominations of Egypt are set forth with too little reserve. All pedantry and dryly learned discussions are avoided. The forms used in rendering Egyptian names are plain and uniform. There was, however, no reason, as far as we know, for clinging to the long-discarded form Shafra, as name of the builder of the "second" pyramid, the Chephren of the Greeks, and Khafra of Brugsch, Lauth, Maspero, Petrie, and other recent Egyptologists. The two small maps contained in the book are poor, that of "the Fayoum" especially abounding in misprinted names: Tamich, for Tamieh; Benisonef, for Benisouef; Hali, for Hati, etc. The illustrations, which are taken from the author's larger 'History of Ancient Egypt,' are, on the other hand, very good.

The Story of the Normans, told chiefly in relation to their Conquest of England. By Sarah Orne Jewett. [The Story of the Nations.] G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1887.

The romantic history of the Normans has found a worthy chronicler in Miss Jewett, who has made out of her material one of the most interesting volumes of the series. The title-page would lead one to fear lest the earlier history of the Normans and their adventures in the South be somewhat neglected for the English conquest. It is not so, however. The whole career of the Normans is well told: their life in the North, the annals of the duchy, and the adventurous conquest of southern Italy and Sicily. Only, our sense of proportion and completeness would have been better satisfied if this last subject had been carried out a little further—to the death of William the Good, the end of the Norman period in Sicily, as the death of Henry Beauclerc was in England. The account of the peasants' revolt we will mention as particularly good. There are many excellent illustrations, especially from the Bayeux Tapestry; but we cannot see the pertinence of a full view of Canterbury Cathedral and the doorway of Chartres Cathedral to a history of the Norman period.

The German Classics, from the Fourth to the Nineteenth Century. With Biographical Notices, Translations into Modern German, and Notes, by F. Max Müller, M.A. 2 vols. Charles Scribner's Sons. 1886.

This work was originally issued in 1858, but, while the plan of it remains unchanged, it has been thoroughly revised and rearranged in order to accompany Scherer's 'History of German Literature.' The main work of this edition was done by Prof. Franz Lichtenstein of the University of Breslau, who did not live to complete his task. The new selections are largely due to the judgment and taste of Prof. Scherer himself, and it is only by a large courtesy that the present volumes can bear the name of the original editor. Most of the illustrative extracts previous to the seventeenth century have been changed. In that dreary period of German literature, the jewels were so few that the popular acceptance has dictated a selection, in the main uniform, in the two editions. The second volume, beginning with the reign of Frederick the Great, is substantially a new work. The first edition embraced the classic writers of the eighteenth century; the present edition includes extracts from the writers of the Romantic school, extending to Grillparzer and Heine. Translations into modern German accompany the extracts from the literature before the fifteenth century. The authorship of these translations is not ordinarily given, although it should have been indicated. The translations of Simrock have been most often employed. While opinions may differ as to the value of all collections which can represent only imperfectly, by fragmentary extracts, the masterpieces of literature, especially the drama or longer epics and prose works, a selection of lyric poems may fairly represent the best of their authors.

This collection embraces both poetry and prose, and includes specimens of the Latin poetry and hymns. Its selections from early German are reasonably complete. It would have been well to have included the Strassburg Oaths, both from their historical and their linguistic interest. The 'Merigarto' is omitted here, as is all mention of it in Scherer's History. In general, the leading authors are represented, though occasionally we miss such names as Tatian and Tauler and the Winsbeke, and such works as the Wartburg 'Sängerkrieg.' The introductory notes prefixed to the extracts have been revised and abridged. In these a marked improvement is manifest over the first edition. They contain brief outlines of the author's life, and indicate the standard editions of his works. On the whole, this selection will serve admirably its purpose as a companion volume to Scherer's History, and will be useful to all students as a general reference-book in German literature.

The Dictionary of Religion: An Encyclopædia of Christian and Other Religious Doctrines, Denominations, Sects, Heresies, Ecclesiastical Terms, History, Biography, etc., etc. Edited by the Rev. William Blenham, B.D, F.S.A. Cassell & Co. 1887. Pp. 1,148.

BEGUN, as the preface announces, by the late Rev. J. H. Blunt, this work would appear to have been intended as a combination, revised and enlarged, of his 'Dictionary of Doctrinal and Historical Theology' (London, 1870) and his 'Dictionary of Sects, Heresies, and Schools of Thought' (London, 1874). In turning over his material to Mr. Blenham, the publishers made a happy choice. For the avowed High Church standpoint of Blunt, at least in the volumes referred to, has been substituted an attitude of attempted and remarkably well-sustained impartiality. The editor declares his purpose to be that of describing "doctrines and practices far removed from" his own "in a simply informative rather than dogmatic spirit," and of always finding, "if possible, the point of unity in things differing"; and it must be said that this admirable plan is executed with great fidelity. The different denominations are allowed to speak for themselves. With commendable self-restraint, even the anti-Episcopal arguments of Presbyterians and Independents are stated by Mr. Blenham in their full force, though briefly, and are left unanswered—though the Episcopal position is given, of course, elsewhere. In cases, too, where the two sides have to be considered together (in the article on the "Unity of the Church," for example), we get the summing-up of a judge rather than the argument of an advocate. Most difficult of all, the articles dealing with what the preface calls "The Great Controversy"—Ritualism in the Church of England is meant—are made almost absolutely colorless. Conflicting views and practices are fairly stated; the recent decisions of the ecclesiastical courts, with the grounds of them, are given; and there the matter is left. It would be more than human nature for an author handling living controversies to be able completely to efface himself, and close scrutiny will reveal some evidence, mostly in the use of significant adjectives, that Mr. Blenham's sympathies are against the High-Church movement. In biographical articles such as those on Pusey, Maurice, Kingsley, Stanley, and Colenso, there is almost necessarily a measure of self-betrayal; but a high degree of impartiality must be set down as one of the reasons why this 'Dictionary' is destined to supersede such forerunners in the same field as Farrar, Eadie, and Staunton.

We would also praise its lucid compactness. It has not, of course, the immense range of Herzog, even in the greatly condensed English translation. The lopping off of purely Scriptural topics, which are turned over to the strictly "Bible" dictionaries, makes possible a great saving of space over the last-mentioned work. But, in addition to that, the general reader will be thankful for the display of a happy faculty of putting into a paragraph the essence of many a page. The result is a convenience in consultation (greatly heightened by abundant cross-references) which is sure to make this a favorite book of reference with all who seek condensed information on the subjects with which it deals.

The doctrinal position of the 'Dictionary,' reflected in such articles as those on Atonement, Justification, and Eternal Punishment, is fairly enough described in the preface as being that of the "intelligent members of the Church of England." Mr. Bagehot was probably right in saying that the only one of the Articles seriously taken by them is the one forbidding works of supererogation. The attitude towards science is one of uneasy tolerance. Adam and Eve are very likely allegorical, and Evolution is not so black as it has been painted; but the usual theological muzzles are applied as soon as science begins to utter conclusions which theology has not yet been educated into admitting. Ecclesiastical terminology is very fully explained. The member of the Cabinet who defined an archdeacon as "a deacon who performs archdiaconal functions," would not have been reduced to such straits by the challenge of an Opposition orator if he had had this work at his elbow. Some of the historical articles are written in apparent oblivion of late researches. Thus, under "Polycarp," no reference is made to the new date of his death, so important in its bearing, for example, on the authorship of the fourth Gospel, ingeniously argued for by Waddington twenty years ago, and since adopted by such differing authorities as Renan, Hilgenfeld, and Harnack. This omission is by no means characteristic, however.
